[MORALIA.]

PREFACE TO THE BOOKS OF THE MORALS.

I. We begin the new care and printing of the works of Gregory with the Morals on Job, because of the antiquity of the work (for it is the first of all those which the holy Doctor elaborated), and of the sacred author explained in this commentary; since the book of Job has either Moses, as most feel, or a parent older than Moses. Our Gregory attacked this exposition when he was performing the duty of apocrisiary or legate of the apostolic see at Constantinople, as he explains more fully in the letter to Leander immediately following; but afterwards, having obtained greater leisure, he recalled it to the anvil and revised it; and thus the work, having been recognized a second and third time with greater diligence by the most holy and learned Father (which can be asserted of no other of his elaborations), as most perfect in all its parts, by right also obtained the first place in order of dignity.

In that exposition, equally copious and elegant, he so far excels the other writers who have tried to illustrate the book of Job with commentaries, as he was far superior in the knowledge and contemplation of divine mysteries, in the science of Christian ethics joined with experience, and in the skill of all sacred things. So that in these books we have at the same time a most full armory for building and confirming ecclesiastical dogmas, and a most copious storehouse for instructing and forming morals.

II. As soon as those books were published, how greedily they were received, even with the bishops commanding that they be read at the sacred vigils, and how reluctantly he, a man most outstanding in humility, bore it, he himself teaches us in the letter to John the subdeacon of Ravenna, in these words: "But that which has been brought to me by the report of some, that my most reverend brother and fellow-bishop Marinianus has the commentaries of blessed Job read publicly at the vigils, I have not received gratefully, because that work is not popular; and to unpolished hearers it would generate impediment rather than progress. But tell him to have the commentaries of the Psalms read at the vigils" (Book XII, epist. 24).

III. Our ancestors also left us a witnessed preconceived opinion of the Morals of Saint Gregory propagated to posterity, especially since they made so many epitomes of them under various names, so that they could always be kept at hand. We shall commemorate here the more distinguished ones found by us in libraries. In the Corbie Codex, now in the library of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, which contains a collection of certain letters of Saint Gregory sent by Paul the Deacon to Saint Adhalard, abbot of Corbie, there exists also a small work given this title: In the name of God the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Here begins the Eclogue which Lateen son of Haith wrote from the Morals on Job which Gregory made. It seems to be at least 800 years old. Some leaves have perished. After the thirtieth book, nothing is read from the remaining five.

In the library of Saint Ouen of Rouen we have written by hand, the Mirror of Adalbert the Levite to Hairmann the priest, or the Morals of blessed Gregory abbreviated. The Codex is 600 years old. A copy of the same collection had already occurred to our most learned Jean Mabillon while shaking out the Premonstratensian library (Vol. I vet. Anal., p. 317).

In the ms. Codex of the Jumièges library are abbreviations of the Morals under the title of the Reclining-place of the Soul.

The same are said to have been collected by Simon, a monk of Affligem, in ten small books, and by Garner, canon and subprior of Saint-Victor of Paris, in sixteen books. The work of Garner called Gregorian exists in the library of Navarre. But of all who composed compendiums of this kind, the more distinguished was Saint Odo, from a canon of Saint Martin of Tours, made a monk and afterwards abbot of Cluny, whose thirty-five books collected from the Gregorian Morals D. Martin Marrier, a monk of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, published in Paris in the year 1617. They exist in the library of the Fathers of Lyon, vol. XVII. Odo gave effort to this writing when he was still a junior soldiering in the fellowship of Saint Martin. Following the example of Odo, John his disciple, who embraced his life in three books, composed a small work deflowered from the Morals of Gregory, which the same Mabillon testifies was found by him in the library of Monte Cassino (Mus. Ital. vol. I, p. 123).

In the library of the Church of Laon there is a distinguished Codex written by hand exhibiting the same books of the Morals reduced into a compendium, which two canons of the same, Adalelm the Treasurer, afterwards, by the witness of Flodoard, created bishop of the same Church in the year 921, and Bernard, contributed as a gift to this Church (Gall. Christ., in the bishops of Laon). The work begins thus: In the name of the Lord. Prologue of blessed Job. Among many it is often asked, who should be held as the writer of the book of blessed Job. Some indeed Moses, etc. Thus the prologue is finished: he narrated the deeds of his victory. After the prologue is read: Here begin the Morals of Saint Gregory the pope on the book of Job. There was a man in the land of Uz named Job. Therefore it is said where the holy man dwelt, that his merit of virtue may be expressed. For as it is of a heavier fault, etc. The first book ends in these words: because without ceasing he demonstrates to the Father his incarnation for us. Thirty-three books follow in order. For the thirty-fifth is missing. Who, however, may be the author of this collection, is not yet discovered by us.

IV. From these things it is clear how assiduous the ancients were in reading and collecting, as if into bundles, the books of the Gregorian Morals; which is a most clear argument of the estimation held concerning them. Moreover, so that the unskilfulness of the Latin language might not hinder them from being read, many translations of them into the vernacular languages were made. For Notker is said to have turned them into German; and Grimoald, a monk of the monastery of San Millán, turned them into Spanish about the end of the XI century, to say nothing of the others (Bibl. vet. Hisp., vol. II, book VII, c. 1, num. 13). No less does the almost innumerable multitude of Codices described by hand, which represent those books, prove the greed for reading the books of the Morals. We have thought it worth the effort to review here the principal ones read and unfolded by us.

Outstanding in antiquity is the Codex of the illustrious man Etienne Baluze, which is believed almost to reach the age of Gregory. But would that it embraced more than five books, namely from the twenty-third to the twenty-seventh!

The second place due to antiquity is owed to the Reims one of more than nine hundred years, which was given as a gift to the Church of Reims by Archbishop Hincmar. This we call the old Reims, or 1st Reims, that it may be distinguished from another Codex of the same Church, but of an inferior age.

The library of the arch-monastery of Saint Remigius of Reims has supplied us with three Codices. The first of the larger form will be called by us Remig. 1; the following, 2 and 3.

We had the use of a distinguished Codex of the Church of Beauvais, by the effort of the illustrious man D. Foy, a canon of the same Church of Saint Hilary, who as long as he lived showed himself most studious of letters and of all learned men. The Codex, which shows an age of 700 years, embraces the twenty prior books of the Morals. In some places it was corrected by a more recent hand, or rather corrupted; but we have taken account of the prior reading, which is easily distinguished. To the eleventh book is prefixed an index of chapters, whose distinction is repeated from the texts of the book of Job explained. Certain arguments are added, concerning eternal fire, concerning happiness, concerning the fear of God, etc. The Remigianus Codex 1 also exhibits some summaries written in the place of titles. The Beauvais Codex will be signified by these first letters Bellov., or Belvac.

We excerpted variant readings of the ten prior books of the Morals from two Corbie Codices, which since they almost never differ from each other, will both be noted thus, Corb. Mention will often occur of another Corbie one, which since it is now preserved in Paris in the library of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, will be called Corb. Germ. The same library of Saint-Germain provided us with a Codex of the best mark, to be indicated below by the title Germanensis.

Of the Monastery of Saint-Denis near Paris there was formerly a Codex described about 800 years ago, which we name Colbertine, because it is now preserved in the most celebrated Colbertine library.

From the Church of Laon we received for use two Codices in which the books of the Morals are contained from the seventeenth inclusive to the last, to be indicated below thus: Laud. first, Laud. second.

The six prior books and as many subsequent ones with the twentieth, twenty-first and twenty-second, we drew out from the library of the monastery of Val-Clair, of the Cistercian order in the diocese of Laon, with the assent of the most reverend abbot, and favored by the most learned as well as most humane man domno de Noyville, the most vigilant provost of the same monastery, by whose help and labor we obtained many other things for adorning our Edition. To this Codex we assign this mark: Val. Clar.

The ten prior books of the Morals, and the eleven most recent ones we found in the parchments of the monastery of Longpont of the same Cistercian order, of the best mark, showing an antiquity of about six hundred years; which by this halved name Longipont. will easily be separated from the others.

We used two Codices of Saint-Corneille of Compiègne, one of 700 years, the other of an inferior age. The older we shall call Compend. 1, the other Compend. 2.

We consulted the Codices of the Royal library at Paris, commended more by elegance and beauty than by antiquity, and for the most part unfolded them. One contains all the books of the Morals, another eighteen, a third only five; a fourth, of a much larger form and written with most elegant characters, only seventeen.

From a Codex of the Church of Chartres, written in the 10th century, we tasted a few things, because it did not differ from others already read by us.

In the monastery of Saint Peter in the valley of Chartres exists a Codex of the Morals written 800 years ago, which Ardeus, dean of the Church of Chartres, afterwards a monk in the monastery of Fleury, and from there sent to Chartres for restoring the monastery of Saint Peter, is said to have brought with him. This we consulted in only certain more distinguished places, because for the most part it is mutilated.

The library of the monastery of Fleury, formerly most well-instructed with a great store of Mss., preserves three copies of the Morals written by hand, from which we excerpted not a few variant readings.

From the Library of Saint Martin of Tours we obtained an old copy of the same Morals to be unfolded, with the illustrious man D. de Galiczon, doctor and fellow of the Sorbonne, canon and precentor of the same Church, to whom letters owe very much, standing as surety for us.

From a Codex of Saint Albin of Angers we received many variant readings of the Morals, and inserted them into the new Edition.

In the library of the monastery of Vendôme we obtained three very old Codices of the Morals written by hand. The one which excels in antiquity exhibits the thirteen last books; another the twelve prior ones, the third twenty-two. In it, certain indices of arguments or titles and as if chapters, into which the books are cut, are prefixed to individual books. It also often exhibits a double reading, which we also observed in the Ouche, Lyre and Bigotian ones to be commemorated below.

But Normandy, in which province this new Edition was especially adorned, supplied us with a greater store of mss. Codices, and a harvest of variant readings.

We received the fifteen prior books from the library of the Church of Bayeux, favored especially by the most illustrious and most reverend bishop Henri de Nesmond; who since he is most studious of repairing ecclesiastical discipline from the doctrine of Saint Gregory, thought it should be cared for that the works of the same holy Doctor might go forth emended.

We read all the books of the Morals in the Codices of the Church of Evreux lent to us especially by the benefit of the most illustrious men D. Bitaut, dean, Petit, precentor, and Aubery, canon and prefect of the library.

The same books we compared to various Mss. of Saint-Michel-au-Péril-de-la-Mer, Saint-Martin of Séez, Saint-Evroult in the district of Ouche, Blessed Mary of Lyre, Blessed Peter of Conches, the monastery of Bec, of Préaux, of Jumièges. These Codices almost all seem to attain an age of 700 years, and are of the best mark, especially the Préaux and Jumièges ones which excel in antiquity. The Codices of Saint-Evroult we shall sometimes call Ouche ones from the district of Ouche in which that monastery is situated. The Conches one is now preserved in the most celebrated Bigotian library at Rouen, from which we received it with very many others, by the humanity of the most illustrious man D. Bigot de Monville, a most upright senator in the supreme court of Normandy; wherefore we shall call it not the Conches but the Bigotian one.

Thomas James supplied us with variant readings of eight English Mss. in the Gregorian Vindications, but very few; from which however it can be understood that the Codices of England written by hand do not differ from ours.

Finally, D. Claude Estiennot sent to us diverse readings of the Roman and Vatican Codices, whom we mourn as having died in this labor and very many others undertaken for the good of the literary republic.

V. The studiousness of Christians towards the books of the Morals of Saint Gregory is no less proved by the frequent Editions of them, from which the typographic art relieved the labors of amanuenses, than by the store of Codices written by hand. It will suffice to review here only those which we have used, whether the praised books were printed separately, or together with other works of the holy Doctor; for to enumerate all would be a task of immense labor and superfluous.

The older read by us is the Parisian one of the year 1495, which came forth by the care of master Ulrich Gering of Constance, and Berthold Rembolt of Strasburg, associates staying in the Golden Sun of the Sorbonne street.

This was followed by very many Parisian ones, namely in the year 1518, with all the works of Saint Gregory by the study of the same Rembolt or another of the same name in the house of Jean Petit. In the years 1533, 1542, 1551, 1562, 1571, 1575 (which two praised in the last place came forth by the work of Jean Gilot of Champagne, a most learned man), 1586, 1605, 1619, 1640 and 1675, adorned by Goussaunville. The first Basel one is of the year 1496, which very soon followed printed in the workshop of Nicolaus Kessler in the year 1503. To this succeeded that which was made public property in the same city, at the cost and expense of Ludwig Horneken, bookseller and citizen of great Cologne, yet by the labor and care of Adam Petri of Lagendorf, master printer, on the day before the Kalends of February, in the year 1514, from noble Basel, in the reign of our Savior clothed in flesh. This Edition does not seem to differ from the superior Basel one, either in the text, or in the partition of chapters. A fourth was made public property in the year 1551, and again came forth in the year 1564, from the Frobenian workshop, by the care of Buldrich Coccius.

The Roman edition of 1475 excels all the praised Editions in age, with Sixtus IV sitting at Rome, to which is prefixed a brief preface by Dominic, bishop of Brescia. Concerning another Roman one to which the bishop of Venosa applied effort, we have already spoken in the general preface.

We have not rarely applied the Venetian edition of the year 1494, designated below by the halved name Barthol. because of Bartholomew of Cremona, a regular canon, who presided over the accuracy of this one. A prior Venetian one of the year 1480 had preceded it, which did not occur to us. Concerning other Editions made at Lyon, Rouen, Douai, Antwerp, or elsewhere, we refrain from speaking, so that it may be allowed to explain more fully what has been provided by us in this newest one.

VI. First indeed, from various Mss. collected with great labor and no less faith, we restored the pure text of Saint Gregory, as much as was in us. Receive here a specimen of the places emended by us in the first and second book; for the narrowness of the preface does not allow us to examine all the books of the Morals.

In Book I, num. 17, it was previously read concerning Christ, he took a humble death (mortem) for him; whereas it should be read mind (mentem), etc. Num. 18, which (the jubilee year) with a monad added, the sum of our uniting is filled, where sum (summa) is redundant, and changes the sense; as is to be read in the note to this place. Num. 20, we receive the weaker minds of the faithful, holding the faith of the Trinity; which last three words we struck out, added against the will of the Mss., as altogether superfluous; which is immediately clear to one reading what follows. Num. 21, previously read, the sons and daughters mentioned; although in this place mention should be held of daughters only. Likewise erroneously previously, all the viciousness of the Gentiles (gentilium), for twisted (torta), etc., which reading is built up from the following of the ms. Codices: in the twisted and vicious conversations of the old life; where corruptly the superior editors read in one word, intortis. Num. 22, for in all that they do (a mode of speaking familiar to Gregory) formerly read, that all (id omne).

In the number immediately following, in other Editions you have: for what is it to come to Jerusalem by sitting (sedendo) an ass. Where against the mind of the holy Doctor Goussaunville reads: sitting a she-ass (asinam). Num. 31, in the same it occurs: through them the grace of preaching (praedicationis) is derived, for of purging (purgationis). Likewise by a heavier error it is read of Christ: for knowing all things, but in himself taking up our ignorance, etc. These things indeed completely abhor from the doctrine of Saint Gregory, as we observed in emending this place. Therefore following the ms. Codices, we restored: But in his speaking taking up our ignorance. Num. 37, previously written: which, by fear (metu) is left, for which by mind (mente) is left, which we replaced from the Mss.

In Book II, num. 9, formerly corruptly: it is said to those who were present (aderant), whereas it should be read, both from Mss. and from the series of the speech: it is said to those who adhere (adhaerent). No less viciously, num. 11, there had crept in, it expresses so much greater a voice into the ears of the circumscribed (circumscripti) spirit, for uncircumscribed (incircumscripti) spirit, namely God. Likewise, how they are said to desire (desiderare) vengeance, for, how they are said to seek (petere). Num. 13, where it is read, we say that God lost in his proposition, victory was added freely by other Editors. Num. 15, the same changed addicat, which means condemns (condemnet), into addiscat. Num. 19, in other Editions against the faith of the Mss., and the mind of the holy Doctor, after these words, he gives some for tempting, there was added, others for afflicting. Num. 28, for the stroke of stripes (verberum), in the Editions of Goussaunville, the stroke of words (verborum). Num. 35, the printed ones have, he speaks of temporal published (editis) things, with de cautiously added, which particle changes the sense. Num. 49, it is read to savor (sapere) high things, for to take (capere). Num. 56, after these words, he lost the unity of concord, in the Editions follows this long assumption rejected by the Mss., and neither cohering with the preceding nor the following: since even after his resurrection he hid himself from certain ones who would not believe. Num. 59, where it is simply to be read, there will be therefore when he may appear conspicuous even to the Synagogue, thus changed by the Editors, there will be therefore sometimes conspicuous, so that he may appear even to the Synagogue. Num. 60, in the printed ones you read, he receives all things, for, he receives among all things; and num. 61, in persecution (persecutione), for in percussion (percussione). Num. 76, this genuine reading, the house is rescued (eruitur), had been changed into, the house is overwhelmed (obruitur). Finally num. 92, a little before the end of the book, this sentence concerning the Holy Spirit: differently therefore the spirit remains in him, from whom by nature he never departs, thus interpolated was read: remains in him, to whom he substantially exhibits himself at his wish, and from whom, etc.

Moreover, concerning these restitutions and emendations made by us, we have always subjoined the reason in brief notes more often sought from the consensus of the Mss. But when the old copies dissent, it was enough for us to indicate certain variant readings which seemed of some moment.

VII. Secondly, we have followed the division of this work into six parts instituted by the holy Doctor, observed in our Mss., but neglected in the printed ones, and perhaps unknown by most Editors. Concerning that partition Saint Gregory speaks thus in the epist. to Leander soon to be subjoined: This work, extended through thirty-five volumes, I have completed in six Codices. At the beginning of Book XI: In the letter, he says, prefixed to the books, I have given the cause why I have by no means brought the third part of this work, through emending, even to the likeness of the others. Finally at the end of Book XVI: these things as I remember having promised at the beginning of this third part, I have run through under brevity. It is not worth the effort to confirm this by more things either sought from Gregory himself, or from other writers. Therefore the first part, as will easily be understood from the inspection of the Mss., contains the five prior books. The second part another five up to the eleventh. From the eleventh begins the third part. The fourth starts from the seventeenth, not from the eighteenth, as is mendaciously held in the Paris Edition 1518. The fifth from the twenty-third, and ends in the twenty-seventh. To the sixth part the twenty-eighth book belongs with the remaining ones.

VIII. Thirdly, although it was in our mind to retain the division of chapters instituted by those Editors who preceded us, we were nevertheless compelled to change it for most grave reasons. It is confessed among all that Saint Gregory did not care about distinguishing the books of the Morals by chapters. Concerning the first author of the division made by chapters, these things are read in the Colbertine Cod. marked 62, after the letter to Leander, and the preface to the books of the Morals.

In the name of God the Father, and of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit. Here begins the prologue over the chapters of the Morals of the most venerable blessed Gregory the pope. Gregory, the servant of Christ Jesus and most venerable pope of the city of Rome, composed and pretitled many volumes of books. He also prefixed a series of chapters through the books. He also made an exposition on the words of Job, but did not add an ordering of chapters to its sentences. Therefore in the time of the emperor Henry II, Rainerius, a priest and canon of the Church of Arezzo, by vigilant study and thought, placed chapters under almost all the sentences of the aforesaid exposition, not for the favor of vain glory, but led by the zeal of divine love and for the utility of readers, or even of those hearing readers; so that whatever useful thing one might seek for the time in those sentences, he might find it quickly and as if without labor.

In the prior Parisian Editions, and in others either older or almost equal, the books of the Morals were distinguished into various very brief sections, with no mention made of chapters. The Basel one of the year 1503 exhibits a partition of chapters, which the following Editors retained up to Coccius. For he, as he himself prefaces, having followed another method of division, instituted new chapters; which division persisted in all other posterior Editions. But that we should depart from this and from that way of dividing which had preceded, we were persuaded because we observed that the same chapter often embraced things thoroughly diverse: or that the same argument, to which a single chapter should be owed, was distributed into many. For example in the old Editions before Coccius chapters 3, 4 and 5 of the first book, and in the posterior Cocciana and the others which followed, chapters 3, 4 and 5 of the same book, in which the historical and literal explanation of the text of Job is finished, and with the style changed the allegorical exposition is begun at these words: There was a man in the land of Uz, etc., these things we believe were done through history, etc.

Since therefore neither mode of assigning chapters pleased us, we embraced that which the verses of the book of Job, either whole or halved, seemed to offer, while they are proposed to be explained singly by the holy Doctor; so that the beginning of the chapter and of the paraphrase or explanation is almost always the same. Nevertheless, however, we cared to part the text into smaller sections distinguished by numerical marks. We have also assigned the chapters of the prior Editions between brackets, so that those which are praised here and there in books according to those Editions, can be found with no trouble. We call the older ones before the Cocciana, Vet.; but this one and the following, Rec.

IX. Fourthly, we have changed the arguments of the chapters almost everywhere, because they by no means responded to the text. Immediately occurs the example of the argument of chapter 1 of the preface. In the Paris Edition of the year 1518, it is read: concerning what stock, or at what time Job was; which in the following Editions even in the Goussaunville one of the year 1675, persisted. Nevertheless it by no means represents the scope of Saint Gregory; for he discusses in this place concerning the writer of the book of Job; he asks whether it was Moses or another of the prophets, and at length teaches that the Holy Spirit is the only author of this sacred book, having used however the pen of Job himself, which we thought should be signified in the argument.

Since the arguments in the superior Editions have up to this point been annotated in a preposterous order before the inscription of the chapters, we preferred to follow the custom usually observed in publishing other books; and first indeed we judged that the chapter should be inscribed; then what is treated in the assigned chapter, to be opened by a brief argument. Moreover, whatever occurred to us in the text worthy of observation, we described summarily in the margin. By brief notes also rejected to the bottom of the columns, we have illustrated certain obscure places and those minimally clear to unpolished readers. Furthermore, how ancient the use is of ascribing in the outer margin summaries of those things which are contained more fully in the context, is clear from Jerome's epist. 101, to Pammachius, who, asked by Eusebius of Cremona to turn a certain Letter of Epiphanius into Latin, writes thus concerning this work: I did what he wanted, and having called a notary I dictated hurriedly and swiftly from the side on the page, briefly annotating what inward sense the individual chapters contained.

Fifthly, we have cut back as useless the long texts of the book of Job containing entire chapters, which we found in no Mss. books.

Sixthly, we have prefixed the testimonies and eulogies of ancient writers concerning the books of the Morals already published, with some things either added or taken away.

X. From this edition we did not want to strike out the history of the Morals found by Tajone, bishop of Zaragoza, although not in every part certain; which we read not only in all the older Editions, but also in the Codex written by hand of the monastery of Longpont. The reasons for doubting the truth of this narration are many.

First, it is said here that Saint Leander brought Job as explained by Saint Gregory into Spain to the see of Seville. It is constant however that at the request of Leander it was sent by the holy Doctor through Probinus the priest, as is read in book V, epist. 49. Otherwise indeed, how could it be proved that Saint Leander came to Rome while Saint Gregory was sitting?

Secondly, the Roman pontiff in this relation is called simply pope and lord pope, as if he already then enjoyed this title singularly; whether this smells of this age and antiquity we do not sufficiently know.

Thirdly, there exists a letter of Tajone himself to Eugenius of Toledo published by the illustrious man Etienne Baluze, in the Miscellanies vol. IV, from the Colbertine Cod., in which no mention is made of the miracle concerning the invention of the Morals, even if Tajone had found an occasion for commemorating this. Nay, he denies that Gregory was ever seen by him: We have seen, he says, our Gregory placed at Rome, not by sights of the body, but by gazes of the mind. We have seen him not only in his notaries, but also in his familiars, etc. Therefore those things which are held concerning Gregory seen by Tajone in the history of the invention of the Morals, are to be rejected.

Fourthly, that which is read in this relation, that Augustine is contained in a higher place than any of the successors of the holy apostles Peter and Paul, among whom very many martyrs are numbered, does not seem worthy of faith. Concerning Tajone and the Morals found by him one can read Mariana, book VI of the History, c. 8, and Mabillon, vol. II Analect., p. 78.

Concerning the kind of writing observed by Saint Gregory in the books of the Morals there is nothing else to be warned, than what we said above in the general preface. He speaks indeed especially of these books, when he says at the end of the letter to Leander: I do not flee the collision of metacism; I do not avoid the confusion of barbarism, etc. Where by metacism we conjectured that the frequent hyperbata or transpositions of words, which occur both in the Morals and in other works of Saint Gregory, can be understood. Perhaps however by metacism is to be understood rather, according to the mind of grammarians, the frequent repetition of the letter m, which generates an unpleasant collision in speech, although we have not caught repetitions of this kind in the Morals.

Col. 767, in a note is read with the punctuation changed, and there is added: by this voice, punctuation (punctuatio), although less used or even recently forged, necessity will sometimes compel use, lest place be given to circumlocutions. Nevertheless from this voice which occurred to us in the notes of Angelo Rocca to the book of Sacraments, and in similar writers, we thereafter abstained, and interpunction (interpunctio) pleased more.

CONCERNING THE INVENTION OF THE BOOKS OF THE MORALS OF SAINT GREGORY. (C,S)*

Blessed Gregory the pope explained the book of blessed Job, at the request of Saint Leander, bishop of Seville, as can be clearly seen in the prologue of the Morals, and delivered it explained to him; and he brought it, explained, into Spain to the see of Seville. Moreover, the city of Seville is called Seville in the vernacular name, and is the metropolis of Spain. Therefore, on the death of blessed Leander, Saint Isidore his brother, a distinguished doctor, was made archbishop in his place. After his death, the books of the Morals, which blessed Leander had brought, were so lost through negligence that they were not found in all Spain. After some years, therefore, Chindasuinth, king of Spain, assembled a council of thirty bishops in the city of Toledo: where a complaint having been made concerning the loss of the Morals, by the unanimous counsel of the bishops, the aforesaid king sent Tajone, bishop of Zaragoza, to Rome with letters to the pope, for seeking the same books. For Bishop Tajone was a most fervent lover of divine Scripture. He came therefore to Rome, and having presented the royal letters and gifts, when from day to day he saw his petition deferred by the pope, as if because of the multitude of other books, those which he sought could not be found in the archive of the apostolic see, at last he asked that at least license might be given to him, to keep vigil and pray for one whole night in the church of blessed Peter. Having obtained it, when he more earnestly besought God, that now at last the effect of his journey might be prospered, behold about midnight, persisting in that very fervor of prayer, he saw the whole Church be filled with an immense light. Then he looks upon a great multitude of venerable men clothed in snowy garments, entering the door of the church, and tending in decent order two and two to the altar of Saint Peter. And when, thoroughly terrified by too much fear, he did not dare to move himself from the place in which he stood, behold he saw two of them, having gone out from their assembly, coming to him. Of whom one sweetly saluting him, inquired who he was, from where and why he had come, and why he kept vigil there at that hour. The bishop indeed responding to the individual things, and relating the whole cause of his journey and prayer, he who had come, extending a finger: in that chest, he said, which you discern, are contained the books which you seek. Then indeed the bishop, having assumed confidence, I beseech, he said, my lord, that you may deign to open to me your servant what that is which I discern, so distinguished a procession of men. Forthwith he responding, those two, he said, whom you see preceding, and embracing each other with hand inserted in turn, are the blessed apostles Peter and Paul. Moreover the rest, whom you discern standing after them, are the successors of them, the pontiffs of this apostolic see. And in the same order in which they followed them in the episcopate, they also now follow them. And as they loved this Church in their life, so also now after death they love it, and frequently come to visit it. Then the bishop, I pray, he said, my lord, that you may tell me who you yourself are. He responded: I am Gregory, for whose books you have sustained the labor of so great a journey. And therefore I have now come that I might satisfy your petition. Then the bishop said, I beseech, my lord, if he is here, tell me which of those is the blessed Father Augustine, whose books I have loved no less than yours. He responded: A higher place than us contains the most excellent man Augustine, concerning whom you inquire. He said these things, and immediately with the companion who had come with him, he returned to the assembly of the others. Afterwards, with the bishop seeing, all together bowing their heads reverently to the altar of blessed Peter, in the same order in which they had come, they sought again the door of the Church, and with the light which he had seen before they withdrew. Moreover, when morning was made, the aforesaid bishop related to the lord Pope all things which he had seen. And thus he brought the books of the Morals, received and described, back into Spain. And he instituted that this vision should be prenoted and prescribed to them thereafter.

THE BOOKS OF THE MORALS OF SAINT GREGORY THE GREAT, ROMAN PONTIFF, OR AN EXPOSITION ON THE BOOK OF BLESSED JOB. (C,S)

Letter In which he explains the time, occasion, division, purpose and mode of speaking and interpreting of his work.

CHAPTER ONE. When the following work was begun, on what occasion, by which encouragers, and what they requested.

1. To the most reverend and holy brother Leander, fellow bishop, Gregory, servant of the servants of God.

Knowing you, most blessed brother, for a long time in the city of Constantinople, when the responses of the Apostolic See constrained me there, and the embassy enjoined upon you for the causes of the faith of the Visigoths had brought you there, I exposed in your ears everything that displeased me about myself: because for a long time and from afar I deferred the grace of conversion, and after I was inspired by heavenly desire, I thought it better to be covered in a secular habit. For it was already being opened to me by the love of eternity what I should seek, but ingrained custom had bound me, lest I change my outward attire. And while my mind still compelled me to serve the present world as if only in appearance, many things began to grow against me from the care of that same world, so that in it I was now retained not only in appearance, but, what is more grave, in mind. Finally, fleeing all these things with solicitude, I sought the haven of the monastery, and having left those things which are of the world, as I then vainly believed, I escaped naked from the shipwreck of this life. For as the wave often drives out a ship carelessly moored, even from the bosom of the safest shore, when a storm grows, I suddenly found myself, under the pretext of ecclesiastical order, in the sea of secular causes; and the quiet of the monastery, because I did not hold it strongly by having it, I recognized by losing it how strictly it ought to have been held. For when the virtue of obedience was opposed to me for receiving the ministry of the sacred altar, this was undertaken under the color of the Church, so that if it were permitted with impunity, it might again be turned aside by fleeing. And after this, to me unwilling and resisting, since the ministry of the altar was grave, the weight of pastoral care was also enjoined. Which I now tolerate so much more hardly, as feeling myself unequal to it, I breathe in no consolation of confidence. For since the times of the world, with evils becoming frequent as the end approaches, are disturbed; we ourselves, who are believed to serve internal mysteries, are involved in external cares: just as at that time also, in which I approached the ministry of the altar, this was done concerning me, without my knowing it, that I should receive the weight of the sacred order, so that I might keep watch more freely in the earthly palace; where indeed many of my brothers from the monastery, bound by twin charity, followed me. Which I see was done by divine dispensation, so that I might always be restrained by their example to the placid shore of prayer, as if by the rope of an anchor, while I was tossed by the incessant impulse of secular causes. To their company, as if to the bosom of the safest port, I fled from the volumes and waves of earthly acts; and although that ministry, having withdrawn me from the monastery, had extinguished the life of my former quiet by the sword of its occupation; yet among them, through the conversation of studious reading, the aspiration of daily compunction animated me. Then it pleased the same brothers, you also compelling, as you yourself remember, that they should compel me by importunate petition to explain the book of blessed Job; and as truth would infuse strength, I should open to them mysteries of such great depth. They also added this to me in the burden of their petition, that I should not only examine the words of the history through the senses of allegories, but immediately turn the senses of the allegories into the exercise of morality; adding something still more grave, that I should gird each thing understood with testimonies; and the testimonies brought forward, if they perhaps seemed involved, I should unravel by the interposition of an added exposition.

CHAPTER TWO. WITH WHAT LOWLINESS OF MIND, WITH WHAT CONFIDENCE IN GOD. BY WHAT REASON THE SAME WORK WAS RETRACTED, FINISHED, AND DIVIDED. WHAT SENSES IT SEARCHES OUT.

But soon, as I recognized that I was being drawn to such great and such things in this obscure work, and hitherto unexamined before us, overcome by the weight of hearing alone, I confess, and being weary, I succumbed. But suddenly caught between fear and devotion, when I raised the eyes of my mind to the Giver of gifts, hesitation having been put aside, I immediately attended with certainty, because it could not be impossible, what charity was commanding me from fraternal hearts. Indeed, I despaired of being fit for these things: but more robust by that very despair of mine, I immediately raised my hope to Him through whom the tongue of the mute is opened, who makes the tongues of infants eloquent; who distinguished the immense and brute brayings of the ass into the sensible modes of human conversation. What wonder is it, then, if He provides understanding to a foolish man, who tells His truth, when He wills, even through the mouths of beasts of burden? Girded by the strength of this consideration, I excited my aridity to track down the fountain of such great depth. And although the life of those to whom I was compelled to explain far transcended me, yet I did not believe it to be injurious if a leaden pipe should administer the streams for the uses of men. Hence soon, with the same brothers placed before me, I spoke the prior parts of the book under their eyes; and because I found a somewhat more vacant time, I dictated the latter parts while treating them. And when wider spaces were supplied to me, increasing many things, subtracting a few, and thus leaving some as they were found, I composed those things which had been taken down under their eyes while I was speaking, by emending them through books, because even when I dictated the last parts, I carefully attended to what style I had spoken the first. I acted, therefore, so that by running through those things which I spoke with studious emendation, I might raise them as if to the likeness of a dictated work; and those things which I had dictated should not differ far from the speech of one conversing; so that while this is stretched and that is drawn back, a thing not dissimilar might be formed from a dissimilar mode of publication; although I left the third part of this work almost as I delivered it by conversing, because as the brothers drew me to other things, they did not want this to be more subtly emended. To whom indeed, as they commanded many things, while I wanted to obey now through the ministry of exposition, now through the ascent of contemplation, now through the instrument of morality, I completed this work extended through thirty-five volumes, in six codices. Whence also in it I am often found to postpone, as it were, the order of exposition, and I labor a little longer in the breadth of contemplation and morality. But nevertheless, whoever speaks of God must take care that he searches out whatever instructs the morals of the hearers; and he should repute this the right order of speaking, if when the opportunity of edification requires, he usefully derives himself from that which he had begun to speak. For the treater of sacred eloquence ought to imitate the custom of a river. For a river, while it flows down through its bed, if it touches concave valleys on the side, it immediately diverts the course of its impetus into them; and when it has sufficiently filled them, it suddenly pours itself back into its bed. So indeed, so ought the treater of the divine word to be, so that when he discusses any matter, if perhaps he finds an occasion of suitable edification placed near, he may twist the waves of his tongue as if to a neighboring valley; and when he has sufficiently infused the field of the subjoined instruction, he may return to the bed of the proposed speech.

CHAPTER THREE.

In what order he explains the individual senses. Sometimes it is necessary to adhere to the allegorical.

It is to be known, indeed, that we run through some things with a historical exposition, and we search out some things with a typical investigation through allegory; we discuss some things through the instruments of allegorical morality alone; but some things, searching for all together more solicitously, we investigate in a threefold way. For first indeed we lay the foundations of history; then through typical significance we erect the fabric of the mind into the citadel of faith; at the end also through the grace of morality, we clothe the building as if with an added color. Or certainly, what are the words of truth to be believed, if not as nourishments for refreshing the mind? Which by discussing in many ways with alternating modes, we offer a dish to the mouth; so that we may repel the fastidiousness of the invited reader as if our guest, who while he considers many things offered to him, may take what he decides is more elegant. But sometimes we neglect to explain the open words of history, lest we come more slowly to the obscure: but sometimes they cannot be understood according to the letter; because accepted on the surface, they by no means produce instruction for readers, but error. For behold, it is said: "Under whom they are bent who carry the world" (Job IX, 13). And concerning such a great man, who does not know that he by no means follows the vain fables of the poets, so that he should suspect the mass of the world to be carried under giant sweat? He who again, pressed by strokes, says: "My soul has chosen hanging, and my bones death" (Job VII, 15). And who rightly wise would believe that a man of such great praise, whom it is evident receives rewards for the virtue of patience from the internal judge, had decided to finish his life by hanging among the lashes? Sometimes also, lest perhaps they ought to be understood according to the letter, the very words of the letter oppose themselves. For he says: "Let the day perish in which I was born, and the night in which it was said: A man is conceived" (Job III, 2). And a little after he subjoins: "Let darkness occupy it, and let it be involved in bitterness" (Ibid., 5). And in the curse of the same night he subjoins: "Let that night be solitary" (Ib., 7). Which indeed day of birth, having passed away by the very impulse of time, could not stand. For in what way did he wish this to be involved in darkness? Having slipped away, it already was not; and yet if it subsisted in the nature of things, it could by no means feel bitterness. It is evident, therefore, that it is by no means said of an insensible day, which is wished to be struck by the sense of bitterness. And if the night of conception, joined to the rest of the nights, had departed, in what way does he wish this to become solitary? Which as it could not be fixed from the lapse of time, so also it could not be separated from the conjunction of the remaining nights. He who again says: "How long do you not spare me, nor let me alone, that I may swallow my saliva" (Job VII, 19)? And yet a little above he had said: "The things which my soul before would not touch, now through anguish are my meats" (Job VI, 7). But who does not know that saliva can be swallowed more easily than food? He therefore who announces that he takes food, it is very incredible in what order he denies that he can swallow saliva. And again he says: "I have sinned, what shall I do to you, O guardian of men" (Job VII, 20)? or certainly: "You wish to consume me with the sins of my youth" (Job XIII, 26)? And yet in another response he subjoins: "For neither has my heart reprehended me in all my life" (Job XXVII, 6). In what way therefore is he minutely reprehended by his heart in all his life, who testifies by public voice that he has sinned? For never do the fault of the work and the irreprehensibility of the heart meet together at once. But indeed the words of the letter, while they cannot agree when compared to themselves, show something else in themselves which should be sought, as if they say with certain voices: While you behold us destroyed on our surface, seek this in us, which ordained and congruent with itself among us may prevail to be found within.

CHAPTER FOUR.

Sometimes it is necessary to adhere to the literal sense.

But sometimes he who neglects to accept the words of history according to the letter, hides the light of truth offered to him; and while he laboriously desires to find another thing within them from within, he loses this which he was able to attain without difficulty from without. For the holy man says: "If I have denied what the poor wanted, and have made the eyes of the widow wait; if I have eaten my morsel alone, and the pupil has not eaten from it; if I have despised him that passed by, because he had no garment, and the poor man without a covering; if his sides have not blessed me, and he was not warmed from the fleeces of my sheep" (Job XXXI, 16 et seq.). Which indeed if we violently inflect to the sense of allegory, we empty all the facts of his mercy. For the divine word, as it exercises the prudent with mysteries, so for the most part it refreshes the simple with the surface. It has in public whence it may nourish the little ones, it keeps in secret whence it may suspend the minds of the sublime in admiration. For it is as it were a certain river, so to speak, shallow and deep, in which both a lamb may walk and an elephant may swim. As therefore the opportunity of each place demands, so the order of the exposition changes itself through study; so that it may find the sense of the divine speech so much more truly, as it alternates through the species of causes, as each matter shall require.

CHAPTER FIVE.

Gregory, laboring under sickness, finished the following work. He neglected the art of speaking. What versions of Scripture he uses.

Which exposition indeed I have transmitted to your blessedness to be reviewed, not as if I ought it as worthy, but because I remember having promised it at your request. In which whatever your holiness shall find lukewarm and uncultivated, let it indulge me so much more quickly, as it does not ignore that I, a sick man, say this. For while the body is worn down by molestation, even the studies of speaking languish with an affected mind. For many courses of years already roll away, that I am tortured by frequent pains of the bowels, at every hour and moment I grow weary from the broken strength of my stomach, I pant with slow indeed, but yet continuous fevers. And among these things while I solicitously weigh because, as Scripture witnesses, "Every son who is received by God is scourged" (Hebr. XII, 6), by how much more hardly I am depressed by present evils, by so much more certainly I breathe in from eternal presumption. And perhaps this was the counsel of divine providence, that I, being smitten, should explain the smitten Job, and should better feel the mind of the scourged through scourges. But nevertheless to those rightly considering it is clear, because corporal molestation opposes the studies of my labor in this no small adversity, that when the strength of the flesh is scarcely sufficient to exhibit the ministry of speech, the mind cannot worthily intimate what it feels. For what is the office of the body, unless the organ of the heart? And however skilled the artist of singing may be, he is not able to fulfill his art, unless the external ministries also concord with him for this: because indeed the song, which the learned hand commands, the shattered organs do not properly resound; nor does the blast express the art, if the pipe hissing with cracks strident. By how much therefore more gravely is the quality of my exposition pressed, in which the fracture of the organ so dissipates the grace of speaking, that no art of skill may compose it? But I ask that by running through the sayings of this work, you do not seek in these the leaves of words, because through the sacred eloquence the levity of unfruitful loquacity is studiously restrained by their treaters, while a grove is prohibited to be planted in the temple of God (Deut. XVI, 21). And we all without doubt know, that as often as the stalks of the harvest profit evilly joyful in leaves, the grains swell with less fullness of the ears. Whence also I have despised to keep the very art of speaking, which the masteries of external discipline insinuate. For as the tenor of this epistle also enunciates, I do not flee the collision of metacism, I do not avoid the confusion of barbarism, I contemn to keep the sites and motions and cases of prepositions, because I vehemently judge it unworthy to restrict the words of the heavenly oracle under the rules of Donatus. For neither have these been kept by any interpreters in the authority of the sacred Scripture. From which indeed because our exposition arises, it is truly worthy that the offspring brought forth as it were should imitate the appearance of its mother. But I discuss the new translation; but when the cause of proof requires, I assume now the new, now the old through testimonies; so that because the Apostolic See, which I preside over by God's authority, uses both, the labor of my study may also be supported from both.

PREFACE IN WHICH HE TOUCHES IN A FEW WORDS UPON THOSE THINGS WHICH ARE TO BE EXPLAINED IN THE WHOLE WORK.

CHAPTER ONE.

1. Who is the writer of the book of Job. --- It is often asked among many who is to be held as the writer of the book of the blessed Job. And some indeed suspect that Moses, others that some one of the prophets was the writer of this work. For because in the book of Genesis (Gen. 36:33) Jobab is described to have descended from the stock of Esau, and to have succeeded Bela the son of Beor in the kingdom, they believed that this blessed Job existed long before the times of Moses, being ignorant indeed of the custom of sacred eloquence, because in its prior parts it is accustomed to touch briefly upon those things that are to follow long after, when it strives to hasten to other things to be enumerated more subtilely. Whence also Jobab is mentioned there to have been before the kings existed in Israel. By no means therefore is he known to have existed before the law, who is signaled to have been in the time of the Israelitish judges. While some consider this less cautiously, they think Moses to be the writer of his deeds as if set long before; so that indeed he who was able to put forth the precepts of the law for our erudition, the same may be believed to have also committed to us examples of virtue from the history of a Gentile man. Some truly, as has been said, think some one of the prophets to be the writer of this work: asserting that no one could know such mystical words of God, unless one whose mind the spirit of prophecy raised to things above.

2. The Holy Spirit is the author. ---But it is very superfluously asked who wrote these things, since nevertheless the Holy Spirit is faithfully believed to be the author of the book. He therefore wrote these things, who dictated them to be written. He wrote them, who both existed as the inspirer in his work, and transmitted his deeds to be imitated by us through the voice of the writer. If we should read the words of some great man in received letters, but should ask with what pen they were written, it would truly be ridiculous to know the author of the letters and to understand the sense, but to track down with what kind of pen their words were impressed. When therefore we know the matter, and we hold the Holy Spirit to be the author of that matter, because we seek the writer, what else do we do, except while reading the letters, we inquire about the pen?

[Old 2.] 3. By whose inspiration Job described his struggles. ---We can nevertheless more truly think that the same blessed Job, who sustained the struggles of the spiritual fight, also narrated the deeds of his consummated victory. Nor ought it to move us that it is said in the same book, "Job said"; or, "Job bore these and those things." For it is the custom of sacred Scripture that they who write, so speak of themselves in it as if of others. Hence it is that Moses says: "Moses was a man most mild above all men who dwelt on the earth" (Num. 12:3). Hence John says: "That disciple whom Jesus loved" (John 19:26). Hence Luke says: "That two of the disciples walked in the way, Cleopas and another" (Luke 24:13); which other indeed, while he was so studiously silent, as some say, he showed to have been himself. The writers therefore of the sacred eloquence, because they are moved by the impulse of the Holy Spirit, so bring forth testimony about themselves in it as if about others. Therefore the Holy Spirit spoke about Moses through Moses; the Holy Spirit spoke about John through John. Paul also, because he would not speak from himself, insinuates saying: "Do you seek a proof of Christ who speaks in me?" (2 Cor. 13:3). Hence it is that the angel who is described to have appeared to Moses is mentioned now as an angel, now as the Lord: an angel indeed, on account of this, that he served by speaking outwardly; but he is called the Lord, because presiding inwardly he ministered the efficacy of speaking. When therefore the speaker is ruled from the interior, he is named both an angel through obedience, and the Lord through inspiration. Hence David says: "Attend, my people, to my law; incline your ear to the words of my mouth" (Psal. 77:1 [78:1]). For it is not the law of David, or the people of David, but assuming the person of Him from whom he spoke, he speaks by His authority, by whose inspiration he was filled. We see this daily done in the Church, if we look vigilantly. For the lector standing in the midst of the people cries out: "I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob" (Exod. 3:6). And that he himself is God, he truly does not say; nor yet through this that he says it, does he desert the rule of truth; because to Him to whom he exhibits ministry by reading, his dominion he pretends by voice. Therefore the writers of the sacred eloquence, because being filled with the Holy Spirit they are drawn above themselves, they become as if outside themselves; and so they bring forth sentences about themselves, as if about others. Whence also the blessed Job, breathed upon by the Holy Spirit, could write his own deeds, which were indeed the gifts of supernal aspiration, as if not his own: because those things which he spoke were of another, in that a man spoke the things which are of God; and in that he spoke as another the things which were his, in that the Holy Spirit spoke the things which are of man.

CHAPTER TWO [OLD 3].

4. Precepts given to man. ---But we ought now to postpone those things, and to hasten to consider the deeds of the sacred history. Every man by the very fact that he is a man, ought to understand his Creator; to whose will he should serve so much the more, as he weighs that he is nothing of himself; but behold, we have neglected to consider the God of our creation. Precepts have been applied, and we have also been unwilling to obey the precepts. Examples are added, and we also decline to imitate the examples, which we see to have been put forth for us by those set under the law. For because God spoke openly to certain ones set under the law, we look upon ourselves as if alien from those same precepts, to whom He did not speak these things specially. Whence for the confounding of our impudence, a Gentile man is brought forward for an example; so that because man, being set under the law, despises to obey the law, he may at least wake up by the comparison of him who lived legally without the law. Therefore the law was given to erring man; but to the erring man even under the law, the testimony of those who are outside the law is brought in, so that because we were unwilling to keep the order of our condition, we might be admonished by precepts; and because we contemned to obey the precepts, we might be confounded by examples; nor, as has been said, by the examples of those whom the law would bind, but whom no law would restrain from sin.

5. To the one contemning the precepts are added the examples of Job, a Gentile man. ---

Divine providence has circumscribed us, it has circumvented our excuse; the access of human tergiversation is closed on every side. A Gentile man, a man without the law, is brought to the midst, so that the depravity of those who are under the law may be confounded. Which is well and briefly shown by the prophet saying: "Be ashamed, O Sidon, says the sea" (Isa. 23:4). For in Sidon is figured the stability of those set in the law - but in the sea, the life of the Gentiles. Be ashamed therefore, Sidon, says the sea, because by the life of the Gentiles the life of those set under the law is reproved, and from the action of seculars the action of the religious is confounded: while those do not keep even by promising what they hear in the precepts; and these by living keep those things in which they are by no means bound by legal mandates [Old 4]. By what authority truly this book is endowed, the very solidity of the sacred pages witnesses, while it is said through Ezekiel the prophet (Ezek. 14:14), that three men only are delivered, Noah namely, Daniel and Job. Nor is it without merit that among the lives of the Hebrews, the life of a just Gentile is brought into the reverence of authority, because our Redeemer, just as He came for the redemption of Jews and Gentiles, so He willed to be prophesied by the voices of Jews and Gentiles; so that by both peoples He might be spoken of, who would suffer at some time for both peoples.

6. His virtue, that it might fragrance the more, was worn down by scourges. ---This man therefore, supported by the highest strengths, was known to himself and to God: who if he were not scourged, would by no means be recognized by us. For virtue indeed exercised itself through rest, but the opinion of virtue, being moved through scourges, fragranced. And he who being quiet in himself contained what he was, being moved, scattered the odor of his fortitude to the notice of all. For just as ointments do not know how to smell more widely unless moved, and just as spices do not expand their fragrance except when they are burned; so holy men in tribulations become known for all that they fragrance with virtues. Whence also it is rightly said in the Gospel: "If you shall have faith as a grain of mustard seed, you shall say to this mountain: Pass hence, and it shall pass" (Matth. 17:19 [17:20]). For unless a grain of mustard seed be ground, by no means is the force of its virtue recognized. For unground it is mild: but if it be ground, it grows hot, and what was lying hid most sharp in itself, it shows. So every holy man, when he is not beaten, is seen as despicable and mild: but if any grinding of persecution should oppress him, soon he shows everything that tastes hot; and whatever before seemed despicable and weak in him is turned into the fervor of virtue; and what he had willingly covered in himself through times of tranquility, being agitated by tribulations, he is forced to become known. Whence it is well said by the prophet: "In the day the Lord commanded His mercy, and in the night He declared it" (Ps. 41:9 [42:8]). For the mercy of the Lord is commanded in the day, because in a tranquil time it is perceived by knowing; but in the night it is declared, because the gift which is taken in tranquility is manifested in tribulations.

7. The virtues of Job are recounted. ---But it is to be more subtilely scrutinized why he bore so many scourges, who kept so great a custody of virtues without reproach. For he had humility, because he himself witnesses: "If I contemned to undergo judgment with my servant, and my handmaid, when they disputed against me" (Job 31:13). He exhibited hospitality, as he himself offers, saying: "The stranger did not remain without, my door was open to the traveler" (Job 31:32). He held the vigor of discipline, as he himself indicates saying: "The princes ceased to speak, and they put their finger upon their mouth" (Job 29:9). He kept gentleness in vigor, as he himself confesses, saying: "And when I sat as a king, with the army standing around, I was nevertheless the consoler of the mournful" (Ibid., 25). He embraced the largess of alms, as he himself insinuates saying: "If I ate my morsel alone, and the orphan did not eat of it" (Job 31:17). Since therefore he perfected all the mandates of virtues, one thing was lacking to him, that even being scourged he might know how to give thanks. It was known that he knew how to serve God among gifts: but it had been worthy that the strictness of severity should inquire whether he would remain devout to God even among scourges. For pain interrogates, if any one truly loves being quiet. Whom the enemy indeed sought that he might fail, but received that he might profit. The Lord benignly permitted to be done what the devil iniquitously asked. For when the enemy had sought him for this reason, that he might consume him, by tempting he acted so that he might increase his merits. For it is written: "In all these things Job did not sin with his lips" (Job 1:22). And indeed certain words of his responses resound harsh to unskilled readers, because they are ignorant of how to piously understand the sayings of the saints, as they are said; and because they do not know how to assume the mind of a suffering and just man in themselves, therefore they cannot well interpret the words of pain. For the condescension of passion knows well how to weigh the mind of the sufferer.

8. He is absolved from the criminations of the unskilled by the judgment of God. ---They believe therefore that the blessed Job failed in his speeches, looking less cautiously, because if the responses of the blessed Job are reproved, they witness that the sentence of the Lord about him was also false. For it is said to the devil by the Lord: "Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him on the earth: a man simple and upright and fearing God, and departing from evil?" (Ver. 8). To whom it is soon responded by the devil: "Doth Job fear God for naught? Hast thou not hedged him and all his family? But put forth thy hand, and touch him, if he will not bless thee to thy face" (Ver. 10). The enemy therefore exercised his strengths in the blessed Job, but nevertheless assumed the struggle against God. Between God therefore and the devil the blessed Job was in the middle as the matter of the struggle [Old 6]. Whoever therefore asserts that the holy man, set among scourges, sinned in his sayings, what else does he do, than reprove God, who had proposed for him, as having lost? He himself indeed willed to take the cause of the tempted in himself, who both preferred him before the scourges, and preferring him permitted him to be tempted through scourges. If therefore Job is said to have exceeded, his praiser is reported to have succumbed, although his gifts also witness that he by no means failed. For who knows not that not rewards, but punishments are due to faults? He therefore who deserved to receive double what he had lost, taught by the remuneration that all that he said was by no means vice but virtue. To this assertion is also added, that he himself intercedes for his delinquent friends. For anyone placed in grave sins (Cause 3, q. 7, c. In gravibus), while he is pressed by his own, does not dilute those of another. He is shown therefore to be clean of himself, who could obtain emendation for others. But if this displeases certain ones, that he himself narrated his good things, it is to be known that among so many losses of things, among so many wounds of the body, among so many funerals of children, to the friends coming for consolation, and breaking forth into increpation, he was compelled to despair of his life; and him whom so many detriments had afflicted, the contumelious words of the increpers struck besides. For these, who had come to console, while they as it were reproached his injustice, compelled him to despair of himself fundamentally. That he therefore recalls his good things to mind, he does not lift himself up through boasting; but as if collapsed among words and wounds, he reforms his mind to hope. For the mind is struck by a grave weapon of despair, when it is pressed by the tribulations of supernal wrath, and is urged from without by the reproaches of tongues. The blessed Job therefore, pierced by the javelin of so many pains, while he feared to be made to fail through reproaches, recalled himself to a state of confidence by confirming himself from his past life. By no means therefore did he fall into the vice of arrogance, because he fought against the internal impulse of despair through the external words of his praises; so that while he said the good things which he had done, he might by no means despair of the good which he had sought.

9. All the machinations of Satan erected against Job. ---But let us now follow the very order of his temptation. The raging enemy, and contending to subdue the most valiant breast of the holy man, erected all the machines of temptations against him; he took away his substance, he killed his sons, he struck his body, he instigated his wife, he brought friends for consolation; but he excited them into the sharpness of increpation: he also kept another friend more harshly increping, for the final and sharper invective, so that at least by striking more frequently he might touch the heart, which he would always reiterate with a new wound. For because he saw him powerful in the world, he believed him to be moved by the losses of substance, whom he beat not shaken from the death of his sons. But seeing that even from the wound of bereavement he grew to the increase of divine praise, he sought the health of the body to be struck. Looking also because through the pain of the body he could not arrive at the passion of the mind, he instigated the wife. For he saw the city, which he desired to storm, too much fortified; and therefore bringing in so many blows outwardly, he as it were moved the army without; but inflaming the mind of the wife in words of bad persuasion, he as it were corrupted the hearts of the citizens within. For from external wars we learn what we should feel about internal ones. For the raging enemy, and walling the city with circumfused armies, if he shall have seen its fortifications invincible, turns himself to other arguments of fighting, that he may also corrupt the hearts of certain citizens within; so that when he has moved the attackers from without, he may also have internal helpers, and with the struggle of war increasing without, the city destitute of their perfidy, in whose faith it is confided within, may be taken.

10. War without, he applied virulent counsels within. Therefore having as it were set up a ram without, he beat the wall of this city with as many strokes as the times he announced adverse things. Within truly he as it were corrupted the hearts of the citizens, while he studied to destroy the strong fortifications of this city by the persuasion of the spouse. Without therefore he moved the impetus of war, within the poisons of counsel: so that he might take the city so much more quickly, as he would disturb it outwardly and inwardly. [Old 8.] Because however words sometimes disturb more than wounds, he armed himself, as has been said, with the tongues of friends. Who indeed because they were seniors, it could perhaps be grieved less from their words. Elihu the younger is substituted, that he might strike the holy breast with so much more sharp a wound, as he would excite the strokes of a viler arm against it. Behold, for the striking of the most invincible strength the raging enemy, how many javelins of temptations he found; behold, how many machinations of sieges he placed around; behold, how many weapons of percussions he transmitted: but in all these the mind remained unterrified, the city stood unshaken.

CHAPTER FIVE.

11. The patience of Job in adverse things. --- Enemies, when they come against the face, study to transmit others from a hidden place, who might strike the side of the one fighting so much more licentiously, as he who fights looks more intently at the enemies coming against his face. [Rec. 5.] Therefore Job, caught in the war of this struggle, received losses, as if enemies against the face; he sustained the words of the consolers, as if enemies from the side: but in all these with the shield of his gravity turned around, he stood fortified everywhere, he vigilantly met the swords coming from every side: he silently despises the lost substance, he with equanimity grieves the flesh dead in his sons, he patiently tolerates the flesh struck in himself, he wisely teaches the flesh suggesting evil in his spouse. Above these things the friends leap forth into sharp correction; and coming for the sake of sedating the pain, they add the force of pain. All the machinations therefore of temptations are turned for the holy man into increases of virtues. For through wounds his patience is proved; but through words his wisdom is exercised. Everywhere he meets strongly, because he overcame both the scourges by strength, and the words by reason. His friends truly, who indeed come for consolation, but exceed even to words of increpation, are to be believed to have failed from ignorance rather than from malice. For it is not to be believed that so great a man had iniquitous friends: but while they are unable to discern the cause of the scourges, they slide into fault.

[Old 9.] 12. Various kinds of percussions. --- For there are diverse kinds of percussions. For there is one percussion by which the sinner is struck, that he may be punished without retractation; another, by which the sinner is struck, that he may be corrected; another, by which sometimes anyone is struck, not that he may correct past things, but lest he commit things to come; another by which one is mostly struck, through which neither past fault is corrected, nor future prohibited; but that, while unhoped-for health follows the percussion, the virtue of the savior being known may be more ardently loved; and when the innocent is worn down by the scourge, the sum of merits may be heaped up for him through patience. For sometimes the sinner is struck, that he may be punished without retractation, just as it is said to Judaea which is to perish: "I have struck thee with the blow of an enemy, with a cruel chastisement" (Jer. 30:14). And again: "Why criest thou to me over thy contrition? Thy pain is incurable" (Ibid., 15). Sometimes the sinner is struck, that he may be corrected, just as it is said to someone in the Gospel: "Behold thou art made whole, now sin no more, lest something worse happen to thee" (John 5:14). For the words of the savior indicate that preceding sins required the force of the pain had. Sometimes anyone is struck not for the diluting of a past fault, but for the avoiding of a future one; which the apostle Paul openly witnesses of himself, saying: "Lest the magnitude of revelations should extol me, there was given to me a sting of my flesh, an angel of Satan, to buffet me" (2 Cor. 12:7). For he who says not that it extolled, but lest it extol, openly indicates that by that percussion he is restricted from sin happening, but not that a fault which happened is purged. But sometimes anyone is struck neither for past nor for future iniquity; but that the potency of divine virtue alone may be shown from the amputated percussion. Whence when it was said to the Lord in the Gospel concerning the man born blind: "Did this man sin, or his parents, that he should be born blind?" (John 9:2); the Lord responded saying: "Neither has this man sinned, nor his parents; but that the works of God may be manifested" (Ibid. 3). In which manifestation what is done, unless that from the scourge the virtue of merits may be increased; and when no past iniquity is wiped away, great fortitude may be generated from patience. Whence the same blessed Job is preferred first by the voice of the judge, and afterwards is committed to the hand of the tempter: whom after the scourge while God remunerating addresses more familiarly, it is openly indicated how much he grew from the blow. The friends therefore of the blessed Job, while they know not how to distinguish the kinds of percussions, believed him struck for fault: and while they endeavor to assert God just in his percussion, they were compelled to reprobate the blessed Job for injustice; being ignorant indeed that he had been scourged for this reason, that for his scourge the praise of divine glory might grow, but not that he should emend through scourges sins which he had by no means committed. Whence also they return more quickly to pardon, because they sinned from ignorance rather than malice. Whose pride divine justice vehemently humiliates in this, that it by no means reforms them to its grace, except through him whom they had despised. For the very elated mind is beaten back, if it be subjected to him above whom it extolled itself.

CHAPTER SIX [OLD 10].

13. All the saints, as it were stars, illuminate the night of the present life. ---But it is pleasing among these to see the wonderful works of divine dispensation, how for the illuminating of the night of the present life each of the stars comes in its turns to the face of heaven, until in the end of the night the Redeemer of the human race, as the true morning star, arises. For the nocturnal space, while it is illustrated by the courses of departing and succeeding stars, is passed through with great beauty of heaven. That therefore the ray of the stars, brought forth in its time and changed in turn, might touch the darkness of our night, for the showing of innocence, came Abel; for the teaching of purity of action, came Enoch; for the insinuating of longanimity of hope and work, came Noah; for the manifesting of obedience, came Abraham; for the demonstrating of the chastity of conjugal life, came Isaac; for the insinuating of the tolerance of labor, came Jacob; for the repaying of the grace of good retribution for evil, came Joseph; for the showing of gentleness, came Moses; for the informing of confidence against adverse things, came Joshua; for the showing of patience among scourges, came Job. Behold how shining stars we see in heaven, that we may walk the journey of our night with unoffended foot of work. For as many just men as the divine dispensation exhibited to the notice of men, so many stars as it were it sent from heaven upon the darkness of sinners, until the true morning star should arise, who announcing to us the eternal morning, should radiate from divinity more clearly than the other stars.

14. All foretold Christ, especially Job. ---Whom all the elect while they go before by living well, promised both by things and by voices prophesying. For there was no just man, who existed not as His messenger through figure. For it was worthy that all should show in themselves the good, from whom also all should be good, and which they should know to profit all. Whence also without cessation that ought to have been promised which was both given to be perceived without estimation, and to be retained without end; so that all ages together might say what the end of the ages would exhibit in the common redemption. Whence also it was necessary that even the blessed Job, who brought forth so many mysteries of His incarnation, should signal by conversation Him whom he said by voice; and through those things which he bore, should show what He would suffer; and so much more truly should predict the sacraments of that passion, as he would prophesy these things not only by speaking, but also by suffering. [Old 11.] But because our Redeemer exhibited himself as one person with the holy Church, which He assumed; for of Him it is said, "Who is the head of us all" (Eph. 4:15); and of His Church it is written: "The body of Christ, which is the Church" (Colos. 1:24); whoever signifies Him in himself, now designates Him from the head, now from the body, so that he may hold not only the voice of the head, but also of the body. Whence also Isaiah the prophet expressing the words of the same Lord, says: "As a bridegroom he has set a miter upon me, and as a bride he has adorned me with ornament" (Isa. 61:10). Because therefore He himself is the bridegroom in the head, He himself is the bride in the body, it is necessary that when sometimes something is said of the head, gradually and suddenly it be also derived to the voice of the body; and again when something is said of the body, suddenly it be ascended to the voice of the head. [Old 12.] The blessed Job therefore insinuates a type of the Redeemer to come with His body; but his wife, who provokes him to cursing, designates the life of the carnal; who set within the holy Church with uncorrected manners, by how much through faith they are near to the good, by so much through life they press more hardly; because while as if faithful they cannot be avoided, they are tolerated by the faithful so much the worse, as also more inwardly.

15. Job's friends foreshadow heretics. ---But his friends, who while they counsel also rail, express the figure of heretics, who under the guise of counseling act the business of seducing. Whence also they speak to the blessed Job as if for the Lord, but yet are not approved by the Lord; because evidently all heretics, while they strive to defend God, offend Him. Whence it is openly said to them also by the same holy man: "I desire to dispute with God: first showing you to be fabricators of lies, and cultivators of perverse dogmas" (Job 13:3-4). It is clear therefore that they bear the type of heretics by erring, whom the holy man rebukes for serving the cult of perverse dogmas. [Rec. VII.] But every heretic, in that which he is seen to defend God, is opposed to His truth, as the Psalmist witnesses, who says: "That thou mayest destroy the enemy and the defender" (Psalm 8:3). For he is an enemy and a defender, who impugns God by that which he preaches.

CHAPTER VII.

16. By their names Job signifies Christ, his friends signify heretics. ---For because the blessed Job holds the species of the Redeemer to come, he demonstrates it even by his name. For Job is interpreted as "grieving." By which grief, doubtless, either the passion of the Mediator, or the labor of the holy Church is expressed, which is tortured by the manifold fatigue of the present life. His friends also by the word of their name indicate the merit of their action. For Eliphaz in the Latin language is called "contempt of the Lord." And what else do heretics do, except that, while they feel false things concerning God, they contemptuously despise Him by being proud? Bildad is interpreted as "old age alone." But well are all heretics, in those things which they speak concerning God, while they desire to be seen as preachers not with a right intention, but by the appetite for temporal glory, named "old age alone." For they are incited to speaking not by the zeal of the new man, but by the depravity of the old life. Zophar also in the Latin speech is called "dissipation of the watchtower," or "dissipating speculation." For the minds of the faithful raise themselves to contemplate supernal things; but while heretics desire to pervert those contemplating right things by their words, they strive to dissipate the watchtower. [Vet. XIII.] Thus in the three names of the friends of Job, three cases of perdition of heretical minds are expressed. For unless they contemned God, they would by no means feel perverse things concerning Him; and unless they drew the heart of old age, they would not err in the intelligence of the new life; and unless they destroyed the speculation of the good, supernal judgments would by no means reprove them with such a strict examination for the fault of their words. By contemning God, therefore, they retain themselves in old age: but by retaining themselves in old age, they harm the speculation of the right by their depraved speeches.

CHAPTER VIII.

17. In the reconciliation of Job's friends the conversion of heretics is figured. ---Because truly sometimes heretics, poured over with the largess of divine grace, return to the unity of the holy Church, this is well signaled by the reconciliation of the friends themselves. For whom nevertheless the blessed Job is commanded to pray, because the sacrifices of heretics cannot be accepted by God, unless they be offered for them by the hands of the universal Church; so that by its merits they may find the remedy of salvation, which they were striking by impugning with the darts of words. Whence also seven sacrifices are mentioned offered for them; because while they receive the Spirit of sevenfold grace by confessing, they are expiated as if by seven oblations. Hence it is that in the Apocalypse of John the universal Church is designated by the number of seven churches (Apoc. 1:11). Hence through Solomon it is said concerning Wisdom: "Wisdom has built herself a house, she has hewn out seven pillars" (Prov. 9:1). By that very number of sacrifices therefore the reconciled heretics express what they were before, who are not joined to the perfection of sevenfold grace except by returning.

18. Their pride is to be slain, so that they may be restored to the Church by this sacrifice. ---But well are they described as having offered bulls and rams for themselves. For in the bull the neck of pride is designated, but in the ram the leadership of following flocks. What is it therefore to slay bulls and rams for them, but to kill their proud leadership; so that they may feel humble things concerning themselves, and not seduce the hearts of the innocent after them? For with a swelling neck they had recoiled from the unity of the Church, and were drawing weak peoples after them as if following flocks. Let them come therefore to the blessed Job, that is, let them return to the Church, and by a sevenfold sacrifice offer bulls and rams to be slain; who, so that they may be joined to the universal Church, by intervening humility may kill whatever they before tasted as tumid concerning proud leadership.

CHAPTER IX.

19. The proud man, though feeling rightly, is to be rebuked. For which reason he does not need a sacrifice. ---But through Elihu, who speaks indeed with right senses, but is derived to foolish words of elation, the person of every arrogant man is expressed. For many set within the holy Church despise to bring forth rightly the right things which they taste. Whence also he is argued by the words of divine rebuke, yet a sacrifice is not offered for him; because he is indeed faithful, but yet arrogant: through the truth of belief he is within, but through the obstacle of his tumor he is not acceptable. Hence therefore rebuke refutes him, but sacrifice does not bring him back; because he is indeed in that faith in which he ought to be, but supernal justice rebuking him repels him for superfluous things. Whence also well is Elihu called in the Latin speech, "That one is my God," or "God the Lord." For arrogant men within the holy Church, although they flee God by living elatedly, nevertheless confess Him by truly believing. For what is it to say "That one is my God" by name, but to show Him in whom he has believed by an open profession? Or what is it to say "God the Lord," but to believe Him both God through divinity, and to hold Him Lord from the incarnation?

CHAPTER X.

[Vet. XIV.]

20. What Job receiving double things presignifies. Of the saints before the resurrection one beatitude; after, double. ---Well moreover after the losses of things, after the funerals of pledges, after the tortures of wounds, after the contests and battles of words, he is lifted up by a double remuneration; because doubtless the holy Church, while yet set in this life, for the labors which she sustains, receives double gifts; when, the Gentiles having been fully received, at the end of the world she also converts the hearts of the Jews to herself. For hence it is written: "Until the fullness of the Gentiles should enter in, and so all Israel should be saved" (Rom. 11:25). She will also receive double things afterwards: because the labor of the present time being finished, she ascends not only to the joy of souls, but also to the beatitude of bodies. Whence well is it said by the prophet: "In their own land they shall possess double things" (Isa. 61:7). For the saints in the land of the living possess double things, because doubtless they rejoice in the beatitude of mind and body together. Whence John in the Apocalypse, because before the resurrection of bodies he saw the souls of the saints crying out, beheld them to have received single robes, saying: "And single white robes were given to them, and it was said to them, that they should rest yet a little time, until the number of their fellow-servants and of their brethren should be fulfilled" (Apoc. 6:11).

For before the resurrection they are said to have received single robes, because they as yet enjoy only the beatitude of the mind. They are therefore to receive two, when with the perfect joy of souls, they shall also be clothed with the incorruption of bodies.

21. Affliction here is certain; how long it is to last, is uncertain. ---Rightly moreover a certain affliction of the blessed Job is spoken of, but the quantity of time in his affliction is kept silent; because the tribulation of the holy Church is seen in this life, but for how much time she is here to be worn down and deferred, is not known. Whence also by the mouth of Truth it is said: "It is not for you to know the times or the moments, which the Father has placed in his own power" (Acts 1:7). By this therefore, that the passion of the blessed Job is spoken of, we are taught what we have known by experiencing. But by this, that the quantity of time in the passion is kept silent, we are taught what we ought not to know.

We have protracted the words of the preface at length, so that we might speak as if briefly touching upon the whole. But because we have arrived at the beginning of speaking, by speaking for a long time, we ought first to fix the root of history, so that we may be able afterwards to satisfy the mind from the fruit of allegories.

The first part, COMPRISING FIVE BOOKS.

BOOK THE FIRST.

He explains the first verses of the first chapter of the book of Job, first in a historical, then in an allegorical, and lastly in a moral sense.

CHAPTER ONE.

VERSE 1.---There was a man in the land of Uz, by name Job. HISTORICAL SENSE.---1. Job is said to be good among the bad, which is the highest praise. ---For this reason it is said where the holy man dwelt, so that the merit of his virtue might be expressed. For who knows not that Uz is the land of the Gentiles? But Gentility stood bound by vices by so much as it was ignorant of the knowledge of its Creator. Let it be said therefore where he dwelt, so that this may profit to his praises, that he was good among the bad. For it is not greatly praiseworthy to be good with the good, but to be good with the bad. For as it is of heavier fault not to be good among the good; so it is of immense heraldry to have existed as good even among the bad. Hence it is that the same blessed Job witnesses to himself, saying: "I was a brother of dragons, and a companion of ostriches" (Job 30:29). Hence Peter extolled Lot with great praises, because he found him good among the reprobate, saying: "And he rescued the just Lot oppressed by the unjust conversation of the wicked. For by sight and by hearing he was just, dwelling among those who from day to day tortured the soul of the just man with iniquitous works" (2 Pet. 2:7-8). Who doubtless could not have been tortured, unless he both heard and saw the depraved works of his neighbors. And yet by sight and by hearing he is called just, because the life of the iniquitous touched the ears and eyes of the just man not by delighting, but by striking. Hence Paul says to his disciples: "In the midst of a depraved and perverse nation, among whom you shine like luminaries in the world" (Philip. 2:15). Hence it is said to the angel of the church of Pergamum: "I know where thou dwellest, where the seat of Satan is; and thou holdest my name, and hast not denied my faith" (Apoc. 2:13). Hence the holy Church is praised by the voice of the Bridegroom, when it is said to her in the Canticle of love: "As a lily among thorns, so is my beloved among the daughters" (Cant. 2:2). Well therefore is the blessed Job, the Gentile land being mentioned, described as having lived among the iniquitous; so that, according to the heraldry of the Bridegroom, a lily might be shown to have grown among thorns. Whence rightly it is soon added:

CHAPTER II.

SAME VERSE.---Simple and upright.

2. The simplicity and uprightness of Job. Both are necessary. ---For some are so simple, that they are ignorant of what is upright. But they desert the innocence of true simplicity by so much as they do not rise to the virtue of uprightness; because while they know not how to be cautious through uprightness, they can by no means persist as innocent through simplicity. Hence it is that Paul admonishes his disciples saying: "I will that you be wise in good, but simple in evil" (Rom. 16:19). Hence again he says: "Be not children in senses, but in malice be babes" (1 Cor. 14:20). Hence through Itself the Truth commands the disciples, saying: "Be prudent as serpents, and simple as doves" (Matt. 10:16). For He joined both necessarily in the admonition; so that both the cunning of the serpent might instruct the simplicity of the dove, and again the simplicity of the dove might temper the cunning of the serpent. Hence it is that the Holy Spirit manifested His presence to men, not in a dove only, but also in fire (Matt. 3:11, 16). For by the dove simplicity, but by the fire zeal is indicated. In the dove therefore, and in the fire it is shown (Acts 2:3): because whoever are full of Him, so serve the mildness of simplicity, that they are also kindled against the faults of delinquents by the zeal of uprightness. It follows:

CHAPTER III.

SAME VERSE.---Fearing God, and departing from evil.

3. What it is to fear God. Good things mixed with evil are reproved. ---To fear God is to pass over no good things which are to be done. Whence through Solomon it is said: "He who fears God, neglects nothing" (Eccles. 7:19). But because some so do certain good things, that nevertheless they are by no means suspended from certain evils, well after it is said "fearing God," he is also presented as "departing from evil." For it is written: "Decline from evil, and do good" (Psalm 36:27). For neither are good things acceptable to God, which before His eyes are stained by the admixture of evils. For hence it is said by Solomon: "He who shall have offended in one, shall lose many good things" (Eccles. 9:18). Hence James witnesses, saying: "Whoever shall have kept the whole law, but offends in one, is made guilty of all" (James 2:10). Hence Paul says: "A little leaven corrupts the whole lump" (1 Cor. 5:6). [Vet. III.] The blessed Job therefore, that it might be shown how clean he existed in good things, is skillfully indicated how alien he was from evil things.

4. Why the virtues of Job are described from the beginning. ---But the custom of narrators is wont to be, that when they suggest a contest of the gymnasium, they first describe the members of the wrestlers, how broad and strong the breast is, how healthy, how full the arms swell, how the belly placed beneath neither burdens with mass, nor debilitates with extenuation; so that when they have first shown limbs fit for the contest, then at last they may tell of the strokes of great fortitude. Because therefore our athlete was about to contend against the devil, as if before the spectacle of the arena, the writer of the sacred history, enumerating the spiritual virtues in this athlete, describes the members of the mind, saying: "That man was simple, and upright, and fearing God, and departing from evil," so that, while the position of the members is known to be great, from this very strong position the following victory also may be foreknown. It follows:

CHAPTER IV.

VERSE 2.---And there were born to him seven sons and three daughters.

5. The multitude of children did not entice him to avarice. ---Often the fecundity of offspring entices the heart of a parent to avarice. For he is kindled to the ambition of gathering an inheritance, by as much as he is made fruitful with many heirs. Therefore, that it might be shown how holy was the mind of blessed Job, he is both called just, and is presented as having been the father of much offspring. He who in the beginning of his book is asserted as devoted to offering sacrifices, is also remembered by himself afterwards as prompt in largesses. Let us consider therefore with how great fortitude he stood endowed, whom not even the affection for so many heirs inclined to the tenacity of an inheritance. It follows:

CAPITAL V [VET. IV].

VERSE 3.---And his possession was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels; and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she-asses, and a very great household.

6. He possessed wealth without love. ---We know that greater losses move the mind to greater grief. Therefore, that it might be shown of how great virtue he stood, that which he patiently lost is said to have been much. For it is never lost without grief, unless it is possessed without love. Therefore, while a great substance is described, and yet a little after is presented as patiently lost; it is certain that what he lost without grief, he possessed without love. It is also to be noted, that first the riches of the heart, and afterwards, the wealth of the body are described. For abundance of things is wont to loosen the mind from divine fear by so much the more, by how much more it requires the mind to think of diverse things. For while it is scattered through many things, it is prohibited from standing fixed in the innermost parts. Which Truth itself, when it explained the parable of the sower, indicated saying: "He who was sown among thorns, this is he who hears the word, and the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, chokes the word, and it is made without fruit" (Matth. 13:22; Luke 8:7, 8; Mark 4:7). Behold, blessed Job is both said to possess many things, and a little after is presented as instantly serving divine sacrifices.

7. He had already left all in his heart. ---Let us consider therefore of what holiness this man was, who for such sedulous obsequies to God, even thus occupied, found leisure. Not yet had the virtue of the precept shone forth, which should command all things to be left; but yet blessed Job already kept in his heart the force of the same precept; because doubtless he had left in his mind his substance, which he possessed without delight.

CHAPTER VI.

SAME VERSE.---And that man was great among all the people of the East.

8. With how great riches he abounded. --- Who is ignorant that the men of the East are very wealthy? Therefore he stood great among the people of the East, as if it were openly said: because he was even richer than the rich.

CHAPTER VII.

VERSE 4.---And his sons went and made a feast by houses, every one in his day: and sending they called their three sisters, to eat and drink with them.

9. The substance to be divided among the sons did not divide their hearts. ---Among brothers a greater substance is wont to be a cause of heavier discord. O inestimable praise of fatherly instruction! Both the father is said to be rich, and the sons are asserted as concordant. And while the substance to be divided among them was present, yet undivided charity filled the hearts of all.

[Vet. V, Rec. IV].

VERSE 5.---And when the days of their feasting were gone about, Job sent to them, and sanctified them, and rising up early offered holocausts for every one.

10. Scarcely any banquets are without fault, on account of pleasure and loquacity. ---When it is said, "he sent and sanctified them," it is openly demonstrated what strictness he used towards them when present, to whom when absent he was not wanting in solicitude. But this is to be carefully considered by us, that the days of the feast being finished, a purgation of holocaust is applied for each one. For the holy man knew that banquets could scarcely be celebrated without fault. He knew that the feasts of banquets are to be diluted with a great purgation of sacrifices; and whatever the feasting sons had defiled in themselves, the father wiped away by immolating a sacrifice. For there are some vices which can either scarcely be separated from banquets, or certainly by no means can. For pleasure almost always accompanies feasts. For while the body is dissolved in the delight of refreshment, the heart is relaxed to empty joy. Whence it is written: "The people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play" (Exod. 32:6).

11. Loquacity almost always follows feasts; and when the belly is refreshed, the tongue is unbridled. Whence rightly the rich man among the infernals is described as desiring water, saying: "Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame" (Luke 16:24). First he is said to have feasted sumptuously every day; and afterwards he is remembered to seek water for his tongue. For because, as we have said, loquacity is wont to overflow greatly during feasts, from the punishment He indicates the fault, since Him whom Truth had said had feasted sumptuously every day, He presented as burning more in his tongue. Those who tune the harmony of strings, dispense this with such great art, that for the most part, when one is touched, another string placed far away and with many lying between is shaken: and when that one renders a sound, the other, which is tuned in the same song, trembles, others being unstruck. So therefore in sacred Scripture for the most part it is dealt concerning virtues, so concerning vices; that while by speaking it suggests one thing, by being silent another thing may become known. [Vet. VI.] For nothing is mentioned against the rich man concerning loquacity; but while the punishment is said to be in the tongue, it is shown what was a heavier fault among others in the banquet.

12. Job offering sacrifice on the eighth day, honors the mystery of the resurrection. ---But when the seven brothers are described as making feasts through every day, and the days of the feast being finished, Job is presented as offering seven sacrifices; the history openly indicates that blessed Job, offering sacrifice on the eighth day, honors the mystery of the resurrection. For the day which is now called the Lord's day, is the third from the death of the Redeemer, but in the order of creation the eighth, which is also the first in creation. But because having revolved it follows the seventh, it is rightly numbered the eighth. Because therefore on the eighth day he is said to offer seven sacrifices, he is presented as having served the Lord for the hope of resurrection, being full of the Spirit of sevenfold grace. Whence also a psalm is prescribed for the octave, in which joy concerning the resurrection is announced [Vet. VII]. But because the sons of blessed Job had been girded with such great discipline of good instruction, that they failed neither by deeds in the banquets, nor by words, is openly shown, when it is added:

CHAPTER IX

[Rec. V].

SAME VERSE.---For he said: Lest perhaps my sons have sinned, and have blessed God in their hearts.

13. We must not judge rashly concerning the heart of another. Against the rectors of the faithful who are ignorant of their works. ---For he had taught them to be perfect in work and word, for whom the father feared concerning thought alone. But because we ought not to judge rashly concerning the hearts of others, we recognize in the words of this holy man, who says not: "Because they have blessed in their hearts:" but, "Lest perhaps they have blessed God in their hearts." Whence it is well said by Paul: "Judge not before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts" (1 Cor. 4:5). [Vet. VIII]. For whoever in thought turns aside from rectitude, sins in darkness. We therefore ought so much the less boldly to reprehend the hearts of others, by how much we know, that by our sight we cannot illuminate the darkness of another's thought. But here it is to be skillfully considered, with what great severity the father was able to correct the works of his sons, who with such great solicitude studied to cleanse their hearts. What do the rectors of the faithful say to these things, who are ignorant of even the open works of their disciples? What do they think in their own excuse, who in those committed to them care not even for the wounds of their actions? But that the perseverance also of this holy work might be demonstrated, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER X.

SAME VERSE.---Thus did Job all the days.

14. Job's perseverance. ---For it is written: "He who shall have persevered unto the end, he shall be saved" (Matth. 10:22; 24:13). In the sacrifice therefore holy action is shown, but in all the days of the sacrifice, the constancy of the holy action. These things we have briefly run through by following the history; now the order of the exposition requires that, repeating the beginning, we should now unfold the secrets of the allegories.

CHAPTER XI

[Vet. IX].

VERSE 1.---There was a man in the land of Uz, named Job.

15. ALLEGORICAL SENSE.---Christ designated by the name of Job. ---These things we believe were done through history, but let us now see how they are fulfilled through allegory. For Job, as we have said, is interpreted as "grieving": but Uz as "counselor." Whom therefore else does blessed Job express by his name, but Him of whom the prophet speaks saying: "He Himself hath borne our griefs" (Isaiah 53:4)? Who inhabits the land of Uz, because He reigns in the hearts of a counseling people. For Paul says that Christ is the power of God, and the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:24). And this Wisdom itself says through Solomon: "I wisdom dwell in counsel, and am present in learned thoughts" (Proverbs 8:12). Therefore Job inhabits the land of Uz, because Wisdom, which for us sustained the grief of the passion, made for itself a habitation in hearts devoted to the counsels of life.

[Vet. X].

SAME VERSE.---And that man was simple and upright.

16. He held simplicity and uprightness. ---In uprightness justice is signified, but in simplicity, meekness. For the most part we, when we follow the uprightness of justice, leave behind meekness; and when we desire to keep meekness, we turn aside from the uprightness of justice. But the incarnate Lord held simplicity with uprightness: because neither in meekness did He lose the strictness of justice, nor again in the strictness of justice the virtue of meekness. Whence when certain ones, an adulteress having been brought, wished to tempt Him, that He might fall into the fault either of unmeekness or of injustice, He responded to both saying: "He of you who is without sin, let him first cast a stone at her" (John 8:7). He gives the simplicity of meekness in "He of you who is without sin"; He gives the zeal of justice in "let him first cast a stone at her." Whence also the prophet says to Him: "Bend thy bow, proceed prosperously, and reign on account of truth and meekness and justice" (Psalm 44:5). For following truth, He preserved meekness with justice; so that He might neither lose the zeal of uprightness in the weight of meekness, nor again disturb the weight of meekness by the zeal of uprightness. It follows:

CHAPTER XIII.

SAME VERSE.---Fearing God, and departing from evil.

17. How He feared God. ---It is written concerning Him: "And the spirit of the fear of the Lord filled Him" (Isaiah 11:3). For the incarnate Lord showed in Himself all that He inspired in us; that what He said by precept, He might persuade by example. According therefore to the nature of humanity our Redeemer feared God; because that He might redeem proud man He assumed for him a humble mind. Of whom well through this, that Job is said to depart from evil, the action also is designated. For He Himself departed from evil, not that He touched it by doing, but that He reproved it by finding: because the old life of human conversation, which He found when born, He deserted; and the new, which He brought with Him, He impressed upon the manners of His followers.

CHAPTER XIV

[Rec. VI].

Vers. 2.---And there were born to him seven sons, and three daughters.

18. The number seven is perfect. ---What is understood by the number seven if not the sum of perfection? For, to say nothing of the reasons of human reason concerning the number seven, which assert that it is perfect because it consists of the first even and the first odd; of the first that can be divided and the first that cannot be divided; we know most certainly that holy Scripture is accustomed to put the number seven for perfection (Gen. 2:3). Whence also it asserts that on the seventh day the Lord rested from His works. Hence it is also that the seventh day was given for rest to men, that is, for the sabbath. Hence it is that the jubilee year, in which plenary rest is expressed, is consummated by seven weeks, which, with the monad added, is filled for our union.

[Vet. XII.] 19. Job's sons signify the apostles. ---There were born to him therefore seven sons. Namely, the apostles going forth manfully to preach. Who, while they fulfill the precepts of perfection, held, as it were, the fortitude of the superior sex in their conversation. For hence it is, that twelve were chosen to be filled with the Spirit of the perfection of sevenfold grace. For from the number seven one rises to the number twelve. For seven, multiplied by its own parts into itself, is extended to twelve. For whether four be led by three, or three by four, seven are turned into twelve. Whence the holy apostles, because they were sent to preach the holy Trinity in the four parts of the world, twelve were chosen; that they might show even by number the perfection which they preached by life and voice.

20. The daughters are the multitudes of the faithful. Three orders of the faithful. ---And there were born also three daughters. What do we understand by the daughters, if not the weaker multitudes of the faithful, who, although they by no means remain with strong virtue for the perfection of work, nevertheless constantly hold the known faith of the Trinity? In the seven sons therefore the order of preachers is signified, but in the three daughters the multitude of hearers. The three orders of the faithful can also be designated by the three daughters. For after the sons the daughters are named, because after the fortitude of the apostles was seen, three distinctions of the faithful followed in the conversation of the Church: namely, of pastors, and of the continent, and of the married. [Vet. XIII.] Whence also the prophet Ezekiel asserts that he heard of three delivered men, namely, Noah, and Daniel, and Job (Ezek. 14). For what is signified by Noah, who guided the ark in the waves, if not the order of those in authority; who, while they preside over the peoples as a form of life, guide the holy Church in the floods of temptations? What is figured by the life of the continent by Daniel, whose wondrous abstinence is written, if not those who, while they desert all things that are of the world, rule with a high mind over despised Babylonia? What is signified by Job if not the life of good spouses; who, while they do pious works from the things of the world which they possess, tend as it were through the way of the earth to the heavenly country? Because therefore after the holy apostles these three distinctions of the faithful followed, rightly after the sons, three daughters are mentioned as born. It follows:

CHAPTER XV.

VERS. 3.---And his possession was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels.

21. The innocent are shaded by the sheep, the vitious Gentiles and Samaritans by the camels. ---Because the faithful hearers are collected from various ways of life, that which is first said universally, by mentioning the daughters, is afterwards subjoined distinctly by the naming of the animals. For what does he express in the seven thousand sheep, if not the perfect innocence of some, which comes to the perfection of grace from the pastures of the law? But what is designated in the three thousand camels, if not the twisted viciousness of the Gentiles coming to the fullness of faith? [Vet. XIV.] In holy Scripture, moreover, sometimes the Lord Himself is expressed by the name of the camel, and sometimes the Gentile people. For by the name of the camel the Lord is designated, as is said by the same Lord to the opposing Jews: "Straining at a gnat, and swallowing a camel" (Matth. 23:24). For the gnat wounds by whispering, but the camel of its own accord inclines itself to receive burdens. The Jews strained at the gnat, because they asked for the seditious robber to be released; but they swallowed the camel, because they strove by crying out to extinguish Him who had of His own accord descended to receive the burdens of our mortality. Again, by the name of the camel Gentility is designated. Whence also Rebecca, coming to Isaac (Gen. 24:61), is led on the back of a camel; because the Church, hastening to Christ from Gentility, is found in the twisted and vitious conversations of the old life. Who, seeing Isaac, descended; because the Gentiles, having known the Lord, deserted their vices, and from the elation of loftiness sought the depths of humility. Who also, having been ashamed, is veiled with a mantle, because she is confounded before Him for her past life. Whence also it is said by the Apostle to the same nations: "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed?" (Rom. 6:21.) Because therefore by the sheep we understand the Hebrews coming to the faith from the pastures of the law, nothing hinders us from sensing by the camels the peoples of the Gentiles, twisted in manners, and burdened with the worship of idols. For because from themselves they found for themselves gods whom they might worship, as if from themselves a burden had grown on their back, which they might carry.

[Vet. XV.] 22. It can also be signified by the camels, because they are common animals, the life of the Samaritans. For camels chew the cud, but by no means divide the hoof. The Samaritans also as it were chew the cud, because they receive the words from a part of the law; and as it were do not divide the hoof, because they despise it in part. Who also tolerate a heavy burden on the back of the mind, because in everything they do, they labor without hope of eternity. For they know not the faith of the resurrection. And what can be heavier and more burdensome than to endure the affliction of the passing world, and by no means to hope for the joys of remuneration for the relief of the mind? But because the Lord, appearing in the flesh, both filled the peoples of the Hebrews with the grace of perfection, and led some of the Samaritans to the knowledge of the faith by showing wondrous works; let it be said rightly of the shadow which would express the truth, that he possessed both seven thousand sheep and three thousand camels. It follows:

CHAPTER XVI.

IBID.---Five hundred yokes of oxen, and five hundred she-asses.

23. What is designated by the name of oxen. What by the name of asses. ---It has already been said above, that in the number fifty, which is filled by seven weeks and a monad added, rest is designated; but by the number ten the sum of perfection is expressed. Because, moreover, perfection of rest is promised to the faithful, as it were by the number fifty led ten times, one arrives at five hundred. [Vet. XVI.] In holy Scripture, moreover, by the name of oxen sometimes the dullness of fools, sometimes the life of those who work well is signified. For because by the name of the ox the madness of the foolish is figured, it is rightly said by Solomon: "And straightway he followeth her as an ox led to the slaughter" (Prov. 7:22). Again, because by the name of oxen the life of each worker is expressed, the precepts of the law bear witness, which He commanded by Moses, saying: "Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn" (Deut. 25:4). Which is openly said again: "The laborer is worthy of his hire" (Luke 10:7). By the name of asses also sometimes the sluggishness of fools, sometimes the immoderate luxury of the petulant, sometimes the simplicity of the Gentiles is designated. The sluggishness of fools is figured by the appellation of asses, as is said by Moses: "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together" (Deut. 22:10). As if he were to say: Do not associate the foolish with the wise in preaching, lest by him who is not able to fulfill the thing, thou shouldst hinder him who is able. The immoderate luxury of the petulant is also expressed by the appellation of asses, as the prophet witnesses, who says: "Whose flesh is as the flesh of asses" (Ezek. 23:20). Again, by the name of asses, the simplicity of Gentility is shown. Whence the Lord, hastening to Jerusalem, is related to have sat upon a young ass (Matth. 21:5). For what is it to come to Jerusalem by sitting upon an ass, if not, by possessing the simple hearts of Gentility, to lead them to the vision of peace by ruling and presiding? Which is shown by one and easy testimony: because both by the oxen the workers of Judea, and by the ass the Gentile peoples are designated, when it is said by the prophet: "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib" (Isai. 1:3). For who was the ox, if not the Jewish people, whose neck the yoke of the law wore away? And who was the ass, if not Gentility, whom any seducer found like a brute animal, and resisting by no reason, prostrated in whatever error he willed? The ox therefore knew his owner, and the ass his master's crib, because both the Hebrew people found God, whom they worshipped but knew not; and Gentility received the food of the law, which it had not. That therefore which is said of the sheep and camels named above, this is repeated below in the oxen and asses.

24. The preachers of the Jews were oxen pressed by the yoke of the law. ---Judea had indeed even before the advent of the Redeemer oxen, because it sent forth workers to preach, to whom the voice of Truth says: "Woe unto you, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves" (Matth. 23:15). Whom the heavy yoke of the law had pressed, because they tolerated the exterior mandates of the letter. To whom the voice of Truth says: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart" (Matth. 11:28, 29). That therefore in the Gospel rest is promised to those who labor well, this is what is mentioned here by the five hundred yokes of oxen: because they who subject their necks to the dominion of the Redeemer, whither do they tend, if not to rest? [Vet. XVII.] Whence also five hundred she-asses are mentioned; because the called multitudes of the Gentiles, while they desire to arrive at rest, willingly carry all the burdens of the mandates. Whence well, that the Gentile people would seek this rest, Jacob, addressing his sons, strove to signify this by a prophetic voice, saying: "Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between the borders; and he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was excellent; and he bowed his shoulder to bear" (Gen. 49:14, 15). For to couch down between the borders is to rest waiting for the end of the world, and to seek nothing of these things which now pass in the midst, but to desire the last things. And the strong ass sees the rest and the excellent land, when simple Gentility for this reason raises itself to the strength of good work, because it tends to the country of eternal life. Which bows its shoulder to bear; because having seen the supernal rest, it subjects itself in operation even to heavy precepts, and whatever pusillanimity asserts to be intolerable, the hope of remuneration shows this to be light and easy to it. Because therefore for the part of the elect Judea and Gentility are collected to eternal rest, rightly five hundred yokes of oxen and five hundred she-asses are mentioned as being possessed. It follows:

CHAPTER XVIII

[Vet. XVIII].

IBID.---And a very great household.

25. The fools of the world were called before the wise. ---What is it, that the multitude of animals is described first, and the household is mentioned at the end: if not that the foolish things of the world were first collected to the knowledge of the faith, that afterwards its astute things also might be called, as Paul witnesses, who says: "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise" (1 Cor. 1:26, 27)? For the very beginnings of the holy Church are related to have been ignorant of letters, that namely, the Redeemer might show in all His preachers that not speech, but the cause, would persuade the believing peoples to life. It follows:

[Vet. XIX].

IBID.---This man was great among all the men of the East.

26. Christ similar to others in humanity, singular in divinity.

---That our Redeemer is called the East (Oriens), is related by the prophet witnessing, who says: "Behold the man whose name is the East" (Zech. 6:12). All therefore, who consist in faith in this East, are rightly called men of the East (Orientales). But because all men are only men, but the East Himself is God and man, it is rightly said: "He was great among all the men of the East." As if it were openly said: He surpasses all who are born to God in faith; because not adoption, as in the others, but nature exalts Him in divinity, who although He appeared similar to the others in humanity, yet in divinity He remained singular above all things.

CHAPTER XIX

[Rec. VII, Vet. XX].

Vers. 4.---And his sons went, and made feasts in their houses.

27. In the sons of Job celebrating feasts preachers are to be understood. ---The sons went to make feasts in their houses, when the apostle preachers, in diverse regions of the world, ministered the banquets of virtues to the hearers, as if to those who eat. Whence also it is said to the same sons concerning the hungry multitudes: "Give ye them to eat" (Matth. 14:17; 15:32; Mark 6:37; Luke 9:13). And again: "I will not send them away fasting, lest they faint in the way." That is, in your preaching let them receive the word of consolation, lest, remaining fasting from the food of truth, they succumb in the labor of this life. Hence again it is said to the same sons: "Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that which endureth unto eternal life" (John 6:27). How these feasts were exhibited, is added, when it is immediately subjoined:

CHAPTER XX.

IBID.---Every one in his day.

28. The hearers are to be fed according to the measure of intelligence. ---If the obscurity of ignorance is without doubt the night of the heart, understanding is not undeservedly called day. Whence also it is said by Paul: "One man judgeth one day above another, another judgeth every day alike" (Rom. 14:5). As if he should say openly: One understands some things while others are omitted, but another knows all things possible to be understood just as they are to be seen. Every son therefore exhibits a feast in his day, because every holy preacher, according to the measure of illuminated intelligence, feeds the minds of the hearers with the banquets of truth. In his day Paul had made a feast, when he said: "They will be happier if they so remain according to my counsel" (1 Cor. 7:40). He admonished each one to think concerning his own day, when he said:

"Let every man abound in his own sense" (Rom. 14:5). It follows:

CHAPTER XXI.

IBID.---And sending they called their three sisters, that they might eat and drink with them.

29. These are signified by the daughters of Job. Holy Scripture is sometimes food, sometimes drink. ---The sons call the sisters to the feast: because the holy apostles preach the joys of supernal refreshment to the weak hearers, and feed their minds with the banquets of divine speech, because they see them fasting from the food of truth. [Vet. XXI.] Moreover it is well said: "That they might eat and drink with them." For holy Scripture is sometimes food to us, sometimes drink. It is food in the more obscure places, because it is as it were broken by exposition, and swallowed by chewing. But it is drink in the more open places, because it is so absorbed just as it is found. The prophet saw holy Scripture as food, which would be broken by exposition, when he said: "The young children asked for bread, and there was no man who would break it for them" (Lam. 4:4): that is, all the weak asked for the stronger sentences of holy Scripture to be diminished by exposition; but he who ought to expose it is not able to be found. The prophet saw holy Scripture as drink, when he said: "Everyone that thirsteth come ye to the waters" (Isai. 55:1). If the open mandates were not drink, Truth would not cry out by Himself: "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink" (John 7:37). The prophet saw that food and drink had been lacking to Judea, when he said: "Her nobles have perished with hunger, and her multitude was dried up with thirst" (Isai. 5:13). For it is of a few to know strong and hidden things; but of many, to sense the open things of history. And therefore he asserts that the nobles of Judea perished not with thirst, but with hunger; because they who seemed to preside, while they had given themselves totally to exterior intelligence, had not that which they might eat by discussing from the internal things. Because moreover by the more sublime falling from the internal understanding, the intelligence of the little ones is dried up even in the exterior things, it is rightly added there: "Her multitude was dried up with thirst." As if he should say openly: while the common people desert the study of their life, now they seek not even the floods of history. And they witness that they have understood both the hidden and open mandates of the sacred speech, who, complaining to the reproving judge, say: "We have eaten and drunk in thy presence" (Luke 13:26). Which they subjoin openly by exposing: "And thou hast taught in our streets" (Ibid.). Because therefore the sacred speeches are broken in more obscure places by exposing, but in more open places are drunk just as they were found, let it be said rightly: "Sending they called their three sisters, that they might eat and drink with them." As if it were openly said: they led each of the weak by mild persuasion to themselves, in order that they might both feed their minds by discussing great things through contemplation, and nourish them by delivering small things through history. It follows:

CHAPTER XXII

VERS. 5.---And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them: and rising up early in the morning, he offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all.

30. Christ cleanses the hearts of His preachers. ---The days of feasting go about, when the ministries of preachings are performed. And the feasts being performed, Job offered a burnt offering (holocaustum) for his sons; because for the apostles returning from preaching, the Redeemer prayed to the Father. Moreover he is well said to sanctify by sending; because while He gives the Holy Spirit, who proceeds from Himself, to the hearts of the disciples, He cleansed whatever of fault could be in them. And he is rightly related to rise early in the morning (diluculo) to offer burnt offerings; because through this, that He offered for us the petition of His intercession, the night of error being discussed, He illuminated the darkness of the human mind; lest by any contagion of sin, from the grace of preaching itself, the mind be polluted in secret; lest it attribute to itself what it does; lest by attributing to itself what it was doing, it should lose it. Whence it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIII

JOB 1:5. --- For he said: Lest perhaps my sons have sinned, and have blessed God in their hearts.

31. How the stains contracted by preachers are to be washed away. ---To bless God, that is, to curse Him, is to take glory to oneself from His gift. Whence rightly, after the preaching, the Lord washed the feet of the holy Apostles (John 13:5); that He might plainly show, namely, that for the most part, even in a good work, the dust of sin is contracted, and hence the tracks of the speakers are defiled, from which the hearts of the hearers are cleansed. For often many, while they speak words of exhortation, however slightly, extol themselves inwardly, because through them the grace of purification is derived; and while they wash away the works of others by the word, they take up as it were the dust of evil thought from a good journey. What then was it to wash the feet of the disciples after preaching, but to wipe away the dust of thoughts after the glory of preaching, and to cleanse the steps of the heart from internal elation? Nor does that which is said, "Lest perhaps," stand in the way of the Mediator's absolute knowledge. For knowing all things, but in His speech taking upon Him our ignorance, and while He takes it teaching us, He sometimes speaks as if from our doubt, as He says: "When the Son of man comes, think you, shall He find faith on earth?" (Luke 18:8). The feasts therefore being finished, Job offering sacrifice for his sons said: "Lest perhaps my sons have sinned, and have blessed God in their hearts"; because our Redeemer, after He has washed His preachers from the evils assailing them, also defends them from temptations even among the good things they had done. It follows:

CHAPTER XXIV

JOB 1:5. --- Thus did Job all days.

32. The burnt offering continually offered by Christ for us. All days Job ceases not to offer sacrifice; because without intermission the Redeemer immolates a burnt offering (holocaustum) for us, who without ceasing demonstrates His incarnation to the Father for us. For His very incarnation is the offering of our cleansing; and when He shows Himself as man, He washes away the sins of man by intervening. And by the mystery of His humanity He immolates a perennial sacrifice, because these also are eternal things which He cleanses.

33. What has been treated so far concerning the historical and allegorical sense, and what is to be followed next concerning the moral sense. ---Therefore, because in the very beginning of the exposition we said that the person of blessed Job announced the Lord in such a way, that we said the head and the body, that is, Christ and the Church, were designated by him; after we have shown how our head is believed to have been designated, let us now indicate how His body, which we are, is expressed; so that because we have heard from the history what we may wonder at, and have known from the head what we may believe; let us now consider from the body what we may hold by living. For in ourselves we ought to transform what we read; so that when the mind excites itself by hearing, the life may concur to work what it shall have heard.

CHAPTER XXV

JOB 1:1. --- There was a man in the land of Uz (Hus), whose name was Job.

34. THE MORAL SENSE. --- Job signifies the elect. What is their affection concerning earthly and eternal things. ---If Job is called grieving (dolens), and Hus a counselor (consiliator), not undeservedly by both names is each of the elect figured; because undoubtedly he inhabits a counselor mind, who, grieving for present things, hastens to eternal ones. For there are some who neglect their life; and while they seek transitory things, while they either do not understand eternal things, or despise those understood, they neither feel grief, nor know how to have counsel. And since they do not consider the heavenly things which they have lost, they think themselves, alas, wretches! to be in good things. For they by no means lift up the eyes of their mind to the light of truth, for which they were created; they by no means stretch the edge of their desire to the contemplation of the eternal homeland: but deserting themselves in these things to which they are cast out, they love the exile which they suffer instead of the homeland, and in the blindness which they tolerate, they exult as if in the clarity of light. But on the contrary, the minds of the elect, while they see that all transitory things are nothing, inquire for what they were created; and since nothing outside of God suffices for their satisfaction, their thought, fatigued by the very exercise of inquiry, rests in the hope and contemplation of its Creator, and desires to be interspread among the heavenly citizens; and each of them, still placed in the body in the world, already rises in mind outside the world, deplores the misery of exile which he tolerates, and excites himself by incessant stings of love to the sublime homeland. When therefore, grieving, he sees how eternal is that which he lost, he finds the wholesome counsel to despise this temporal thing through which he runs; and the more the science of counsel grows, so as to desert things that will perish, the more grief is increased, because he does not yet reach those that remain. Whence it is well said by Solomon: "He that adds science, adds grief" (Eccles. 1:18). For he who already knows the highest things which he does not yet have, grieves more for the lowest things in which he is retained.

35. They dwell in the land of Uz, that is, in counsel. ---Rightly therefore Job is said to dwell in the land of Uz, because the grieving mind of each one of the elect is held in the counsel of science. It is also to be observed how no grief of mind is in an action of precipitation. For they who live without counsels, who desert themselves headlong to the events of things, are in the meantime fatigued by no grief of thoughts.

For he who skillfully fixes his mind in the counsel of life, cautiously considers himself by looking around in every action; and lest a sudden and adverse end should steal upon him from the thing which is done, he first feels this with the foot of thought softly placed; he weighs lest fear should hinder from these things which are to be done; lest precipitation should impel in those which are to be deferred; lest evil things should overcome through concupiscence in open war; lest right things should supplant by lying in wait through vain glory. Job therefore dwells in the land of Uz, while the mind of the elect, the more it strives to live by counsel, the more it is fatigued by the grief of the narrow way. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVI

JOB 1:1. --- Simple and upright, fearing God, and departing from evil.

36. The simplicity and uprightness of the just. Whoever desires the eternal homeland, lives without doubt simple and upright: simple, namely, in work, upright in faith; simple in the good things which he performs below, upright in the highest things which he feels in his inmost heart. For there are some who in the good things which they do are not simple, while they seek in these not retribution within, but favor without. Whence it is well said by a certain wise man: "Woe to the sinner that enters the earth by two ways" (Ecclus. 2:14). For a sinner enters the earth by two ways, when both that which he exhibits in work is God's, and that which he seeks through thought is the world's.

37. It begins from fear, it is consummated in charity. Moreover it is well said: "Fearing God, and departing from evil"; because the holy Church of the elect begins the ways of her simplicity and uprightness by fear, but consummates them by charity. To whom it is then fundamentally to depart from evil, when from the love of God she has already begun to be unwilling to sin. But when she still does good things from fear, she has not entirely departed from evil; because by that very thing she sins, by which she would wish to sin, if she could have done so with impunity. Rightly therefore when Job is said to fear God, he is also related to depart from evil; because while charity follows fear, those things which are left in the mind, the fault is also trodden down by the purpose of thought. And because from fear every vice is pressed down, but from charity virtues arise, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXVII

JOB 1:2. --- And there were born to him seven sons and three daughters.

38. The seven sons of Job signify as many gifts of the Holy Spirit; the three daughters, hope, faith, and charity. Seven sons are indeed born to us, when through the conception of good thought, the seven virtues of the Holy Spirit arise in us. For the prophet enumerates this internal offspring, when the Spirit makes the mind fruitful, saying: "The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and fortitude, the spirit of science and piety, and the spirit of the fear of the Lord shall fill him" (Isa. 11:2). When therefore, through the coming of the Holy Spirit, wisdom, understanding, counsel, fortitude, science, piety, and the fear of the Lord are born to each of us, a remaining posterity as it were is propagated in the mind, which preserves the genus of our heavenly nobility so much longer unto life, by how much it associates it with the love of eternity. But the seven sons have in us three sisters without doubt, because whatever manly thing these senses of the virtues do, they join to hope, faith, and charity. Nor do the seven sons reach to the perfection of the denary number (ten), unless all that they do be in faith, hope, and charity. But because a manifold thought of good works follows this abundance of preceding virtues, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXVIII

JOB 1:3. --- And his possession was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels.

39. He possesses sheep, who feeds an innocent mind within with truth. The truth of the history being preserved, we can spiritually imitate what we hear carnally. For we possess seven thousand sheep, when we feed innocent thoughts, with perfect purity of heart, within ourselves, with the food of truth sought out.

40. He possesses camels, who subjects what is high and crooked in himself either to faith, or bends it for charity. ---And there will be in our possession also three thousand camels, if all that is high and crooked in us is subjected to the reason of faith, and under the knowledge of the Trinity, is spontaneously inclined in the desire of humility. For we possess camels, if we humbly lay down what we think high. We undoubtedly possess camels, when we bend our thoughts to the compassion of fraternal infirmity, so that, bearing our burdens in turn, we may know how to sympathize with another's infirmity by condescending. By camels also, which by no means divide the hoof, but yet chew the cud, the good dispensations of earthly things can be understood: which, because they have something of the world, and something of God, must necessarily be designated by a common animal. For an earthly dispensation, although it may serve eternal utility, cannot be exhibited without perturbation of mind. Because therefore through this the mind is both confounded for the present, and a reward is prepared for eternity, as it were a common animal, it has both something from the law, and something it has not. For it does not divide the hoof, because the soul does not entirely disjoin itself from every earthly work; but yet it chews the cud, because by well-dispensing temporal things, through the confidence of certainty it hopes for heavenly things. Earthly dispensations, therefore, after the manner of camels, agree with the law in the head, and disagree in the foot; because both those things are of heaven which those living justly desire, and those things are of this world in which they are occupied in work. We, therefore, when we subject the same earthly dispensations to the knowledge of the Trinity, possess as it were camels by faith. It follows:

CHAPTER XXIX

JOB 1:3. --- Five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she-asses.

41. Yoke of oxen are concordant virtues. She-asses are wanton motions or simple thoughts. Yoke of oxen are for the use of our possession, when concordant virtues plow the hardness of the mind. We also possess five hundred she-asses, when we restrain wanton motions; and whatever of carnal desires to arise in us, we bridle by the spiritual dominion of the heart. Or certainly to possess she-asses, is to rule simple thoughts within us: which while they are not able to run in a more subtle understanding, by how much they walk as it were more slowly, by so much they carry fraternal burdens more mildly. For there are some who, while they do not understand high things, press themselves more humbly to the exterior works of conversation. Well therefore by she-asses, a slow animal indeed, but yet given to carrying burdens, do we receive simple thoughts; because while we for the most part acknowledge our ignorance, we more lightly tolerate another's burdens. And since the height of singular wisdom does not elevate us, as it were, to the perishing of another's heart's inertness, our mind inclines itself equanimously. Moreover, whether yoke of oxen or five hundred she-asses are related; because either in this, that we wisely know, or in this, that we humbly are ignorant, while we seek the rest of eternal peace, we are held as it were within the number of the jubilee. It follows:

CHAPTER XXX

JOB 1:3. --- And a very great household.

42. A great household is a multitude of thoughts to be restrained. We possess a very great household, when we restrain innumerable thoughts under the dominion of the mind; lest by their very multitude they should overcome the soul, lest by a perverse order they should trample upon the principality of our discretion. And well is the crowd of thoughts signified by the appellation of a great household. For we know that, the mistress being absent, the tongues of the maidservants make a noise, they desert silence, they neglect the duties of the assigned work, and they confound for themselves the whole order of living. But if the mistress suddenly comes, soon the noisy tongues are silent, they return to the duties of each work; and so they revert to their own work as if they had not departed. If therefore reason departs from the house of the mind to a monument (memorial/distraction), as it were the mistress being absent, the clamor of thoughts multiplies itself like a garrulous crowd of maidservants. But when reason has returned to the mind, soon the tumultuous confusion restrains itself; and as it were the maidservants silently repress themselves to the enjoined work, while thoughts immediately subject themselves to their own causes for utility. We possess therefore a great household, when by right law we dominate innumerable thoughts by the discretion of reason. Which undoubtedly when we do skillfully, we endeavor to be joined through the same discretion to the angels. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXI

JOB 1:3. --- And this man was great among all the Orientals.

43. By the refraining of these we are made great. For then we are made great among all the Orientals, when, the cloud of carnal corruption being pressed down, we are associated, as far as possibility allows, by the rays of our discretion, with those spirits who adhere to the rising (orienti) light. Whence also it is said by Paul: "Our conversation is in heaven" (Philip. 3:20). Whoever follows temporal and defective things, seeks the setting (occasum); but whoever desires heavenly things, demonstrates that he dwells in the East (Oriente). He therefore is made great, not among the Occidentals, but among the Orientals, who strives to profit, not among the actions of the evil seeking lowest and fugitive things, but among the choirs of the heavenly citizens. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXII

JOB 1:4. --- And his sons went, and made a feast by houses, every one in his day.

44. Individual virtues make a feast in their own day. The sons make a feast by houses, while individual virtues feed the mind according to their own mode. And it is well said: "Every one in his day." For the day of each son is the illumination of each virtue. For that I may briefly repeat these same gifts of sevenfold grace, wisdom has one day, understanding another, counsel another, fortitude another, science another, piety another, fear another. For it is not the same to have wisdom (sapere) as to understand (intelligere); because many indeed have wisdom concerning eternal things, but these they can by no means understand. Wisdom, therefore, in its own day makes a feast, because it refreshes the mind from the hope and certainty of eternal things. Understanding prepares a feast in its own day; because in that which it penetrates things heard, by refreshing the heart, it illuminates its darkness. Counsel exhibits a feast in its own day; because while it prohibits being headlong, it fills the soul with reason. Fortitude makes a feast in its own day; because while it does not fear adverse things, it places the foods of confidence before the trembling mind. Science prepares a feast in its own day, because in the belly of the mind it overcomes the fast of ignorance. Piety exhibits a feast in its own day, because it fills the bowels of the heart with works of mercy. Fear makes a feast in its own day; because while it presses down the mind, lest it should be proud of present things, it comforts it with the food of hope concerning future ones.

45. If they are separated from each other, they fail. But I see that in this feast of the sons it is to be scrutinized, that they feed each other in turn. For very much is each individual virtue destitute, if one virtue does not support the other. For wisdom is less, if it lacks understanding; and understanding is very useless, if it does not subsist from wisdom; because when it penetrates higher things without the weight of wisdom, its own levity lifts it up to fall more heavily. Vile is the counsel to which the strength of fortitude is wanting; because what it finds by treating, lacking strength, it does not lead through to the perfection of the work: and fortitude is very much destroyed, unless it be supported by counsel; because the more it sees itself to be able, the more virtue without the moderation of reason rushes headlong more miserably. Science is nothing, if it has not the utility of piety; because while it neglects to follow out the good things known, it binds itself more tightly to judgment. And piety is very useless, if it lacks the discretion of science; because while no science illuminates it, it is ignorant how it should have mercy. Fear also itself, unless it shall have had these virtues also, rises undoubtedly to no work of good action; because while it trembles at all things, it is vacant and torpid from all good things by its very dread. Because therefore by an alternate ministry virtue is refreshed by virtue, it is rightly said that the sons feast together in turn. And when one by supporting supports another, as it were through their days a numerous offspring prepares a feast to be fed. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIII

IBID. --- And sending they called their three sisters, to eat and to drink with them.

46. To the feast of the virtues, hope, faith, and charity are to be invited. When our virtues in all that they do, stir up hope, faith, and charity, as it were the worker sons call the three sisters to the feast, so that faith, hope, and charity may rejoice in the good work which each individual virtue administers. Which receive strength as it were from food, while they become more confident by good works; and while after food they desire to be watered by the dew of contemplation, they are inebriated as it were from the cup.

47. By the very good things which we do, we draw near to the worse. But what is it that in this life is performed without the pollution of any most thin contagion? For sometimes by the very good things which we do, we draw near to the worse; because while they bring forth joy to the mind, they also beget a certain security; and while the mind is rendered secure, it is relaxed into torpor. But sometimes they pollute us with a little elation; and they make us so much the more dejected before God, as they render us more swollen before ourselves. Whence it is well subjoined.

CHAPTER XXXIV

VERS. 5. And when the days of the feast had gone in a circuit, Job sent, and sanctified them.

47. The intention in good works is to be purified. For having completed the circuit of the days of the feast, to send to the sons, and to sanctify them, is after the sense of the virtues, to direct the intention of the heart, and to cleanse all that is done by a strict discussion of retractation; lest those things be estimated good which are evil; lest at least those things truly thought good be thought sufficient, when they are not perfect. For thus the mind is often deceived, so that it is deceived either by the quality of the evil, or by the quantity of the good. But prayers find these senses of the virtues better than discussions; for those things which we strive more fully to scrutinize in ourselves, we often more truly penetrate by praying than by investigating. For when the mind is lifted up to high things by a certain engine of compunction, it contemplates more certainly all that occurred to it concerning itself, by judging it beneath itself. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXV

IBID. --- And rising early he offered holocausts for each one.

48. The holocaust of prayer is to be offered for the cleansing of individual virtues. For we rise early, when being infused with the light of compunction we leave the night of our humanity, and open the eyes of the mind to the rays of the true light. And we offer a holocaust for each of the sons, when we immolate the host of our prayer to the Lord for each virtue: lest wisdom should elevate; lest understanding, while it runs subtly, should err; lest counsel, while it multiplies itself, should confound; lest fortitude, while it affords confidence, should cast headlong; lest science, while it knows and does not love, should puff up; lest piety, while it inclines itself outside of rectitude, should distort; lest fear, while it trembles more than is right, should sink into the pit of despair. When therefore we pour out prayers to the Lord for each virtue, that it ought to be pure, what else do we do than exhibit a holocaust for each one according to the number of the sons? For a holocaust is said to be a whole burnt offering. To give a holocaust, therefore, is to set the whole mind on fire with the fire of compunction, so that the heart may burn on the altar of love, and as it were burn up the sins of its own offspring, the defilements of thought.

49. He does not offer this who does not bridle internal motions. But they know not how to do these things, except those who, before thoughts go forth to work, bridle their internal motions by anxiously looking around; they know not how to do these things, except those who have known how to fortify the mind with manly custody. Whence Ishbosheth is rightly said to have been extinguished by an unexpected death, whom also the holy Scripture testifies to have had not a male doorkeeper in his house, but a female doorkeeper, saying: The sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, Rechab and Baanah, coming, entered the house of Ishbosheth in the heat of the day, who was sleeping upon his bed at noon. And they entered the house; and the female doorkeeper of the house, cleansing wheat, fell asleep. Taking ears of wheat, they entered secretly, and struck him in the groin. (2 Sam. 4:5.) The female doorkeeper cleanses the wheat, when the custody of the mind separates virtues from vices by discerning. Which if she shall have fallen asleep, she admits waylayers to the death of her own Lord; because when the anxiety of discretion has ceased, it opens the way for evil spirits to kill the soul. Who entering take the ears, because they soon take away the seeds of good thoughts. And they strike in the groin, because they kill the virtue of the heart by the delight of the flesh. For to strike in the groin is to pierce the life of the mind by the delight of the flesh. But this Ishbosheth would by no means succumb to this death, if he had not deputed at the entrance of the house a woman, that is, a soft custody at the approach of the mind. For a strong and manly sense ought to be placed before the doors of the heart, which neither the sleep of negligence should oppress, nor the error of ignorance deceive. Whence also he was well called Ishbosheth, who with a female guardian is stripped by hostile swords. For Ishbosheth is called a man of confusion. But he is a man of confusion who is not fortified by a strong custody of the mind; because while he estimates that he acts virtues, the subentering vices kill him unawares. Therefore the approach of the mind is to be fortified with all virtue, lest at any time waylaying enemies penetrate it by the hole of a neglected thought. Hence Solomon says: Keep thy heart with all custody, for out of it life proceedeth. (Prov. 4:23.) It is worthy therefore that we should with the greatest effort weigh the virtues which we act from the origin of intention, lest they should proceed from an evil birth, even if those things which they show are right. Whence here also it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVI

IBID. --- For he said: Lest perchance my sons have sinned, and have blessed God in their hearts.

50. Various ambushes of the enemy; so that he may vitiate good works, in the beginning of the work, in the progress, in the end. The sons curse in their hearts, when our right works proceed from not right thoughts; when they show forth good things in the open, but in secret they plot harmful things. For they curse God, when our minds estimate that they have from themselves what they are. They curse God, when they understand that they have received strengths from Him, but yet they seek their own praise from His gifts. But it is to be known, that our good things the ancient enemy follows in three ways, that forsooth this which is acted right before men, may be vitiated in the sight of the internal judge. For sometimes in a good work he pollutes the intention, so that all that follows in action may not go forth pure and clean, in that he perturbs this from the origin. But sometimes he does not prevail to vitiate the intention of a good work, but in the action itself he opposes himself as it were in the way; so that while each one goes forth more secure by the purpose of the mind, a vice being secretly subjoined, he may be slain as it were from ambushes. But sometimes he neither vitiates the intention, nor supplants in the way, but ensnares the good work in the end of the action; and by how much more he simulates that he has receded far either from the house of the heart, or from the way of the work, by so much more astutely he expects the end of the good action for deceiving; and by what he shall have rendered each one incautious as it were by receding, by that he sometimes transfixes him more harshly and incurably with a sudden wound.

For he pollutes the intention in a good work, because when he beholds the hearts of men easy for deceiving, he applies to their desires the breeze of transitory favor; so that in those things which they do right, they may be inclined by the fortitude of intention to seek the lowest things. Whence rightly under the species of Judea, concerning each soul taken in the snare of a miserable intention, it is said by the prophet: Her enemies are made in the head. (Lam. 1:5.) As if it were openly said: When a good work is taken up with a not good intention, the spirits opposing this have dominion from the very beginning of the thought; and they possess it so much the more fully, as they also hold dominion through the beginning.

But when they do not prevail to vitiate the intention, they hide snares placed in the way, so that in that which is acted well the heart exalting itself may be derived from the side to vice; so far as what beginning it had otherwise proposed, in action it may run through far otherwise than it began. For often while human praise meets a good work, it changes the mind of the worker: which although it had not been sought, yet being offered it delights. By the delight of which when the mind of the one working well is resolved, it is dissipated from all vigor of intimate intention. Often to our well-begun justice, anger subjoins itself from the side; and while it perturbs the mind more immoderately by zeal of rectitude, it wounds all health of intimate quiet. Often a sadness subjoined as it were from the side follows the gravity of the heart; and all the work which the mind begins with a good intention, this overshadows with a veil of sorrow. Which also is sometimes the more slowly repelled, by how much more it serves the pressed mind as if later. Often immoderate joy subjoins itself to a good work; and when it exacts that the mind should be cheerful more than is becoming, it repels all weight of gravity from the good action. Because therefore the Psalmist had seen that snares were beneath in the way even for those beginning well, rightly being full of the prophetic spirit he said: In this way, in which I was walking, they hid a snare for me. (Psalm 142:3.) Which well and subtly Jeremiah insinuates, who while he studied to refer deeds without, indicated those things which were being done within among ourselves, saying: There came eighty men from Shechem, and from Shiloh, and from Samaria, having their beards shaven, and their clothes rent, and having cut themselves (squalentes); they had offerings and incense in their hand, to offer in the house of the Lord. But Ishmael the son of Nethaniah went forth from Mizpah to meet them, weeping as he went. And when he had met them, he said to them: Come to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam. Who when they were come to the midst of the city, he slew them. (Jerem. 41:5.) For they shave the beard, who subtract from themselves the confidence of their own strengths. They rend their clothes, who do not spare themselves in the laceration of exterior beauty. They come to offer incense and offerings in the house of the Lord, who promise that they will exhibit themselves in the sacrifice of God, prayer with works. But yet if they know not how to look around themselves cautiously in the very way of holy devotion, Ishmael the son of Nethaniah comes to meet them; because forsooth any evil spirit, generated in the error of pride by the example of his predecessor, namely Satan, opposes himself for the snare of deception. Of whom also it is well said: Weeping as he went; because that he may prevail to kill devoted minds by striking, he hides himself as it were under the veil of virtue; and while he simulates that he agrees with those truly mourning, being more securely admitted to the inmost parts of the heart, he kills this which lies hid within of virtue. Who often promises that he will promote to higher things. Whence also he is related to have said: Come to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam; and while he promises greater things, he subtracts even the least. Whence also it was rightly said: Who when they were come to the midst of the city, he slew them. Men therefore coming to offer gifts to God, he kills in the midst of the city; because minds devoted to divine works, unless they keep themselves with great circumspection, the enemy stealing on, while they carry the host of devotion, they lose life in the way itself. From the hand of which enemy there is no escape, unless one should recur more quickly to penitence. Whence there it is aptly subjoined: But ten men were found among them who said to Ishmael: Slay us not, for we have treasures in the field of wheat, and of barley, and of oil, and of honey; and he slew them not. (Jer. 41:8.) For a treasure in the field is hope in penitence, which because it is not seen, is contained as it were dug up in the earth of the heart. They therefore who had treasures in the field were saved; because they who after the vice of their incautiousness return to the lament of penitence, are not killed even though captured.

But when the ancient enemy neither strikes in the beginning of the intention, nor intercepts in the way of action, he tends harsher snares in the end. Whom he besieges so much the more wickedly, by how much more he sees it alone remaining to him for deceiving. These snares placed at his end the Prophet beheld, when he said: They shall observe my heel. (Psalm 56:6.) Because since the end of the body is in the heel, what is signified by this but the term of action? Whether therefore evil spirits, or any wicked men, followers of their pride, observe the heel, when they desire to vitiate the end of a good action. Whence also it is said to the same serpent: She shall observe thy head, and thou her heel. (Gen. 3:15, according to LXX.) For to observe the head of the serpent is to look at the beginnings of his suggestion, and to extirpate them from the approach of the heart with a hand of solicitous consideration. Who yet when he is detected from the beginning, strives to strike the heel, because even if he does not strike the intention by the first suggestion, he tends to deceive in the end. But if once the heart is corrupted in intention, the middle and the end of the following action are securely possessed by the crafty enemy; since he beholds that tree to bear all fruits for him, which he vitiated with the tooth of poison in the root. Because therefore we must watch with the greatest care, lest the mind serving good works should be polluted by a reprobate intention, it is rightly said: Lest perchance my sons have sinned, and have blessed God in their hearts. As if it were openly said: There is no good which is acted without, if for it a victim of innocence is not immolated within before the eyes of God on the altar of the heart.

Therefore the river of work is to be seen with all virtue, if it flows pure from the fountain of thought. With all care the eye of the heart is to be kept from the dust of malice; lest this which it shows right to men in action, it should distort within itself by the vice of a perverse intention.

Therefore care is to be taken, lest our good works should be few, or unscrutinized. Therefore care is to be taken lest our good things be few; care lest they be unscrutinized; lest either acting few, we be found sterile; or leaving them unscrutinized, we be found foolish. For neither is each thing truly a virtue, if it is not mixed with other virtues. Whence it is rightly said to Moses: Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte, and onycha, and galbanum of good odor, and most lucid frankincense; of equal weight shall they all be, and thou shalt make a perfume composed by the work of the apothecary, diligently mixed and pure. (Exod. 30:34.) For we make a perfume composed of spices, when on the altar of good work, we are fragrant with the multiplicity of virtues. Which becomes mixed and pure; because by how much virtue is joined to virtue, by so much the incense of good work is exhibited more sincerely. Whence also it is well subjoined: And when thou shalt have beaten all into most thin dust, thou shalt place of it before the tabernacle of the testimony. (Ibid., 36.) Into most thin dust we beat all the spices, when our good things we beat as if in the mortar of the heart by secret discussion; and if they be truly good, we subtly retract them. To reduce spices therefore into dust, is to rub virtues by reconsidering, and to recall them even to the subtlety of secret examination. And it is to be noted, that of the same dust it is said: Thou shalt place of it before the tabernacle of the testimony;

because then forsooth our good things truly please in the sight of the judge, when the mind beats these by more subtly reconsidering, and as it were renders dust from spices; lest the good which is acted should be gross and hard; lest if the strait hand of retractation does not comminute this, it should not more subtly sprinkle its odor. Hence it is forsooth that the virtue of the spouse is praised by the voice of the bridegroom, when it is said: Who is she that ascendeth through the desert, like a little rod of smoke from the spices of myrrh and frankincense, and of all the powder of the perfumer? (Cant. 3:6.) For the holy Church ascends like a little rod of smoke from spices; because from the virtues of her life she profits daily into the rectitude of internal incense, nor flows away scattered through thoughts, but constrains herself within the secrets of the heart in a rod of rigor. Which while she does not cease always to reconsider and retract those things which she acts, has indeed myrrh and frankincense in work, but dust in thought. Hence it is, that concerning the offerers of the host it is said again to Moses: The skin of the host being drawn off, let them cut the limbs into pieces. (Levit. 1:6.) For we subtract the skin of the host, when we remove the surface of virtue from the eyes of our mind. Whose limbs we cut into pieces, when distinguishing subtly its inmost parts, we think of them member by member. Care therefore is to be taken, lest when we overcome evil things, we be supplanted by wanton good things; lest perchance they proceed fluid, lest they be taken uncircumspectly, lest through error they desert the way, lest being broken through weariness, they lose the merit of former labor. For in all things the mind ought vigilantly to look around itself, and to persevere in the very providence of its circumspection. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVII

IBID. --- Thus Job did all the days.

55. Perseverance necessary. For good is acted in vain, if it be deserted before the term of life; because also he runs swiftly in vain, who fails before he comes to the goals. Hence it is forsooth that it is said of the reprobate: Woe to them that have lost patience. (Ecclus. 2:16.) Hence Truth says to His elect: Ye are they which have continued with Me in My temptations. (Luke 22:28.) Hence Joseph, who is described to have persevered just among his brethren even to the end, is related alone to have had a coat reaching to the ankles (talaris). (Gen. 37:24, according to LXX.) For what is a coat reaching to the ankles, but a consummate action? For as it were a protended coat covers the ankle of the body, when a good action before the eyes of God covers us even to the term of life. Hence it is that by Moses it is commanded to offer the tail of the host on the altar (Exod. 29:22; Levit. 3:9); that forsooth every good which we begin, we may also complete with a persevering end. Well therefore things begun are to be acted all the days; so that when evil is repelled by fighting, the victory of good may be held by the hand of constancy.

These things therefore we have said under a triple understanding, so that proposing various foods to a fastidious soul, we may offer something which it may take by choosing. This yet we greatly ask, that he who lifts up the mind to spiritual understanding, should not recede from the veneration of the history.

SECOND BOOK.

It pursues the narration of the first chapter from the sixth verse even to the end, according to a triple sense.

CHAPTER I

1. Holy Scripture is a Mirror. Holy Scripture is placed before the eyes of the mind like a certain mirror (Vid. August. in Psal. CIII, ser. 1, n. 4), so that our internal face may be seen in it. For there we know our foul, there our beautiful things. There we feel how much we profit, there how far we are distant from progress. But it narrates the deeds of the saints, and provokes the hearts of the infirm to imitation. And while it commemorates their victorious facts, against the battles of vices, it confirms our weak things; and it happens by its words, that the mind trembles less during the contests, the more it sees placed before itself the triumphs of so many strong men. But sometimes it not only asserts to us their virtues, but also makes known their falls; so that both in the victory of the strong what to take by imitating, and again we may see in the slips what we ought to fear. For behold Job is described increased by temptation, but David prostrated by temptation; so that both the virtue of the greater may cherish our hope, and the fall of the greater may gird us to the caution of humility; in so far as while those things rejoicing lift up, these things fearing press down; and the soul of the hearer being instructed from thence with the confidence of hope, from hence with the humility of fear, neither may be proud with temerity, because it is pressed by dread, nor being pressed by fear may despair, because it is strengthened to the confidence of hope by the example of virtue.

CHAPTER II.

VERSE 6.---Now there was a day when the sons of God came to stand before the Lord, and Satan came also among them.

2. HISTORICAL SENSE. How accurately Holy Scripture describes events. It is pleasing to observe how the sacred utterances express qualities and the boundaries of causes in the beginnings of narratives. For sometimes they signify what they subjoin concerning a future action from the position of the place, sometimes from the position of the body, sometimes from the quality of the air, sometimes from the quality of the time. Indeed, from the position of places, divine Scripture expresses the merits of subsequent things and the ends of causes, just as it says of Israel that it could not hear the words of God on the mountain, but received the precepts in the plains: doubtless indicating the subsequent infirmity of the people, who were not able to ascend to the highest things, but loosened themselves in the lowest by living neglectfully. From the position of the body it announces future things, as in the Acts of the Apostles Stephen manifests that he saw Jesus, who sits at the right hand of the power of God, standing (Acts 7:55, 56). For to stand is the part of one who helps. And He is rightly seen to stand, who assists in the war of the contest. From the quality of the air the subsequent matter is demonstrated, as the evangelist, when he would say that none from Judea would then believe while the Lord was preaching, premised saying: 'And it was winter' (John 10:22). For it is written: 'Because iniquity shall abound, the charity of many shall grow cold' (Matt. 24:12). Therefore he took care to express the time of winter, so that he might indicate the cold of malice to be in the hearts of the hearers. Hence it is that concerning Peter who was to deny it is premised: 'Because it was cold, and he stood at the coals and warmed himself' (John 18:18). For he had already grown torpid within from the heat of charity, and he was warming himself again at the love of the present life, as at the coals of the persecutors, with his infirmity seething. From the quality of time also the end of an action is expressed, as Judas is related to have gone out at night (John 13:30) to the treachery of betrayal, as one not to return to pardon, when at his departure it is said by the evangelist: 'And it was night.' For hence also it is said to the unjust rich man: 'This night they shall require thy soul of thee' (Luke 12:20). For the soul, which is led to darkness, is recorded to be required not in the day, but in the night. Hence it is that Solomon, who received wisdom as one not to persevere, is described to have received this in dreams and at night (1 Kings 3:11). Hence it is that the angels come to Abraham at midday; but about to punish Sodom, they are recorded to have come to it in the evening (Gen. 18:1, 2; 19:1). Because therefore the temptation of blessed Job is led to victory, it is related to have begun from a day, when it is said:

CAPUT III.

IBID.---Now there was a day, when the sons of God came to stand before the Lord, and Satan came also among them.

3. How the Angels are present to God, even when sent on ministry. How great is the subtlety of angels. But who are called the sons of God, except the elect angels? Concerning whom since it is established that they serve the sights of majesty, it is greatly to be asked whence they come, that they may stand before the Lord. For concerning these it is said by the voice of Truth: 'Their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father, who is in heaven' (Matt. 18:10). Concerning these the prophet says: 'Thousands of thousands ministered to him, and ten thousand times a hundred thousand stood before him' (Dan. 7:10). If therefore they always see, and always stand by, it is to be asked with vigilant care whence they come, who never depart. But since it is said of them through Paul: 'Are they not all ministering spirits, sent for ministry, for those who receive the inheritance of salvation' (Heb. 1:14)? By this, that we know them to be sent,

we find whence they come. But behold we join question to question, and as if while we strive to loosen a handle, we tie a knot. For how can they either always stand by, or always see the face of the Father, if they are sent to external ministry for our salvation? Which however we solve more quickly, if we weigh of how great subtlety is the angelic nature. For neither do they go out from the divine vision in such a way that they are deprived of the joys of internal contemplation; because if they lost the sight of the Creator in going out, they could neither raise those lying down, nor announce true things to the ignorant; and the fountain of light, which they themselves would lose in going out, they would by no means offer to the blind. In this therefore is the angelic nature now distinct from the condition of our nature, that we are both circumscribed by place, and narrowed by the ignorance of blindness: but the spirits of angels are indeed circumscribed by place, yet their knowledges are dilated far incomparably above us. For they are distended by knowing internally and externally, because they contemplate the fountain of knowledge itself. For what of those things which are to be known do they not know, who know Him who knows all things? Therefore their knowledge is greatly dilated in comparison of ours, but yet narrow in comparison of divine knowledge: just as also those spirits of theirs in comparison indeed of our bodies, are spirits, but in comparison of the highest and uncircumscribed Spirit, a body. And therefore they are sent, and they stand by:

because both by this, that they are circumscribed, they go out; and by this, that they are also present within, they never depart. And therefore they always see the face of the Father, and yet they come to us; because they go out to us by spiritual presence, and yet they keep themselves there, whence they had departed, through internal contemplation. Let it be said therefore: 'The sons of God came to stand before the Lord,' because they return thither by conversion of spirit, whence they depart by no aversion of mind.

CAPUT IV.

IBID.---And Satan came also among them.

4. Satan among the angels, because he did not lose his nature. It is greatly to be asked how Satan could be present among the elect angels, who had long since gone out from their lot, pride demanding it, as a condemned one. But he is rightly described to have been present among them, because although he lost blessedness, yet he did not lose a nature similar to theirs; and if he is weighed down by merits, he is raised up by the condition of his subtle nature. Therefore he is said to have been present among the sons of God before the Lord; because by that look by which Almighty God beholds all spiritual things, He sees also Satan in the order of the more subtle nature, as Scripture attests, which says: 'The eyes of the Lord behold the evil and the good' (Prov. 15:3). But this, that Satan is said to have been present before the Lord, is turned into a heavy question for us. For it is written: 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God' (Matt. 5:8). But Satan, who cannot be of a pure heart, how could he have been present to see the Lord?

5. He is present to God, because he is seen by Him. But it is to be observed that he is related to have been present before the Lord, but not however to have seen the Lord. For he came that he might be seen, not that he might see. He was in the sight of the Lord, but however the Lord was not in his sight: just as a blind man when he stands in the sun, he indeed is bathed in the rays of the sun, but yet he does not see the light by which he is illuminated. So therefore also among the angels Satan was present in the sight of the Lord; because the divine power, which by beholding penetrates all things, saw the unclean spirit not seeing it. For because even those things which flee from God cannot be hidden, while all things are naked to the supernal sight, Satan was present, absent from the one present. It follows:

CAPUT V.

VERSE 7.---To whom the Lord said, Whence comest thou?

6. For God to not know is to reprobate. What is it, that to the elect angels who come it is by no means said, Whence come ye? But it is asked of Satan whence he comes? for we do not inquire, except for those things which we do not know. But for God to not know, is to reprobate. Whence He is about to say to some in the end: 'I know you not whence ye are, depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity' (Luke 13:27). Just as a truthful man is said to not know how to lie, who disdains to fall by a lie; not that if he wished to lie, he would not know how, but that he contemns speaking false things by love of truth. What is it therefore to say to Satan, 'Whence comest thou,' except to reprobate his ways as if unknown? Therefore the light of Truth is ignorant of the darkness which it reprobates; and it is worthy that it should inquire of the journeys of Satan, because it condemns them by judging, as if not knowing. Hence it is that it is said by the voice of the Creator to Adam when he sinned, 'Adam, where art thou?' (Gen. 3:9.) For neither did divine power not know, after the fault, to what hiding places the servant had fled; but because it saw him fallen in fault, already hidden under sin as if from the eyes of truth, because it does not approve the darkness of his error, it is as if ignorant where the sinner is; and it both calls him, and requires him, saying, 'Adam, where art thou?' By this that it calls, it gives a sign because it recalls to penitence. By this that it requires, it openly insinuates, because it is ignorant of sinners who are justly to be condemned. Therefore the Lord does not call Satan, but however He requires him, saying: 'Whence comest thou?' because doubtless God by no means recalls the apostate spirit to penitence; but being ignorant of the ways of his pride, He condemns them. Therefore while Satan is discussed concerning his journey, the elect angels are not to be asked whence they come: because their ways are so far known to God, as they are also performed by Him as their author; and while they serve His will alone, they cannot be unknown thither, whence they are always done before Him by the eye of approbation. It follows:

CAPUT VI.

IBID.---Satan answering, said: I have circled the earth, and walked through it.

7. Satan's circling, a proof of his anxiety. It is customary for the anxiety of labor to be designated by a circling in a round. Satan therefore circling the earth, was laboring, because he contemned to stand quiet in the height of heaven. And when he insinuates that he has not flown, but has walked through, he demonstrates by how great a weight of sin he is pressed in the lowest parts. Therefore walking through he circled the earth; because falling from that flight of spiritual power, pressed by the gravity of his malice, he came out to the round of labor. For hence it is that it is said of his members through the Psalmist: 'The wicked walk in a circuit' (Ps. 12:8); because while they do not seek internal things, they are fatigued in the labor of external things. It follows:

CAPUT VII.

VERSE 8.---Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him on the earth, a simple and upright man, and fearing God, and departing from evil?

8. Various locutions of God and of spirits. This that by the divine voice blessed Job is called simple and upright, and fearing God, and departing from evil, because we have subtly and limb by limb explained it above, we avoid repeating what we have said; lest while we repeat discussed things, we should come later to undiscussed things. This therefore is to be observed by us with skill, what it is, that either the Lord is said to speak to Satan, or that Satan is related to answer the Lord. For it is to be discussed what kind of locution that is. For neither from the Lord, who is the highest and uncircumscribed Spirit, nor from Satan, who is clothed with no carnal nature, is an airy breath drawn by a bellows of the belly in a human manner, so that it may be rendered by the expression of the voice through the organ of the throat. But while the incomprehensible nature speaks to the invisible nature, it is worthy that our mind, exceeding the quality of corporeal locution, should be suspended to the sublime and unknown modes of internal locution. For we, that we may express those things which we feel inwardly to those without, eject these through the organ of the throat, by the sound of the voice. For we stand behind the wall of the body to alien eyes within the secret of the mind; but when we desire to manifest ourselves, we go out as if through the door of the tongue, so that we may show of what sort we are inwardly. But spiritual nature is not so, which being composed of mind and body is not twofold. But again it is to be known that even that incorporeal nature when it is said to speak, its locution is by no means formed by one and the same quality. For God speaks in one way to the angels, in another way the angels to God; in one way God to the souls of the saints, in another way the souls of the saints to God; in one way God to the devil, in another way the devil to God.

9. God speaks in one way to the angels. For because nothing stands in the way of spiritual nature from corporeal opposition, God speaks to the holy angels by that very thing by which He shows His invisible secrets to their hearts: so that whatever they ought to do, they may read in the contemplation of truth itself, and the joys of contemplation themselves may be as it were certain precepts of a voice. For it is said as if to those hearing, what is inspired to those seeing. Whence when God would infuse into their hearts the animadversion of vengeance against human pride, He said: 'Come, let us go down, and let us there confound their tongue' (Gen. 11:7). It is said to those who adhere, 'Come'; because doubtless this very thing is to never decrease from divine contemplation, and always to increase in divine contemplation; and to never depart in heart, is as it were by a certain stable motion to be always coming. To whom also He says: 'Let us go down and let us confound their tongue.' The angels ascend, in that they behold the Creator. The angels descend, in that they press down the creature raising itself in illicit things with the examination of strictness. Therefore to say of God is: 'Let us go down and let us confound their tongue,' to show them in Himself that which is rightly to be done, and through the force of internal vision, to inspire into their minds the judgments to be exhibited by occult motions.

10. In another way the angels to God. In another way the angels speak to God, as also through the Apocalypse of John they say: 'Worthy is the Lamb, who was slain, to receive power, and divinity, and wisdom' (Apoc. 5:12). For the voice of the angels is in the praise of the Creator, the very admiration of internal contemplation. To have been stunned at the miracles of divine power, is to have spoken, because the motion of the heart excited with reverence, is a great cry of the voice to the ears of the uncircumscribed Spirit. Which voice explains itself as if through distinct words, while it forms itself through innumerable modes of admiration. God therefore speaks to the angels, when His internal will is manifested to be seen by them. But the angels speak to the Lord, when through this, that they look back above themselves, they rise into the motion of admiration.

11. In another way God to the souls of the saints, and they to God. In another way God speaks to the souls of the saints, in another way the souls of the saints speak to God. Whence also in the Apocalypse of John it is again said: 'I saw under the altar the souls of those slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they had; and they cried with a loud voice saying: How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood of those who dwell on the earth?' Where there is immediately subjoined: 'White robes were given to each of them, and it was said to them, that they should rest yet a little while, until the number of their fellow servants and brothers should be fulfilled.' For what is it for the souls to say a petition for vengeance, except to desire the day of the last judgment, and the resurrection of their extinguished bodies? For their great cry is their great desire.

For each one cries so much the less, as he desires less; and he expresses so much the greater voice into the ears of the uncircumscribed Spirit, as he pours himself more fully into His desire.

Therefore the words of the souls are their desires. For if desire were not speech, the Prophet would not say: 'Thine ear hath heard the desire of their heart' (Ps. 10:17). But since the mind which asks is accustomed to be moved in one way, and that which is asked in another, and the souls of the saints so adhere to God in the bosom of the internal secret, that in adhering they rest; how are they said to ask, whom it is certain depart in no way from the internal will? how are they said to ask, whom it is certain both know the will of God, and those things which are to come? But being placed in Him, they are said to ask something of Him, not because they desire anything which is at variance with His will, whom they behold: but because the more ardently they adhere by the mind, they also receive from Him, so that they ask of Him what they have known Him to wish to do. Therefore they drink from Him what they thirst for from Him; and in a way as yet incomprehensible to us, in this, that by asking they hunger, by foreknowing they are satiated.

For they would be at variance from the will of the Creator, if they did not ask those things which they see Him to wish; and they would adhere to Him less, if they knocked with a slower desire at Him who wishes to give. To whom it is said divinely in response: 'Rest yet a little while, until the number of your fellow servants and brothers be fulfilled.' To say to the desiring souls, 'Rest yet a little while,' is to inspire the solace of consolation from foreknowledge itself between the ardor of desire; so that both the voice of the souls may be this, which loving they desire; and the word of responding God may be this, which confirms them between their desires by the certainty of retribution. Therefore to respond is, that they ought to wait for the assembly of their brothers, to instill into their minds the delays of waiting willingly; so that when they seek the resurrection of the flesh, they may also congratulate from the increase of the brothers to be gathered.

12. In another way God to the devil, and he to God. In another way God speaks to the devil, in another way the devil to God. For for God to speak to the devil is to rebuke his ways and business by the animadversion of hidden strictness, as it is said here: 'Whence comest thou?' But for the devil to respond to Him, is to be able to hide nothing from His almighty majesty. Whence here he says: 'I have circled the earth, and walked through it.' For it is as if for him to say what he has done, to know that he cannot hide his acts from His eyes. But it is to be known, that as we learn in this place, God speaks to the devil in four ways; the devil to God in three ways. God speaks to the devil in four ways: because He both argues his unjust ways, and proposes the justice of His elect against him, and permits their innocence to be tempted by granting it to him, and sometimes He prohibits him, lest he should dare to tempt. For He redargues his unjust ways, as has already been said: 'Whence comest thou?' He proposes the justice of His elect against him, as He says: 'Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him on the earth?' He permits their innocence to be tempted by granting it, as He says: 'Behold all things which he hath are in thy hand.' And again He prohibits him from temptation, when He says: 'Only upon himself extend not thy hand.' But the devil speaks to God in three ways, when he either insinuates his ways, or accuses the innocence of the elect with feigned crimes, or asks for that same innocence to be tempted. Indeed he insinuates his ways, who says: 'I have circled the earth, and walked through it.' He accuses the innocence of the elect, who says: 'Doth Job fear God in vain? Hast thou not hedged him in, and his house, and all his substance round about?' He asks for that same innocence to be tempted, when he says: 'Extend thy hand, and touch all things which he possesses, unless he bless thee to thy face.' But for God to say, 'Whence comest thou?' is, as we also insinuated above, to rebuke the journeys of his malice by the force of His justice. For God to say, 'Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him on the earth?' is to make such elect of His by justifying them, as the apostate angel may doubtless envy. For God to say, 'Behold all things which he hath are in thy hand,' is to relax that incursion of his malice against them by a hidden force, for the probation of the faithful. For God to say, 'Only upon himself extend not thy hand,' is to restrain him even by permitting from the impetus of immoderate temptation. but for the devil to say, 'I have circled the earth, and walked through it,' is to be unable to hide the sagacity of his malice from His invisible eyes. For the devil to say, 'Doth Job fear God in vain?' is to complain against the good within the hiding places of his thoughts; and to envy their advancements, and by envying to seek out the rifts of reprobation. For the devil to say, 'Extend thy hand a little, and touch all things which he possesses,' is to pant with the seethings of malice for the affliction of the good. For in that he envying seeks their temptation, in that he asks it as if deprecating their probation. Because therefore we have succinctly said the modes of internal locutions, let us return to the order of exposition which was a little interrupted.

CAPUT VIII.

VERSE 8.---Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him upon the earth, a man simple and upright, and fearing God, and departing from evil?

13. The fight of God and the devil, whose matter was Job. It has already been treated in the preceding discourse, that the devil proposed a contest not against Job, but against God; but blessed Job was in the middle as the matter of the contest. And if we say in his speeches that Job failed between the scourges, which it is a nefas to feel, we say that God lost in His proposition. For behold even in this place it is to be observed, that the devil did not first ask for blessed Job from the Lord, but the Lord praised him in the contempt of the devil. And unless He knew that he would remain in his justice, He would by no means have proposed for him. Nor would He grant him to perish in temptation, concerning whom before the temptation, from the praises of God, the torches of envy had been excited in the mind of the tempter.

14. How astutely the devil seeks whence he may accuse us. But the ancient adversary when he does not find evils which he may accuse, seeks to twist the good things themselves to evil. And when he is conquered concerning works, he scrutinizes our words for accusing. When he find no accusation even in words, he contends to cloud the intention of the heart; as if good deeds were not done with a good mind, and therefore ought not to be weighed as good by the judge. For because he beholds the fruits of the tree to be green even in the heat, he seeks as it were to place a worm at the root. For he says:

CAPUT IX.

VERSES 9, 10.---Doth Job fear God in vain? Hast thou not hedged him in and his house, and all his substance round about? Thou hast blessed the works of his hands, and his possession hath increased in the earth.

15. He tempts from prosperous and from adverse things. As if he should say openly: He who has received so many good things on earth, what wonder is it, if he conducts himself innocently for them? He would be truly innocent, if he persisted good among adverse things. But why is he called great, whom the reward of each of his works accompanies with so great a multiplicity of things? For the astute adversary, when he considers that the holy man has done well among prosperous things, hastens to reprobate him before the judge through adverse things. Whence it is rightly said in the Apocalypse by an angelic voice: 'The accuser of our brothers is cast out, who accused them before the sight of our God day and night' (Apoc. 12:10). But sacred Scripture is often accustomed to put day for prosperous things, and night for adverse things. Therefore in day and night he does not cease to accuse, because he contends to show us accusable now in prosperous things, now in adverse things. He accuses in the day, when he insinuates that we use prosperous things badly. He accuses in the night, when he demonstrates that we do not have patience in adverse things. Because therefore scourges had not yet touched blessed Job, he had as it were not yet whence he could accuse in the night. But because he had flourished with great sanctity in prosperous things, he feigned that he had done good for those same prosperous things: lying with a crafty assertion that he did not possess substance for the use of the Lord, but worshipped the Lord for the use of substance. For there are some who, that they may enjoy God, use this world dispensatively. And there are some who, that they may enjoy this world, wish to use God transitorily. When therefore he relates the good things of the divine gift, he thinks that he lightens the deeds of the strong worker; so that whose life he is unable to reprehend concerning works, he may adjudge his mind as if from thoughts; lying that all that he lived innocuously externally, he served not for the love of the Lord, but for the desire of temporal prosperity. Therefore being ignorant of the strengths of blessed Job, but yet knowing more truly that each one is proved by adverse things, he seeks for him to be tempted; so that he who had walked with an unoffended step through the day of prosperity, might at least stumble in the night of adversity, and might lie prostrate before the eyes of his praiser with the offense of impatience. Whence he subjoins:

CHAPTER X.

VERSE 11.---But extend thy hand a little, and touch all things which he possesses, unless he bless thee to thy face.

16. The devil can do nothing except by God's permission. When Satan desires to tempt the holy man, and yet says to the Lord that He ought to extend His hand; it is greatly to be noted that he does not attribute the strength of striking even to himself, who is singularly proud against the author of all. For the devil knows, that he is not sufficient to do anything of himself, because neither does he exist of himself in that which he is a spirit. Hence it is that in the Gospel the legion to be expelled from the man said: 'If thou cast us out, send us into the herd of swine' (Matt. 8:31). For he who could not go into the swine of himself, what wonder if without the hand of the author, he was not able to touch the house of the holy man?

17. The devil's will is evil, but his power is just. But it is to be known that the will of Satan is always iniquitous, but his power is never unjust: because he has his will from himself, but his power from the Lord. For what he himself desires to do iniquitously, God permits to be done only justly. Whence it is well said in the books of Kings: 'An evil spirit of the Lord rushed into Saul' (1 Sam. 18:10). Behold one and the same spirit is both called of the Lord, and evil: of the Lord namely by the license of just power, but evil by the desire of an iniquitous will. Therefore he ought not to be dreaded, who can do nothing except permitted. Therefore only that power is to be feared, which when it has permitted the enemy to rage, his iniquitous will also serves it for the use of a just judgment. But he asks for the hand to be extended a little; because they are external things which he seeks to be bruised. For neither does Satan think that he does anything much, except when he wounds in the soul, so that by striking he may recall from that fatherland, from which he himself lies prostrate far away by the weapon of his pride.

18. The face of God is the regard of grace. But what is it that he says: 'Unless he bless thee to thy face'? For we indeed look upon that which we love; but from that which we wish to turn away, we decline our face. What therefore is to be understood by the face of God, but the regard of His grace? He says therefore: 'Extend thy hand a little, and touch all things which he possesses, unless he bless thee to thy face.' As if he should say openly: Withdraw those things which thou hast given; for if he lose the things received, he will not seek the regard of thy grace, when temporal things are taken away. For if he have not those things in which he delights, he will contemn thy favor even by cursing. By whose crafty petition Truth, being by no means provoked, is not overcome, but that which may support the faithful servant for the increase of his reward is granted to the enemy for his own deception. Whence it is soon subjoined:

CHAPTER XI.

VERSE 12.--- Behold, all that he has is in thy hand: only upon himself extend not thy hand.

19. God permits some things to the tempter, and denies others. The dispensation of holy piety in the words of the Lord is to be considered, how He permits and restrains our enemy; He releases and refrains him. He gives some things for tempting, but from others He binds him. 'All that he has is in thy hand, only upon himself extend not thy hand.' He gives up his substance, but yet He protects his body, which indeed He is afterward to deliver to the tempter; but yet He does not release the enemy to all things at once, lest by striking on every side He should break the citizen. For when many evils happen to the elect, they are dispensed in time by the wonderful grace of the Creator; so that those which, being heaped together, would destroy, may, being divided, be tolerated. Hence Paul says: 'God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able, but will make also with the temptation an issue, that you may be able to bear it' (1 Cor. 10:13). Hence David says: 'Prove me, O Lord, and try me' (Psalm 26:2). As if he should say openly: First inspect my strengths, and then as I am able to bear, permit me to be tempted. This however which is said: 'Behold, all that he has is in thy hand, only upon himself extend not thy hand,' can also be understood otherwise, because the Lord indeed knew His strong fighter, but yet He wished to divide his contests against the enemy; so that although victory in all things might be available to the robust warrior, yet first the enemy might return conquered to the Lord from one contest: and then He might again grant him another thing to conquer, in order that the faithful servant might exist as a more wonderful victor, in that the conquered enemy should again repair himself against him for new wars. It follows:

CHAPTER XII.

SAME VERSE.---And Satan went out from the face of the Lord.

20. God is within and without all things, above and below all things. What is it that Satan is said to have gone out from the face of the Lord? For where is there a going out from Him who is everywhere? For hence He says: 'I fill heaven and earth' (Jer. 23:24). Hence it is that His Wisdom says: 'I alone have compassed the circuit of heaven' (Eccli. 24:8). Hence of His Spirit it is written: 'The Spirit of the Lord has filled the whole world' (Wisd. 1:7). Hence it is that the Lord says again: 'Heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool' (Isa. 66:1). And again of Him it is written: 'He measures the heaven with a span, and concludes all the earth in a fist' (Isa. 40:12). For He remains internal and external to the throne over which He presides. Measuring the heaven with a span, and concluding the earth in a fist, He is shown to be on every side external to all things which He has created. For that which is concluded within, is contained externally by that which concludes it. By the throne therefore, over which He presides, He is understood to be within and above; by the fist, with which He contains, He is signified to be without and below. For because He Himself remains within all things, He Himself without all things, He Himself above all things, He Himself below all things; He is both superior by power, and inferior by sustentation; external by magnitude, and internal by subtlety: ruling above, containing below; surrounding without, penetrating within; nor does He remain superior in one part, and inferior in another, or external in one part, and internal in another: but one and the same whole everywhere sustaining by presiding, presiding by sustaining, penetrating by surrounding, surrounding by penetrating; whence presiding above, thence sustaining below; and whence encompassing without, thence filling within: ruling above without restlessness, sustaining below without labor; penetrating within without extenuation, surrounding without without extension. He is therefore inferior and superior without place; He is wider without latitude, He is more subtle without extenuation.

21. Satan goes out from the face of the Lord, when he comes to the effect of his desire. Where then is there a going out from Him, who while He is nowhere by the mass of a body, yet by His uncircumscribed substance is nowhere absent? But as long as Satan, pressed by the power of majesty, was unable to exercise the appetite of his malice, he stood as if before the face of the Lord. But he went out from the face of the Lord; because being released divinely from the narrowness of internal retention, he came to the effect of his desire. He went out from the face of the Lord, because a noxious will, long bound by the chains of discipline, at length proceeded to work. For when, as has been said, he was unable to fulfill that which he wished, he stood as if before the face of the Lord; because the celestial dispensation restrained him from the effect of malice. But he went out from His face, because receiving the power of temptation, he arrived at the desires of his malice. It follows:

CHAPTER XIII.

VERSES 13, 14, 15.---And it came to pass on a certain day when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house, there came a messenger unto Job, and said: The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding beside them: and the Sabeans fell upon them, and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

22. The devil chooses the times for tempting. It is to be noted what times are congruous for temptations. For then indeed the devil chose the time for tempting, when he found the sons of blessed Job at a feast. For neither does the enemy only behold what he may do, but also when he may do it. For although he had received power, yet he sought out a time apt for subversion; so that namely it might be shown to us by the dispensation of God, that the joy of satiety is the forerunner of tribulation. But it is to be observed how craftily the losses themselves, which were inflicted, are announced. For it is not said, 'the oxen were taken away by the Sabeans': but those which were taken away, 'the oxen were plowing'; so that namely by the mention of the fruit of the work, the cause of grief might increase. Whence also among the Greeks not only asses, but 'foaling asses' are reported to have been seized; so that while the small animals should strike the mind of the hearer less from their quality, they might wound more from their fecundity. And because adverse things strike the mind so much the more, when they are many, and are also announced suddenly, the measure of groans was increased, even by the articles of the messengers. For it follows:

CHAPTER XIV.

VERSE 16.---And while he was yet speaking, there came another, and said: The fire of God is fallen from heaven, and has burned up the sheep, and the servants, and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

23. He endeavors to overset the constancy of Job by sudden casualties. Lest he should move less grief in the hearer for the lost things, he instigates his mind to exceed even by the words of the messengers themselves. For it is to be observed how craftily it is said: 'The fire of God', as if it were said: Thou sustainest the animadversion of Him, whom thou hast wished to appease with so many victims; thou toleratest the wrath of Him, whom daily serving thou didst labor. For while he indicates that God, whom he had served, had brought the adverse things, he commemorates the injured one, in whom he might exceed; so that he might reduce former obsequies to mind, and thinking that he had served in vain, might be proud against the injury of the author. For a pious mind, when it beholds itself suffering adverse things from men, rests in the consolation of divine grace; and when it has seen the storms of temptations increasing from without, desiring the retreat of the Lord's hope, it flies within the port of conscience. But that the crafty enemy might at one and the same time shake the most robust breast of the holy man both by human adversities and by divine desperation, he both brought in that the Sabeans had rushed in, and soon announced that the fire of God had fallen from heaven; so as if to exclude every avenue of consolation, while he showed Him also adverse, who could have consoled the mind among adverse things: so that while the tempted one considers himself destitute on every side and pressed on every side, he might break out into contumely so much the more boldly, as also more desperately. It follows:

CHAPTER XV.

VERSE 17.---And while he was yet speaking, there came another, and said: The Chaldeans made three bands, and fell upon the camels, and have carried them away, yea, and slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

24. He redoubles the wounds. Behold again, lest he should have grieved anything less for human adversity, he announces that bands of Chaldeans have rushed in; and lest the adversity coming from above should strike him less, he demonstrates repeated wrath in the air. For it follows:

CHAPTER XVI.

VERSES 18, 19.---While he was yet speaking, behold there came also another, and said: Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house: and behold, there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

25. He endeavors to provoke to hatred of God. He who is not prostrated by one wound, is therefore struck twice and thrice, that at length he may be wounded even to the innermost parts. Therefore adversity had been announced concerning the Sabeans, divine animadversion had been announced by fire from heaven, the seizure of the camels and the slaughter of the servants is announced again by men, and the wrath of divine indignation is repeated, while the rushing wind is indicated to have smitten the corners of the house, and to have extinguished the children. For because it is known, that the elements cannot be moved without the supernal nod, it is latently inferred that He Himself moved the elements against him, who permitted them to be moved; although Satan, once having received power from the Lord, prevails to shake even the elements for the use of his wickedness. Nor ought it to move wonder, if a spirit projected from the heights was able to disturb the air into winds; since it is certainly known that even to those condemned to the mine, water and fire serve for use. It was sought therefore that evils should be announced, sought that they should be many, sought that they should be sudden. But when he first announced adverse things, he inflicted a wound upon a heart still tranquil, as if upon sound members; but when he repeated the smiting of the stricken heart, so as to compel to words of impatience, he inflicted wound upon wounds.

26. The plagues of Job were sudden and manifold. But it is to be observed how craftily the ancient enemy took care, not so much to break the patience of the holy man by the loss of things, as by the very order of the messengers. Who studying to announce first small things, and afterwards greater, in the end brought in the death of the sons, lest the father of the family should lead the losses of things as vile, if he heard them already being bereaved; and the loss of things should strike less, with the death of the sons being foreknown, because namely there would be no inheritance, if he first withdrew those who were kept as heirs. But beginning from the least, he announced more grave things at the last; so that while he gradually learned worse things, every wound might find a place of grief in his heart. It is to be noted how craftily the weights of so many evils are announced both divided and sudden, so that both suddenly and growing bit by bit, grief itself might not contain itself in the heart of the hearer; and might enkindle him so much more ardently into blasphemy, as he should seethe more narrowly in himself by sudden and manifold messengers.

27. When those set over others serve pleasure, the reins are loosed to the subjects. In even moderate feasts the devil finds a place. But neither do I think this is to be passed over neglectfully, that the sons were feasting in the house of the eldest brother, when they perish. For it was said above, that feasts can scarcely be performed without fault. That we may therefore speak of ours, not of theirs, it is to be known by us that what is done voluptuously by the less, is restrained by the discipline of the greater; but when the greater themselves serve pleasure, surely the reins of wantonness are loosed to the less. For who may retain himself under the constriction of discipline, when even they, who receive the right of constriction, relax themselves to pleasures? While therefore they are feasting in the house of the eldest brother, they perish, because then the enemy receives strength more vehemently against us, when he knows that even those who are set over for the custody of discipline serve joy. For he occupies himself so much more licitiously for smiting, as also these who could have interceded for faults are vacant for pleasure. But far be it from us to suspect that the sons of so great a man, through the studies of feasts, had been vacant for engorging the belly; but yet we know truly that even if each one through the custody of discipline does not pass the limits of necessity in eating, yet the enkindled intention of the mind grows torpid among feasts; and considers less in how great a war of temptations it may be, which relaxes itself through security. In the day therefore of the first brother he overwhelmed the sons, because the ancient enemy seeks an avenue of subversion in the death of the less through the negligence of the greater. But because we have recognized with how many darts of messengers he was struck; let us hear our strong man, of what sort he may stand among the wounds. It follows:

CHAPTER XVI.

VERSE 20.---Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped.

28. It is a vice either not to feel the scourges of God, or to feel them too much. Some think it a philosophy of great constancy, if being corrected by the asperity of discipline, they do not feel the blows of the stripes and the pains. But some feel the scourges of smitings so excessively, that being moved by immoderate grief, they even fall into an excess of the tongue. But whoever endeavors to hold true philosophy, it is necessary that he walk between both. For insensibility of heart is not the weight of true virtue: because those members are also very insane through stupor, which even being cut cannot feel pain. Again, he deserts the custody of virtue, who feels the pain of the stripes beyond what is necessary; because while the heart is touched by excessive affliction, it is excited even to the contumelies of impatience, and he who ought to have corrected evil deeds through scourges, acts so that wickedness may increase through the scourge. For against the insensibility of those smitten it is said by the prophet: 'Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved; thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive discipline' (Jer. 5:3). Against the pusillanimity of those smitten it is said by the Psalmist: 'They shall not subsist in miseries' (Psalm 140:11). For they would subsist in miseries, if they tolerated adverse things with equanimity. But after they fall in mind among the scourges, they lose as it were the constancy of subsisting among the inflicted miseries.

32. The devil, in attacking us, is transfixed by our humility and patience. But since we have heard how the brave orator alleged the assertion of his part against the adversary, let us now hear how, at the end of his speech, he praises the Judge by blessing Him. It follows: Blessed be the name of the Lord. Behold, all that he felt to be right, he concluded with a blessing of the Lord; so that from this the adversary may look on, and, being conquered, blush to his own punishment, because he himself stood out as contumacious to the Lord even when created in beatitude, to whom man sings a hymn of glory even when smitten. [Vet. XIX.] It is to be observed, indeed, that our enemy strikes us with as many darts as he afflicts us with temptations. For daily we stand in the line of battle, daily we receive the missiles of his temptations. But we also send darts against him, if, being transfixed by tribulations, we answer humbly. Therefore, blessed Job, smitten by the loss of his possessions, smitten by the death of his children, because he turned the force of his grief into the praise of the Creator, saying: The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; as it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done; blessed be the name of the Lord; struck the proud enemy with humility, and laid low the cruel one with patience. Nor let us believe that our warrior received wounds and did not inflict them. For as many voices of patience as he rendered in the praise of God when smitten, so many darts, as it were, did he hurl into the breast of the adversary, and fixed them much more sharply than those he himself sustained. For being afflicted, he lost earthly things, but by sustaining the affliction humbly, he multiplied heavenly things. It follows:

CHAPTER XIX

[Rec. XIV].

VERSE 22.---In all these things Job sinned not: neither did he speak any foolish thing against God.

33. Job abstained from murmuring of the mouth and of the heart.---Because when we are overtaken by the tribulations of temptations, we can sin by a silent motion of thoughts even without speaking, testimony is given to blessed Job both of his mouth and of his heart. For first it is said: He sinned not; and then finally it is added: Neither did he speak any foolish thing against God. For he who has not spoken foolishly has restrained guilt from his tongue; but when it is premised, He sinned not, it is evident that he restrained the vice of murmuring even from his thought. Therefore he neither sinned, nor spoke foolishly, because he neither swelled silently in his conscience, nor relaxed his tongue into contumacy. For he speaks foolishly against God, who, being placed among the scourges of divine animadversion, endeavors to justify himself. For if he should proudly dare to assert himself innocent, what else does he do but accuse the justice of the Smiter? Let it suffice that we have thus far run through the words of the history: now let the discourse turn itself to investigating the mysteries of allegory in the exposition. But in this which is written:

CHAPTER XX

[Vet. XX, Rec. XV].

VERSE 6.---Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them.

34. God disposes times without time.---It must first be discussed why something is said to have happened 'on a certain day' before the Lord, since with Him the course of time is by no means varied by the change of day and night. For into that light, which without approach illustrates those things which it chooses, and without retreat deserts those which it rejects, no defect of mutability comes; because remaining immutable in itself, it disposes all mutable things; and it so created things passing away in itself, that they can by no means pass away with it; nor does time flow within in His sight, which runs down without among us. Whence it comes to pass that in His eternity those things remain fixed which, not fixed, emanate in the outward volumes of ages. Why, therefore, is it said with Him, 'On a certain day,' to whom surely one day is His own eternity? which day the Psalmist saw was neither closed by an end nor opened by a beginning, when he says: One day in thy courts is better than a thousand (Psalm 84:10).

35. He leads those accustomed to temporal things by degrees to eternal things.---But when Sacred Scripture speaks to those brought forth in time, it is fitting that it should use temporal words, so that by condescending it may lift up; and while it narrates something about eternity temporally, it may by degrees transfer those accustomed to temporal things to eternal things; and so that the unknown eternity may well infuse itself into our minds while it fawns upon them with known words. And what wonder is it if in the sacred oracle God does not hastily open His immutability to the human mind; since even after the solemnity of His resurrection was celebrated, He became known by certain accesses of advancement to be the incorruption of the body which He resumed? For by the testimony of Luke (Luke 24:4) we have learned that to some seeking Him in the monument He first sent angels; and again to the disciples speaking of Him in the way He Himself indeed appeared, but not to be recognized (Ibid., 15), who after the delays of exhortation, showed Himself to be recognized in the breaking of bread; and finally, entering suddenly, He presented Himself not only recognizable, but even palpable. For because the disciples still bore weak hearts, they were to be nourished in the knowledge of so great a mystery by this dispensation, that seeking for a little while they might find; and finding they might grow, and growing they might hold more robustly what they had known. Because, therefore, we are led not suddenly, but by increments of causes and words, as it were by certain steps toward eternity, something is said to have happened within with Him 'on a certain day,' who also beholds times themselves without time.

[Vet. XXI.] 36. He sees darkness in the light.--- Or was it because Satan also was present, while this is said to have been done 'on a certain day,' that Holy Scripture studied to indicate that God saw darkness in the light? For we surely cannot behold light and darkness with one and the same gaze: because when the eye is fixed on darkness, light is put to flight; and when it has turned itself to the flashing of light, the shadow of darkness departs. But that power, which sees all mutable things immutably, Satan was present to Him as if in the day, because He comprehends the darkness of the apostate angel without obscurity. We, as has been said, cannot contemplate with one and the same intuition both those things which we choose by approving, and those which we condemn by reproving: because when the mind is turned to the latter, it is separated from the thought of the former; but when it is brought back to the former, it is removed from the latter to which it had cleaved.

But God, because He respects all things at once without mutability, comprehends them without distension, namely both the good which He helps, and the evil which He judges, and the things which, being helped, He remunerates, and those which, judging, He condemns; in these things which He disposes in diverse order, He is not diverse. In the day, therefore, Satan is described as having been present to Him, because the light of His eternity is touched by no darkening of mutability; and in this, that darkness becomes present to Him, he is said to have been present among the sons of God: because by that power of justice the unclean spirit is penetrated, by which namely the hearts of the clean spirits are filled; and by that ray of light he is transfixed, by which they are bathed so that they may shine.

38. Good angels serve God for help, evil ones for probation.---He was present among the sons of God, because although they serve God for the help of the elect, he serves for their probation. He was present among the sons of God, because although by them, laboring in this life, the help of piety is bestowed, he, by unknowingly serving His hidden justice, endeavors to execute the ministry of reprobation. [Rec. XVI.] Whence it is well said in the books of Kings by the prophet: I saw the Lord sitting on His throne, and the army of heaven on His right hand and on His left, and it was said: In what shall I deceive Ahab, that he may go up and fall in Ramoth Gilead? And one said thus, and another otherwise. And there came forth one, and said: I will deceive Ahab. And it was said: In what wilt thou deceive? Who answered, saying: I will go forth, and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets (1 Kings 22:19 seq.).

For what do we understand by the throne of the Lord, but the angelic powers, presiding more highly over whose minds, He disposes all things below? And what is the army of heaven, but the multitude of ministering angels described? What is it, therefore, that the army of heaven is said to stand on His right and on His left? For God, who is so within all things that He is also without all things, is concluded by neither right nor left. But by the right hand of God, the elect part of the angels is designated; but by the left hand of God, the reprobate part of the angels. For not only do the good serve God, who help; but also the evil, who prove; not only those who lift up those returning from fault, but also those who weigh down those unwilling to return. Nor is it prohibited that the reprobate part of the angels can be understood in that which is called the army of heaven. For those which we know to be suspended in the air, we call birds of heaven. And of the same spirits Paul says: Against the spiritual things of wickedness in heavenly places (Ephes. 6:12). Announcing whose head, he says: According to the prince of the power of his air (Ephes. 2:2). Therefore, on the right hand of God and on the left the army of the angels stands: because both the will of the elect spirits agrees with divine piety; and the sense of the reprobate, serving its own malice, obeys the judgment of His strictness. Whence also presently the deceitful spirit is described as having leaped forth into the midst, through whom King Ahab, his merits demanding it, might be deceived. For it is not lawful to believe that a good spirit would have wished to serve deceit, so as to say: I will go forth, and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. But because King Ahab by preceding sins was worthy that he should have been damned by such a deception: so that he who often had willingly fallen into fault, might sometime against his will be taken to punishment, license is given to the malignant spirits by hidden justice, so that those whom they strangle willingly in the snare of sin, they may draw even against their will into the punishment of sin. That, therefore, which is there described as the army of heaven having stood at the right and left of God, is here related as Satan having been present among the sons of God. Behold, on the right hand of God stood the angels, because they are named sons of God; behold, on the left stand angels, because Satan was also present among them.

[Vet. XXII.] 39. But since we have decreed to investigate the mysteries of allegory, we not inconveniently understand that the Lord saw Satan in the day, because He corrected his ways in the incarnation of His Wisdom; as if He had not seen him so long as He tolerated his depravity in the perdition of the human race. Whence also it is presently said to him by the divine voice:

CHAPTER XXI.

VERSE 7. Whence comest thou?

40. God has detected the snares of the devil by the light of incarnate wisdom.---On the day Satan is questioned about his ways, because in the light of manifested wisdom the snares of the hidden enemy are detected. Because, therefore, when the Lord was incarnate the devil is rebuked, and is corrected from his pestiferous unbridledness, it is rightly added: To whom the Lord said: Whence comest thou? For then He argued by inquiring into the ways of Satan, when by the coming of the Mediator, repressing the iniquities of his persuasion, He rebuked him. Nor undeservedly in this day are the sons of God related to have stood before the Lord; because namely all the elect have been gathered to the vocation of the eternal fatherland, while the light of wisdom illustrates them. Whom although the incarnate Wisdom had come to aggregate by the effect of the work, yet to His divinity they already assisted within through His foreknowledge. But since the ancient enemy is discussed about his ways when the Redeemer comes, let us hear what he may say.

CHAPTER XXII.

[Rec. XVII.]

IBID.---I have circled the earth, and walked through it.

41. The devil circled the earth, because he circumvented and possessed all men.---For from Adam, before the coming of the Lord, he drew after him all the nations of the Gentiles. I have circled the earth and walked through it, because he impressed the vestiges of his iniquity through the hearts of the Gentiles. For falling from high places, he rightly possessed human minds, because he bound them willingly in the chain of his fault; and he wandered through the world so much the more widely, as no one was found free through all things from his guilt. To whom to have circled the world as if from power, was to have found no man who fully resisted him. But now let Satan return, that is, let the divine power constrain him from the effect of his malice, because He has now appeared in the flesh who had nothing of the contagion of sin from the infirmity of the flesh. He came humble, whom even the proud enemy might admire; so that he who had despised the strong things of His divinity, might also fear the weak things of His humanity. Whence also presently by a wonderful significance, that very infirmity of humanity is proposed to be wondered at against him, so that it is said:

CHAPTER XXIII.

VERSE 8.---Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth?

42. Until Christ should come, of whom the things said of Job are again explained. He assumed the humility of the flesh, without injury to His majesty. By His virtues He repressed the pride of the devil.---That Job is interpreted 'sorrowing,' we have already said a little before. He is truly called sorrowing by figure, who is related, by the testimony of the Prophet, to bear our sorrows. There is none like him in the earth, because every man is only man, but He is God and man. There is none like him in the earth, because although every adopted son advances to perceive divinity, yet he by no means receives to be God by nature. Who is well also called a servant, because He did not disdain to take the form of a servant. Nor did the assumed humility of the flesh bring injury to His majesty; because both so as to take those things which were to be saved, and yet not to change those things which were held, He neither diminished divine things by humanity, nor consumed human things by divinity; because although it is said by Paul: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant (Philip. 2:6), for Him to have emptied Himself, is to have shown Himself visible from the magnitude of His invisibility, so that the form of a servant might cover that which uncircumscribed penetrated all things from His divinity. But for God to say to Satan by figure: Hast thou considered my servant Job? is to demonstrate His only-begotten Son as admirable against him in the form of a servant. For by that, in which He made Him known to be of such great virtue in the flesh, He indicated to the proud adversary, as it were, what he should sorrowfully consider. But because He had brought in a good thing for him to wonder at, it remains that He should still add His virtues by enumerating them to repress his pride. It follows.

CHAPTER XXIV.

[Vet. XXIII].

IBID.---A man simple and upright, and fearing God, and departing from evil.

43. In what way Christ is simple, upright, etc. He made His divinity doubtful to the devil because of the things which He suffered.---For there came among men the mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus, to provide an example of life to men, simple; for not sparing malignant spirits, upright; for vanquishing pride, fearing God; but for cleansing the uncleanness of life in His elect, departing from evil. For of Him it is principally said by Isaiah: And the spirit of the fear of the Lord shall fill him (Isaiah 11:3). And He singularly departed from evil: because He would not imitate the deeds which He found in men, since, as Peter testifies: He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth (1 Peter 2:22). It follows: And Satan answering said: Doth Job fear God in vain? Hast not thou made a hedge about him, and about his house, and about all his substance round about? Thou hast blessed the works of his hands, and his possession hath increased in the land. The ancient enemy knew that the Redeemer of the human race, his own vanquisher, had come into the world: whence also it is said by a possessed man in the Gospel: What have we to do with thee, thou Son of God? Art thou come hither to torment us before the time? (Matt. 8:29). Who nevertheless, when at first he perceived Him to be passible, when he saw that he could endure mortal things of humanity, all that he suspected of His divinity came into doubt for him by the haughtiness of his pride. For knowing nothing but pride, while he beholds Him to be humble, he doubted that He was God. Whence also he turned himself to the arguments of temptations, saying: If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread (Matt. 4:3). Because therefore he saw Him passible, he believed Him not to be God born, but one guarded by the grace of God. Whence also he is now related to infer:

VERSES 9, 10.---Hast not thou made a hedge about him, and about his house, and about all his substance round about? Thou hast blessed the works of his hands, and his possession hath increased in the land.

44. The proud devil, seeing Him humble, doubted that He was God.---For he says that He and His house were hedged about by God; because by tempting He could not penetrate His conscience. He asserts His substance was hedged about, because he does not presume to invade His elect. He complains that God had blessed the works of His hands, and that His possession had increased in the land: because namely, pining away, he sees that His faith is multiplied in the knowledge of men, through the apostles preaching. For His possession is said to increase, while, the preachers laboring, the number of the faithful is daily increased. These things therefore Satan is to have said to God, to have felt such things by envying. These things Satan is to have said to God, to have grieved at these things by pining away. It follows:

[Vet. XXIV].

VERSE 11.---But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.

45. He explored His divinity by temptations.---For Him whom in the time of tranquillity he believed to be guarded by the grace of God, he thought could sin through passion. As if he should say openly: Man, being questioned by afflictions, is recognized as a sinner, who in miracles is thought to be God. Therefore the Lord said to Satan:

CHAPTER XXVII.

VERSE 12.---Behold, all that he hath is in thy power [hand]; only upon himself put not forth thine hand.

46. The hand of Satan must be understood not as power, but as temptation. ---When we discuss the sacred history under a figurative understanding, the hand of Satan must be understood not as power, but as temptation. All things, therefore, which he has, are given into the hand of the tempter, and the hand of temptation is forbidden to be extended upon him; which, however, is allowed to be done when his substance is lost: because, forsooth, first Judea, which had been his possession, was taken away in infidelity, and afterwards His flesh was fastened to the gibbet of the cross. He, therefore, who first bore with Judea in opposition, and afterwards came even to the cross, lost as it were what he previously held, and afterwards in Himself bore the wickedness of the adversary.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

IBID.---And Satan went forth from the presence [face] of the Lord.

47. The devil, having obtained his wish, goes out from the presence of the Lord. ---As has been said above, Satan went forth from the presence of the Lord, because he attained to the objects of his desire. For he was as it were before Him, so long as on His account he could not fulfill what he wickedly thirsted for.

CHAPTER XXIX.

VERSE 13.---And there was a day when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house.

48. The elder son of the Lord is the Jewish people. ---We have said that the sons and daughters of blessed Job designated either the order of the Apostles, or the multitude of all the faithful. But the incarnate Lord first chose a few from Judea to the faith, and afterwards gathered to Himself a multitude of the Gentile people. But who should be understood as the elder son of the Lord, if not the Jewish people, who had long ago been generated by the teaching of the Law given to them: and the younger the Gentile people, who was gathered even at the end of the world? Therefore, because while Satan unknowingly served the utility of men, and through the corrupted hearts of persecutors sought license for the Lord's Passion, the holy Apostles did not yet know that the Gentiles were to be gathered to God, and preached the secrets of the faith to Judea alone; when Satan is said to have gone out from the Lord, the sons and daughters are related to be feasting in the house of the first-born brother. For it had been said to them: Go not into the way of the Gentiles (Matth. X, 5). For after the death and resurrection of the Lord they were turned to the preaching to the Gentiles. Whence also they say in their Acts: It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles (Acts XIII, 46). These sons of the bridegroom, therefore, of whom it is said by the voice of the same bridegroom: Can the children of the bride-chamber fast, as long as the bridegroom is with them? (Matth. IX, 15), feast in the house of the first-born brother, because forsooth the Apostles were still feeding on the delicacies of Holy Scripture in the gathering of the Jewish people alone.

CHAPTER XXX

[Vet. XXV, Rec. XVIII].

VERSES 14, 15.---And there came a messenger unto Job, and said, The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding beside them: and the Sabeans fell upon them, and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

49. The simple, adhering to the more perfect, are fed by their understanding. ---What else do we understand by the figure of the oxen than those who work well; what else by the asses than certain ones living simply? Who are related to be feeding well beside the oxen; because the minds of the simple, even when they cannot grasp high things, are the more near, as they believe the goods of their brethren to be their own through charity; and since they know not how to envy the senses of others, they are least divided in their pasture. Therefore the asses refresh themselves together with the oxen, because the slower being joined to the prudent, are fed by their intelligence. Now Sabeans are interpreted as 'captivators'. And who else are designated by the name of captivators, if not the unclean spirits, who lead all whom they subject to themselves captive into infidelity? Who also strike the young men with the sword, because they grievously wound with the darts of their temptation those whom a youthful constancy does not yet keep free or robust. Who indeed begin good things well, but in the very tenderness of their beginning are laid prostrate by the captivating unclean spirits. These the enemy strikes with the sword, because he transfixes them with the despair of eternity.

[REC. XIX.] 50. Prophecy, while others perish, remains for ever. ---But what is this, that a messenger came, saying, I only am escaped alone?

Who is this messenger, who, while others perish, alone escapes, if not the prophetic word, which, while all the evils which it predicted come to pass, returns alone as it were sound to the Lord? For while it is known to have spoken the truth concerning the fall of the lost, it is shown to have lived as it were among the dead. Hence it is, that a servant is sent to lead Rebecca into marriage with Isaac (Gen. XXIV, 9), because forsooth prophecy being interposed serves to betroth the Church to the Lord. Therefore, when the Sabeans rushed in, the servant alone escaped to tell it, because while malignant spirits were leading the minds of the weak into captivity, the sentence of prophecy grew strong; which, foretelling that same captivity, says: Therefore my people are gone into captivity, because they have no knowledge (Isai. V, 13). Prophecy, therefore, is as it were saved, while the captivity which it predicted is shown. It follows:

[Vet. XXVI, Rec. XX].

VERSE 16.---While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The fire of God is fallen from heaven, and hath burned up the sheep, and the servants, and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

51. The fire consuming Job's sheep and servants signifies the envy of the priests against Christ. The fire torments the wicked now through envy, afterwards through vengeance. ---All who held the office of preaching in the synagogue were rightly called heaven, because forsooth they were believed to have wisdom in heavenly things. Whence also Moses, when he excited the priests and the people to the words of his admonition, said: Give ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth (Deut. XXXII, 1, sec. LXX); by heaven, namely, signifying the order of those in authority, but by earth the subject people. In this place, therefore, we not unsuitably understand by heaven the priests, or Pharisees, or doctors of the law, who, while they served in heavenly offices before the eyes of men, seemed as it were to shine from above. But because they were exceedingly moved in opposition to our Redeemer, it was as if fire fell from heaven, while for the purpose of deceiving the ignorant people, the flame of envy blazed forth even from those who were thought to teach the truth. For we know by the testimony of the Gospel, that envying the doctrine of truth, they sought an opportunity for the betrayal of the Lord; but fearing the people, they dared not make known what they were plotting. Hence also it is written therein, that they say to dissuade the people: Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him? But this people who knoweth not the law are cursed (John VII, 48). But what do we understand by the sheep and the servants, if not all the innocent, but yet still weak? who while they feared to endure the opposition of the Pharisees and rulers, were consumed by the burning of infidelity. Let it be said therefore: The fire of God is fallen from heaven, and hath burned up the sheep and the servants, and consumed them; that is, the flame of envy fell from the hearts of those in authority, and set on fire whatever good was arising in the common people; because while evil rulers demand their own honor against the truth, they subvert the hearts of their followers from all rectitude. Where also it is well added: And I only am escaped alone to tell thee; because while the predicted cause of malice is fulfilled, the word of prophecy escapes the destruction of fallacy, which says: Yea, the fire shall devour thine adversaries (Isai. XXVI, 11). As if he should say openly: Fire not only torments the wicked afterwards by vengeance, but now also it burns them by envy, because they who are afterwards to be punished by the suffering of retribution, now affect themselves with the torment of envy. The servant therefore returns escaping alone, and announces that the sheep and servants have perished by fire, while prophecy, forsaking the Jewish people, manifests that it spoke the truth when it said: Jealousy hath taken hold of an untaught people. As if he should say openly: While the people would not discuss the words of the prophets, but gave their credulity to the words of the envious, they perished by the fire of jealousy, because they burned themselves in the flame of another's envy. It follows:

[Vet. XXVII].

VERSE 17.---While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The Chaldeans made out three bands, and fell upon the camels, and have carried them away, yea, and slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

52. The Chaldeans making three bands are the Pharisees, Herodians, and Sadducees. The camels are the Samaritans, or the Jews who adhere to the mere letter of the Law. ---Since we know that Chaldeans are interpreted as 'fierce', who else are designated by the name of the Chaldeans, but the authors of persecution breaking forth even into open cries of malice, when they say, Crucify Him, crucify Him (Luke XXIII, 21; Mark XV, 13)? Who made out of themselves three bands, when the Pharisees, Herodians, and Sadducees divided themselves to propose questions to the Lord. Who indeed were vanquished by the mouth of Wisdom: but because it must be believed that they drew certain foolish ones after them, having formed bands, they carried away the camels. For each of their orders corrupted the hearts of the unwise in the evil things which it savored; and while by persuasion it drew them on to destruction, it led as it were the crooked minds of the weak into captivity. For while the Lord was preaching in Samaria, many of the Samaritans were received into the possession of our same Redeemer. But did not they who, on account of the seven husbands of one woman being dead, tempt the Lord concerning the despair of the resurrection (Matth. XXII, 25), by no means endeavor to lead back the believing Samaritans from the faith, whom it is certain are ignorant of the hope of the resurrection? Who, while they receive some things from the Law and despise others, after the manner of camels, chew the cud as it were like a clean animal, but by no means divide the hoof like an unclean one. Although those camels chewing the cud, but yet not dividing the hoof, also indicate those who in Judea had heard the history according to the letter, but knew not how to discern its virtue spiritually. These the Chaldeans seize in three bands; while the Pharisees, Herodians, and Sadducees pervert them from all rectitude of sense by their iniquitous persuasion. And at the same time they strike the servants with the sword, because even if there were any in the people who could already use reason, they opposed them not by the virtue of reason, but by the authority of power; and while they wish themselves as it were to be imitated as rulers by their subjects, even if those who follow can understand something, yet from the authority of the government they have taken up, they draw them to destruction. From whom well does the servant alone escape to tell it: because while the Pharisees, Herodians, and Sadducees were committing iniquities, the prophetic word, deserting them, grows strong, which says: And they that handle the law knew me not (Jer. II, 8). It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIII

VERSES 18, 19.---While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house: and, behold, there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead.

53. The Jewish people figured in the first-born of Job. ---We have already said a little before that we understand by the sons and daughters the preaching Apostles and the subject common people: who are related to be feasting in the house of the first-born brother, because they were feeding on the delicacies of sacred preaching in the habitation as yet of the Jewish people. But suddenly a great wind rushed in from the region of the wilderness. The region of the wilderness is the heart of the unbelieving, which while the Creator deserts it, no inhabitant cultivates. But what else is understood by a great wind but a strong temptation? A great wind therefore rushed in from the region of the wilderness; because in the Passion of our Redeemer a strong temptation came from the hearts of the Jews against His faithful ones. The region of the wilderness may also not unsuitably be understood as the abandoned multitude of unclean spirits. From which the wind came, and shook the house, because from them temptation proceeded, and moved the hearts of the persecutors.

54. His house overthrown is the synagogue, destroyed by the shaking of its four corners, that is, the four orders. Whence also the children were overwhelmed. ---But this house, in which the children were feasting, stood on four corners. For we have known three orders of rulers in the synagogue, namely, of the priests, the scribes, and the elders of the people. To whom if we join also the Pharisees, we find four corners in this house. From the region of the wilderness, therefore, the wind came, and shook the four corners of the house, because temptation rushed in from the unclean spirits, and excited the minds of the four orders into the malice of persecution. Which house falling, overwhelmed the children, because while Judea fell into the cruelty of the Lord's persecution, it overthrew the faith of the Apostles with the dread of despair. For they saw their Master only held, and already denying Him they were fleeing in different directions. And although an internal hand held their spirit to life in foreknowledge, yet for a time carnal fear extinguished them from the life of faith. They, therefore, who left their Author while Judea was raging, were slain as it were by the house being overthrown, its corners being shaken. But what do we believe was done at that time with the flock of the faithful, when we know that even the rams themselves fled? But in the midst of these things one escapes to tell it, because the prophetic word, which had announced these things, showed that it had grown strong, saying of the persecuting people: What hath my beloved to do in mine house, seeing she hath wrought lewdness with many? (Jer. XI, 15); saying of the good preachers, who yet fled in the Passion: My neighbors stood afar off (Psalm XXXVII, 12); saying of all who were greatly terrified: I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad (Zech. XIII, 7; Matth. XXVI, 31). It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIV

[Vet. XXIX, Rec. XXII].

VERSE 20.---Then Job arose, and rent his mantle.

55. Job arising and rending his mantle foreshadows Christ. ---When the house fell and his children were extinguished, Job arose, because Judea being lost in infidelity, and the preachers falling into the death of fear, the Redeemer of the human race raised Himself from the death of His flesh: and demonstrated with how great judgment He deserted His persecutors. For His arising is to show with what strictness He abandons sinners, for His lying down as it were is to tolerate evils patiently. He arises, therefore, when He exerts the judgment of justice against the reprobate. Whence also He is rightly said to have rent His garments. For what was the garment of the Lord but the Synagogue, which adhered to the expectation of His incarnation while the prophets were preaching? For as He is now clothed by those by whom He is loved, as Paul attests who says: That He might present it to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle (Eph. V, 27). For that which is said to have no spot or wrinkle, is truly shown to be a rational garment, both clean by action and stretched out by hope. Thus when Judea believed He was to be incarnate, by adhering she was nonetheless a garment.

56. The Synagogue was His rent garment, some believing, others not. ---But because He came as the one expected, and coming taught new things, and teaching performed wonders, and performing wonders tolerated evils; He rent the garment with which He had been clothed, while in Judea He took some away from infidelity, and left others in infidelity. What therefore is the rent garment, but Judea divided in contrary opinions? For if His garment had not been rent, the Evangelist would not have said that while the Lord was preaching, there arose a division among the people, so that some said, He is a good man; but others said, Nay, but He deceiveth the people (John VII, 12). His garment was as it were rent, which being divided by opinions lost the unity of concord. It follows:

IBID.---And shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped.

57. He fell as it were upon the ground with his head shaved, while the Jewish priesthood being rejected, He descended to the Gentiles. ---What is signified by the hair being cut off, but the subtlety of the sacraments; what by the head, but the highest point of the priesthood? Whence also it is said to the prophet Ezekiel: Thou son of man, take thee a sharp knife, a razor that shaveth hair, and take it and cause it to pass upon thine head and upon thy beard (Ezek. V, 1), that forsooth by the prophet's act might be expressed the judgment of the Redeemer, who appearing in the flesh shaved His head, because He took away the sacraments of His precepts from the Jewish priesthood; He shaved His beard, because deserting the Israelitish kingdom, He cut off the beauty of its virtue. [Vet. XXX.] But what in this place is expressed by the ground, if not man the sinner? For to the first sinning man it was said: Dust [earth] thou art, and unto dust [earth] shalt thou return (Gen. III, 19). By the name of the ground, therefore, the sinful Gentile world is designated. For while Judea believed itself to be just, it is certain how reprobate it thought of the Gentiles, Paul attesting, who says: We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles (Gal. II, 15). Our Mediator, therefore, fell upon the ground as it were with his head shorn, because deserting Judea, while He took away His sacraments from its priesthood, He came to the knowledge of the Gentiles. For He shaved the hair from His head, because He took away the sacraments of the Law from that His first priesthood; and He fell upon the ground, because He gave Himself to sinners to be saved; and while He deserted those who seemed to themselves just, He assumed those who both knew and confessed themselves to be unjust. Hence He Himself also says in the Gospel: For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see; and that they which see might be made blind (John IX, 39). Hence also the pillar of the cloud, which went before the people in the wilderness (Exod. XIII, 21), radiated with the splendor of fire not by day, but by night, because forsooth our Redeemer, by the example of His conversation, providing leadership to those who follow, shone with no light to those who were confident in their own justice; but to those who acknowledged the darkness of their own sins, He shone with the fire of His love. Nor let the mind think it unworthy that Job is said to fall down, in this signification of the Redeemer. For it is written: The Lord sent a word into Jacob, and it hath lighted upon [fallen in] Israel (Isai. IX, 8). For Jacob is interpreted as 'supplanter', but Israel as 'one seeing God'. And what is designated by Jacob but the Jewish people; what by Israel but the Gentile people? Because Him whom Jacob studied to supplant by the death of the flesh, this same One the Gentile world saw as God through the eyes of faith. Therefore the word sent to Jacob fell in Israel, because Him whom at His coming the Jewish people rejected, Him the confessing Gentile people suddenly found. For of the Holy Spirit it is written: The Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word (Acts X, 44).

58. Why the Word of God or the Holy Spirit is said to fall. ---For this reason, moreover, either the Word of God or the Holy Spirit is said in Holy Scripture to fall, that His unexpected advent may be expressed. For what rushes down or falls, comes suddenly to the bottom. For the Mediator therefore to have fallen as it were upon the ground, is to have come unexpectedly to the Gentiles with no preceding signs. But it is well said that falling down He worshipped, because while He Himself took up the humility of the flesh, He infused the vows of humility into those who believe in Him. For He did it, because He taught it to be done; as it is said also of His Spirit: The Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered (Rom. VIII, 26). For He does not ask, who is equal, but is said to intercede; because forsooth whomsoever He has filled, He makes them intercede: although our Redeemer also showed this in Himself, who prayed to the Father also when He was approaching His Passion. For what wonder is it, if in the form of a servant by praying He subjected Himself to the Father, in which also He tolerated the hands of sinners even to the extremes of death? It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVI

[Vet. XXXI, Rec. XXIII].

VERSE 21.---Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither.

59. Christ is to return at the end of the world to the Jews from whom He went forth. ---The mother of the Redeemer according to the flesh was the Synagogue, from which He came forth to us visible through the body. But she held Him covered within herself by the veil of the letter, while she neglected to open the eyes of the mind to His spiritual intelligence. Because she would not see Him as God latent in the flesh of a human body, she despised considering Him as naked in His divinity. But He went out naked from His mother's womb: because proceeding from the flesh of the Synagogue, He came conspicuous to the Gentiles. Which was well signified by Joseph fleeing and leaving his mantle behind (Gen. XXXIX, 12). For when the adulterous woman would have used him ill, leaving his mantle he fled out of doors, because while the Synagogue, believing the Lord to be a mere man, wished to constrain Him as it were in an adulterous embrace, He Himself left the covering of the letter to her eyes, and presented Himself conspicuous to the Gentiles for the knowledge of the power of His divinity. Whence also Paul said: Even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart (2 Cor. III, 15), because forsooth the adulterous woman retained the mantle with herself, and lost him whom she held ill, naked. He therefore who, coming from the Synagogue, appeared conspicuous to the faith of the Gentiles, went out naked from his mother's womb. But does He desert her altogether? And where is that which is said by the prophet: Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved (Isai. X, 22; Rom. IX, 27)? Where that which is written: Until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in, and so all Israel shall be saved (Rom. XI, 25, 26)? There will be a time, therefore, when He shall appear conspicuous even to the Synagogue. It will be in the end of the world without doubt, when to the remnants of His nation He shall make Himself known as He is, God. Whence also it is well said here: Naked shall I return thither. For He returns naked to His mother's womb, when at the end of this world He, who being made man in time is despised, is declared God before all ages to the eyes of His Synagogue. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVII

[Rec. XXIV].

IBID.---The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: as it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done: blessed be the name of the Lord.

60. God gave Judaea to Christ and took it away. ---Our Redeemer, in that He is God, gives all things with the Father; but in that He is man, He receives all things from the Father among all things. Let Him say therefore of Judaea, when she believed the coming mystery of His incarnation: The Lord gave. Let Him say of Judaea, when she had despised the expected presence of His incarnation: The Lord hath taken away. For she was given, when she believed in future things through some; but she was taken away, as the merit of her own blindness required, when she despised to venerate the things believed through some.

61. Christ taught by example to bless God in scourges. ---But let Him teach those believing in Him, so that being placed in scourges they may know how to bless the Lord, when it is added: As it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done; blessed be the name of the Lord. Whence also, by the witness of the Gospel (Matth. XXVI, 26), when He is said to draw near to His passion, having taken bread He is recorded to have given thanks. He therefore gives thanks, who receives the scourges of another's iniquity. And He who showed nothing worthy of smiting, humbly blesses in the smiting; that from this he might clearly show what each one ought to do in the scourge of his own fault, if He Himself calmly bears the scourges of another's fault; that from this he might show what the subject should do in correction, if He being equal, placed in the scourge, gives thanks to the Father. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

VERSE 22.---In all these things Job sinned not, nor spoke any foolish thing against God.

62. Guile among men is wisdom, with God it is foolishness. ---Because it is asserted that he neither sinned, nor spoke any foolish thing against God; of Him Peter, as we have already said, openly testifies, saying: Who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth (1 Pet. II, 22). For guile in the mouth, the more prudently it is practiced among men, the more foolishly it lacks sense with God, as Paul attests, who says: The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God (1 Cor. III, 19). Therefore, because guile was not in His mouth, He undoubtedly said nothing foolish. The priests and elders foolishly believed that He spoke against God, when being questioned at the time of His passion, He testified that He was the Son of God. Whence also they say, inquiring: What need we any further witnesses? behold, now we have heard the blasphemy (Matth. XXVI, 65). But He said nothing foolish against God:

because speaking the truth, He brought this upon the infidels even by dying, which a little later He showed by rising again for the redemption of all.

[Vet. XXXII.] 63. MORAL SENSE.---Satan assists God with the holy angels, interposing evil thoughts with good ones. ---We have briefly touched upon these things treated as a signification of our Head: now let us unfold them to be treated morally for the edification of His body, so that what is narrated as done outwardly in work, we may know how it is done inwardly in the mind. For when the sons of God assist before God, among them also assists Satan, because very often into our good thoughts, which are sown in our heart by the operation of the coming of the Holy Spirit, that ancient enemy craftily interposes and joins himself, so that he may perturb the well-thought things, and tear asunder those badly perturbed. But He who created us by no means deserts us in temptation. For He makes our enemy, who covers himself against us in snares, detectable to us by the illustration of His light; on which account He soon says to him:

CHAPTER XXXIX.

VERSE 7.---From whence comest thou?

64. To whom must it be said, "from whence comest thou?" ---For to inquire of the crafty enemy is to declare his snares to us, so that where we perceive him entering the heart, we may watch against him with strong circumspection.

CHAPTER XL.

IBID.---Who answering said: I have circled the earth, and walked through it.

65. May God detect his snares for us. ---For Satan to circle the earth is to search carnal hearts, and to seek from whence he may find an occasion for accusation. He circles the earth, because he circumvents human hearts, so that he may take away good things, that he may insert evil things into minds, that he may heap up those inserted, that he may perfect those heaped up, so that he may acquire as companions for punishment those perfected in iniquities. And it is to be noted that he asserts that he did not fly over, but walked through, because forsooth he by no means quickly deserts him whom he tempts; but where he finds a soft heart, there he fixes the foot of wretched persuasion, so that by lingering he may imprint the vestiges of a depraved action, and from the likeness of his own iniquity, render reprobate those whom he can. But against this one blessed Job is praised, and it is said:

CHAPTER XLI.

VERSE 8.---Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him on the earth, a simple and upright man, and fearing God, and departing from evil?

66. To praise is God's to give good things, and to guard those given. ---Whom divine inspiration strengthens against the enemy, him as it were in the ears of Satan God praises. For to praise is His, both first to grant good things, and after they are granted to guard them. But the ancient enemy rages against the good the more severely, as he perceives them to be walled by the gift of divine protection. Whence also subjoining he says:

CHAPTER XLII.

VERSE 9.---Does Job fear God for nought? Hast thou not walled him, and his house, and all his substance round about? Thou hast blessed the works of his hands, and his possession has increased on the earth.

67. Man does not stand by his own strength. ---As if he should say openly: Why do you praise him whom you strengthen by protecting? For if I were despised, he would be a man worthy of your praises if he stood against me by his own strength. Whence soon he maliciously asks about the man, what nevertheless the protector of man kindly grants. For it is added:

CHAPTER XLIII

[Rec. XXV].

VERSE 11. But stretch out thy hand a little, and touch all things which he possesses, unless he shall bless thee to thy face.

68. The elect profit in temptation. ---For very often, while we fecundly return the fruits of virtues, while we are powerful in continual prosperity, the mind is somewhat lifted up, so that it thinks those good things which it has exist from itself. Which good things, forsooth, the ancient enemy maliciously desires to touch; but God does not permit these to be tempted except kindly, so that while the mind, when temptation strikes, is shaken in the good things in which it was rejoicing, the weakness of its imbecility being known, it may be more robustly solidified in the hope of divine aid. And it happens by a wonderful dispensation of piety, that from whence the malignant enemy tempts the heart, so that he may kill it, from thence the merciful Creator instructs it, so that it may live. Whence also it is well added:

CHAPTER XLIV.

VERSE 12.---Behold, all things which he has are in thy hand, only stretch not forth thy hand against him.

69. God bestowing perseverance. ---As if he should say openly: I so grant the goods of each elect one to be tempted by you outwardly, that you nevertheless may know, that I preserve him for myself persevering in the root of the mind. Where it is well added:

CHAPTER XLV.

IBID.---And Satan went out from the face of the Lord:

70. By whose moderation the devil does not wound the hearts of the good unto destruction. ---Because by this, that he is by no means permitted to prevail even to the failure of the heart, being excluded from the innermost parts, he wanders outside. Who even if he very often disturbs the virtues of the mind, by that very fact he is outside, because God resisting, he does not wound the hearts of the good unto destruction. For he is permitted to rage against them only so far as it is necessary so that being instructed by temptations they may be solidified; lest they should attribute those good things which they do to their own strength, lest they should desert themselves in the torpor of security, and be dissolved from the girding of fear: but that they may watch the more skillfully for the custody of their progress, as they see themselves always standing in the line of battle of temptations against the adversary.

CHAPTER XLVI

[Vet. XXXIII].

VERSES 13, 14, 15.---And on a certain day when his sons and daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house, there came a messenger unto Job, to say: The oxen were ploughing, and the asses feeding beside them, and the Sabeans fell upon them, and took all away, and slew the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

71. Faith the first of all virtues. ---In the heart of the elect, the wisdom of following good things is born first, and this is brought forth as it were the firstborn offspring through the gift of the Spirit. Which wisdom, in truth, is our faith, as the prophet attests, who says: Except ye believe, ye shall not understand (Isai. VII, 9. sec. LXX). For then we truly have wisdom for understanding, when we present the faith of our belief to all things which the Creator says. In the house therefore of the firstborn brother the children feast, when the rest of the virtues banquet in faith. Which if it is not first begotten in our heart, whatever other things there are cannot be good, even if they seem good. In the house of the firstborn brother the children banquet, while our virtues are satiated with the food of the sacred word in the habitation of faith. For it is written: Without faith it is impossible to please God (Hebr. XI, 6). Then therefore our virtues take the true banquets of life, when they begin to be nourished by the sacraments of faith. In the house of the firstborn brother the children banquet, because unless the rest of the virtues, filled with the banquets of wisdom, do prudently those things which they desire, they can by no means be virtues.

72. How variously the devil lies in wait for our virtues. ---But behold, while the good things which we do are fed by the banquets of wisdom and faith, our enemy takes away the ploughing oxen and the feeding asses, and kills the servants with the sword. What do we take for the ploughing oxen, except our more serious thoughts? which while they prepare the heart with studious exercise, return rich fruits of progress. What do we understand by the feeding asses, except the simple motions of the heart? which while we studiously restrain from the error of duplicity, we nourish as it were in a field of free purity. But very often the crafty enemy, when he perceives serious thoughts in the heart, corrupts them under an introduced delight of pleasure; and while he sees simple motions of the heart, he shows subtle points of inventions; so that while praise for subtlety is sought, the simplicity of purity is lost; and if he is not able to draw it even to a depraved work, nevertheless by tempting he harms by stealing from the thoughts of the good; so that while he is known to perturb the good things of the mind, he may seem to have taken them away as if from the foundation. The thoughts of charity can also be understood by the ploughing oxen; by which we endeavor to profit others, when we desire to cut the hardness of a brotherly heart by preaching. The meekness of patience can also be signified by the asses, which forsooth resist with no madness of ferocity those who burden them. And often the ancient enemy, when he perceives us willing to profit others by speaking, merges the mind into a certain torpor of leisure; so that it is not pleasing to profit others, even when it is free from its own affairs. Therefore he takes away the ploughing oxen, when he breaks the thoughts of the mind devoted to the fruits of brotherly utility, through an instilled torpor of negligence. And although the hearts of the elect watch within the secrets of their own thought, and weigh what they sustain from the tempter, overcoming it, nevertheless by that very fact the malignant enemy rejoices that he has snatched something, by which he prevails over the thoughts of the good even for a moment.

73. With what vigilance his attempts must be met. The office of discretion in temptation. Often, when he sees a mind prepared for endurance, he searches out what is most loved by it, and there he inserts the snares of scandal, so that the more a thing is loved, the more easily patience may be disturbed through it. And indeed, the hearts of the elect always solicitously return to themselves, and afflict themselves gravely even for a slight movement of transgression; and while, being moved, they learn how they ought to have stood, sometimes they are better solidified by being shaken. But the ancient enemy, while he disturbs thoughts of endurance even for a moment, exults as if he had carried away the she-asses from the field of the heart. Moreover, in those things which we dispose ourselves to do, we solicitously weigh with rational custody what is suitable for which things. But for the most part, the enemy, while he rushes upon us with a sudden perturbation of temptation, unexpectedly forestalling the circumspections of the heart, kills as it were the very guardians, the young men, with the sword. Yet one escapes to report that the others have perished, because in that which the mind suffers from the enemy, the discretion of reason always returns to the soul; and it indicates that it alone has escaped, as it bravely weighs within itself whatever it has endured. Therefore, while the others perish, one returns to the house, when, the motions being disturbed in temptation, discretion recurs to the conscience; so that what the preoccupied mind thinks it has lost by sudden incursions, it may receive back when afflicted by the study of compunction.

CHAPTER XLVII.

VERSE 16.---And while he was still speaking, another came and said: The fire of God fell from heaven, and having touched the sheep and the young men, consumed them; and I alone escaped to tell you.

74. The devil attempts to corrupt chaste thoughts. But discretion escapes the danger. What is designated by the sheep, if not innocence of thoughts? What by the sheep, if not the purity of good hearts? Now we have said a little before that heaven is called the air; whence also we name the birds of heaven. And we know that the unclean spirits, who fell from the ethereal heaven, wander in this space between heaven and earth; they envy the hearts of men ascending to heavenly things as much as they see themselves cast down from heavenly things through the uncleanness of their own pride. Because, therefore, a flame of envy rushes from the powers of the air against the purity of our thoughts, the fire comes from heaven upon the sheep. For often they inflame the clean thoughts of our mind with the heat of lust; and they consume the sheep as if with fire, while they perturb the chaste motions of the soul with the temptation of luxury. This is called the fire of God, because although God does not cause it, nevertheless it is produced by His permission. And because by a sudden impulse they sometimes overwhelm the very circumspections of the mind, they kill as it were the guardians, the young men, with the sword. Yet one escapes unharmed, while persevering discretion subtly regards all that the mind suffers, and alone escapes the danger of death; because even with the thoughts perturbed, discretion does not succumb, so that it may report its losses to the soul, and recall as it were the master to lamentation.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

VERSE 17.---But while he was yet speaking, another came and said: The Chaldeans made three troops, and fell upon the camels, and took them, and moreover they have smitten the young men with the sword; and I only have escaped to tell you.

75. To what great dangers the stewardship of earthly things is subject. By the camels, which have something clean, in that they chew the cud, and something unclean, in that they by no means divide the hoof, we have already said above that the good stewardships of temporal things are understood, in which the more extended the care is, the more manifoldly the enemy lies in wait for us. For everyone who presides over the stewardship of earthly things lies more widely open to the darts of the hidden enemy. For he strives to act with foresight in some things, and often while he subtly foresees future things with caution, being incautious he by no means sees present losses; often while he watches over present things, he slumbers as to foreseeing things at hand; often while he acts sluggishly in some things, he neglects those which are to be done vigilantly; often while he shows himself more vigilant than is right in action, he harms the things subject to him worse by the very restlessness of his action. But sometimes he strives to set a limit to his tongue, but the burden of stewardship demanding it, he is forbidden to be silent. Sometimes while he restrains himself with excessive censure, he is silent even as to those things which he ought to have spoken. Sometimes while he relaxes himself more widely to bring in necessary things, he says even what he ought not to have spoken. But for the most part he is involved in such volumes of thoughts that he can scarcely bear those which he providently turns over within himself; and though he does nothing in work, he sweats vehemently under the great weight of his heart. For because the things which he suffers within himself are hard, he is fatigued though quiet and at leisure without. For for the most part the mind beholds things as if they were coming, and proposes its whole intention against them; and a great heat of contention inserts itself, sleep flees, night is turned into day; and while the bed holds the limbs quiet without, within there is litigation with great clamors in the forum of the heart. And it often happens that none of those things which are foreseen come to pass: and all that thought, which had long prepared itself with full intention, suddenly rests empty. But the mind ceases from necessary things so much the more as it thinks upon vain things more widely. Because, therefore, the malignant spirits strike the cares of stewardship sometimes with a torpid or a precipitated action, sometimes confound them with a sluggish or an immoderate speech, but almost always press them with excessive masses of thoughts, the Chaldeans seize the camels in three troops. For to make as it were three troops against the camels is to lay waste the studies of earthly stewardships sometimes by illicit work, sometimes by superfluous speech, sometimes by inordinate thought; so that while the mind strives to extend itself effectively to administer things without, it may be separated from the consideration of itself; and so it may not know the losses which it suffers concerning itself, in that it labors with a stronger study than is becoming towards the things of others. But the upright mind, when it undertakes the cares of stewardship, attends to what it owes to itself and what to its neighbors; and neither through the immoderation of care for others does it neglect its own studies, nor through the vigilance of its own utility does it postpone those of others. But nevertheless for the most part, while the mind watchfully attends to both, while it is at leisure with great circumspections towards itself and those things which are committed to it, being suddenly disturbed by the occurrence of any cause that arises, it is so hurried headlong that all its circumspections are suddenly overwhelmed by it. Whence also the Chaldeans strike the guardians of the camels, the young men, with the sword. Yet one returns; because among these things the reason of discretion meets the eyes of our mind, and the soul, being solicitous for itself, understands what it loses within by a sudden impulse of temptation. It follows.

CHAPTER XLIX.

VERSES 18, 19.---He was still speaking, and behold another entered and said: Your sons and your daughters were eating and drinking wine in the house of their firstborn brother; suddenly a vehement wind rushed from the region of the desert, and shook the four corners of the house, which, falling, overwhelmed your children, and they are dead; and I alone escaped to tell you.

76. The spiritual building rests upon four virtues. Whence it is shaken. As we have already said above, the region of the desert is the forsaken multitude of unclean spirits, which, while it deserted the blessedness of its Creator, lost as it were the hand of the cultivator, from which the vehement wind comes and subverts the house; because a strong temptation steals upon us from the unclean spirits, and overturns the conscience from the state of its tranquility. Now this house consists in four corners, because surely the solid building of our mind is sustained by prudence, temperance, fortitude, and justice. This house subsists in four corners, because in these four virtues the whole structure of a good work rises. Whence also the four rivers of paradise irrigate the earth, because while the heart is poured into by these four virtues, it is tempered from all the heat of carnal desires. But sometimes while laziness steals upon the mind, prudence grows cold; for when it is weary and torpid, it does not foresee the things to come. Sometimes while some delight steals upon the mind, our temperance withers; for in as much as we are led to the delight of present things, so much less do we temper ourselves from illicit things. Sometimes fear insinuates itself into the heart, and disturbs the strengths of our fortitude; and we are less against adverse things the more immoderately we dread to lose certain things we love. But sometimes love of self inserts itself into the mind, and diverts it by a hidden motion from the rectitude of justice; and in as much as it neglects to restore itself wholly to the Creator, so much does it contradict the right of justice in itself. Therefore, the vehement wind shakes the four corners of the house, while a strong temptation by hidden motions shakes the four virtues; and the house is overthrown as it were with shaken corners, while the conscience is disturbed by the buffeting of the virtues.

77. From there the other virtues, as if offspring of the heart, feed one another. Moreover, within these four corners of the house the sons feast together, because within the secrets of the mind, which is principally raised to the summit of the highest rectitude by these four virtues, the other virtues, as if certain offspring of the heart, feed one another. For the gift of the Spirit, which in the subject mind forms prudence, temperance, fortitude, and justice before other things, tempers that same mind so as to instruct it against each individual temptation in seven subsequent virtues: so that against folly He may give wisdom; against dullness, understanding; against precip-

78. From those who are endowed with virtues, grace sometimes usefully withdraws itself. But sometimes, while our mind is supported by the plenitude and abundance of such a great gift, if it enjoys a continuous security in these, it forgets from whom it has them; and it thinks it has from itself what it considers never to be absent from itself. Whence it happens that sometimes this same grace usefully withdraws itself, and shows to the presuming mind how much it is weakened in itself. For then we truly know from where our good things are, when by losing them as it were, we feel that they cannot be preserved by us. For this mastery of intimating humility, it happens for the most part that upon the incursion of an article of temptation, such great folly strikes our wisdom that the disturbed mind is ignorant of how it should meet imminent evils, or how it should prepare itself against temptation. But by this very folly the heart is prudently instructed, because from that where it is foolish for a moment, it afterwards has wisdom more truly, as more humbly; and wisdom is possessed more certainly from that where it is as it were lost. Sometimes while the soul raises itself in pride by understanding sublime things, it grows sluggish with heavy dullness in low and base things, so that it suddenly sees even the lowest things closed to it, though it had nimbly penetrated the highest. But this same dullness preserves understanding for us while it withdraws it, because while it humbles the heart for a moment, it confirms it more truly for the understanding of sublime things. Sometimes while we rejoice that we act in all things with gravity of counsel, when an article of an emerging cause strikes us, we are hurried by a sudden precipitation; and we who believed ourselves always to have lived in an orderly manner, are suddenly laid waste by inward confusion. But nevertheless, by the instruction of that same confusion we learn not to attribute our counsels to our own strengths; and we are restrained to gravity so much more maturely as we return to it as if it had been lost. Sometimes while the mind bravely despises adverse things, upon the arising of events of adversity, a vehement fear strikes it. But being shaken by this, it learns to whom it should attribute the fact that it stood bravely in some things; and it retains fortitude more strongly afterwards, as much as it sees it already as if slipped away by the suddenly rushing dread. Sometimes while we rejoice to know great things, we grow torpid with the blindness of sudden ignorance. But in as much as the eye of the mind is closed to knowledge for a moment, it is afterwards opened more truly to knowledge, so that surely being instructed by the scourge of its own blindness, it may know from whom it has the very power of knowing. Sometimes while we religiously dispose all things, while we congratulate ourselves that we fully possess the bowels of piety, we are struck by a certain hardness of mind that rushes in. But as if hardened, we recognize to whom we should attribute the goods of the piety we possessed; and piety is received back more truly as if extinguished, while as if lost it is loved more fully. Sometimes while the soul rejoices that it is subject to divine fear, it suddenly grows rigid with the temptation of pride. But nevertheless, fearing greatly soon because it does not fear, it hastily turns itself back again to humility; and it receives it so much more solidly as it weighed the weight of that virtue by as it were losing it.

79. Humility and vigilance are acquired through temptations. Therefore, the house being overturned, the sons die, because the conscience being disturbed in temptation, the virtues generated in the heart are overwhelmed for the utility of one's own cognition, rapidly and in a moment of time. Which sons indeed live within through the spirit, while they die without in the flesh, because namely our virtues in the time of temptation, even if for a moment they fail from the safety of their state being disturbed, nevertheless through the perseverance of intention they subsist whole in the root of the mind. Along with them also the three sisters fall, because in the heart sometimes through scourges charity is disturbed, through dread hope is shaken, through questions faith is buffeted. For often we grow torpid as it were from the love of the Creator, while we are fatigued by the scourge beyond what we believe to be suitable for us. Often while the mind dreads more than is necessary, it weakens for itself the confidence of hope. Often while the soul is stretched by immense questions, perturbed faith is fatigued as if about to fail. But nevertheless the daughters live, who die when the house is shaken, because although within the conscience, the perturbation itself reports that hope, faith, and charity almost fall, nevertheless the perseverance of an upright intention keeps these alive before the eyes of God. Whence also the young man who reports these things alone escapes, because the discretion of the mind remains unharmed even among temptations. And the young man acts so that Job may receive back his sons by weeping, while, with discretion reporting, the grieving soul preserves by repenting the strengths which it had begun as it were to lose. Moreover, this is done with us by a wonderful dispensation, so that our mind may sometimes be struck by the buffeting of guilt. For a man would believe himself to be of great strengths, if he never felt any defect of those same strengths within the secrets of his mind. But while he is shaken by an inrushing temptation, and fatigued as it were beyond what he can bear, the defense of humility is shown to him against the snares of his enemy, and from where he fears himself to fall weakly, from there he receives the power to stand bravely. Now he who is tempted not only learns from whom he should receive strength, but understands with what great vigilance he should preserve it. For often him whom the contest of temptation was not able to overcome, his own security has worse overthrown. For while each one relaxes himself when weary in leisure, he prostitutes his dissolved mind to the corrupter; but if the temptation from the dispensation of heavenly piety strikes him, not suddenly and vehemently inrushing, but instructing him with a tempered access, surely he wakes up to provide against the snares, so that he may cautiously gird himself for the contest against the enemy. Whence also it is well added:

CHAPTER L.

VERSE 20.---Then Job arose.

80. Discretion profits by temptations. For to sit is for one who is resting; to rise up is for one who is contending. Therefore, to rise after hearing of adversities is to prepare the mind more robustly for contests once temptations have been experienced. In which temptations discretion also profits, because it learns to distinguish virtues from vices more subtly. Whence also it is well added:

CHAPTER LI.

IN THE SAME PLACE.---He rent his garments.

81. Those struck by temptations should fly to the mourning of penitence and to humility so that they may be healed. We rent our garments when we retract our works by discerning them. For if our works did not cover us before God like garments, the angelic voice would by no means say: Blessed is he who watches and keeps his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his filthiness (Apoc. XVI, 15). For our filthiness is then seen, when a reprehensible life is by no means veiled by the covering of a subsequent good work before the eyes of the just in judgment. But because when we are tempted with guilt, we are enkindled to lamentations; and being excited by these very lamentations, we open the eyes of the mind more subtly to perceive the light of justice, we rent as it were our garments in grief, because from weeping, discretion increasing, we judge all that we do more strictly with an angry hand. Then all our pride falls, then all superfluity of thoughts falls from the soul. Whence also it is added:

CHAPTER LII.

IN THE SAME PLACE.---And having shaved his head, falling upon the earth, he worshipped.

82. Pride and the vanity of thoughts, how they are cut off. For what do we receive morally by the hair, if not the flowing thoughts of the soul? Whence also it is said elsewhere to the Church: Thy lips are like a scarlet ribbon, O spouse, and thy speech is sweet (Cant. IV, 3). For a ribbon binds the hair of the head. Therefore the lips of the spouse are like a ribbon, because by the exhortation of Holy Church, all the thoughts diffused in the minds of the hearers are bound together; lest, being let loose, they should flow away, lest they should scatter themselves through illicit things, lest being scattered they should weigh down the eyes of the heart; but that they may collect themselves as it were to one intention, while the ribbon of holy preaching binds them. How rightly also he asserts it to be scarlet; because the preaching of the saints burns with the fire of charity alone. Now what is signified by the head, if not the mind itself, which is the principal of each action? Whence also it is said elsewhere: And let not oil be wanting from thy head (Eccles. IX, 8). For oil in the head is charity in the mind; and oil is wanting from the head when charity departs from the mind. Therefore, to shave the head is to cut off superfluous thoughts from the mind. And having shaved the head, he falls upon the earth, who, having repressed the thoughts of his own presumption, humbly acknowledges how weak he is in himself.

83. It is difficult to do great things and not to have confidence in what has been done. For it is difficult to do great things, and for anyone not to have confidence in his thoughts concerning his great acts. For by the very fact that one lives bravely against vices, presumption of thoughts is generated in the heart; and when the mind valiantly crushes faults without, for the most part it swells within secretly; and already it esteems itself to be of some great merit, nor does it think that it sins in the thought of its own estimation. But before the eyes of the strict Judge, it is sinned so much more grievously as the fault is perpetrated more secretly and almost incorrigibly: and the pit lies open so much more widely for devouring, as the life glories more loftily concerning itself. Whence, as we have often said, it is done by the pious dispensation of the Creator, that the soul confident in itself should be struck by a dispensatory temptation, so that being weakened, it may find what it is, and lay aside the pride of its own presumption. For as soon as temptation has struck the mind, all presumption and tumult of our thoughts rests.

84. The proud mind breaks forth into tyranny; its satellites are put to flight by temptation. For the mind, when it raises itself in pride, breaks forth as it were into tyranny. Now it has the satellites of its tyranny, its thoughts favoring itself. But if the enemy rushes upon the tyrant, the favor of the satellites soon ceases. For when the adversary enters, the satellites flee, and they decline in terror, who, being placed in peace, praised him with cunning flattery. But the satellites being withdrawn, he remains alone before the enemy, because the proud thoughts receding, the perturbed soul sees only itself and the temptation. Therefore, when the adversities are heard, the head is shaved, when, temptations vehemently inrushing, the mind is stripped of the thoughts of its presumption. For what is it that the Nazarenes nourish their hair (Num. VI, 5), if not that through a life of great continence the thoughts of presumptions grow? But what is it that, the devotion being completed, the Nazarene is commanded to shave his head and to place the hair in the fire of the sacrifice, if not that then we reach the summit of perfection, when we so overcome external vices that we also cut off superfluous thoughts from the mind? Which indeed to burn with the fire of the sacrifice is to enkindle them with the flame of divine love, so that the whole heart may burn in the love of God, and burning up superfluous thoughts, it may consume them as the hair of the Nazarene in the perfection of devotion. And it is to be noted that falling upon the earth he worshipped. For he exhibits true worship to God who humbly sees himself as being dust, who attributes nothing of virtue to himself, who acknowledges that the good things he does are from the mercy of the Creator. Whence also he says competently:

CHAPTER LIII.

VERSE 21.---Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither.

85. He who thinks himself naked of virtues, is the better clothed by humility itself. As if the tempted soul, being caught in the poverty of its own infirmity, should say: First grace brought me forth naked in the faith, the same grace shall save me naked in my taking up. For it is a great solace to a troubled mind, that when buffeted by vices, and seeing itself as it were stripped of virtues, it should fly back to the hope of mercy alone; and not allow itself to be stripped, in that it humbly thinks itself naked of virtues: who, although perhaps he is uncovered of some virtue in temptation, yet acknowledging his own infirmity, is the better clothed by humility itself; and he lies much more robustly than he had stood, when he ceases to attribute to himself what he has without divine aid. Whence also he soon humbly acknowledges the hand of the Giver and the Judge, saying:

CHAPTER LIV.

ON THE SAME.---The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away.

86. We grow by being instructed through temptation.---Behold, he has grown by being instructed through temptations, who recognizes both the bounty of the Giver in the virtue possessed, and the power of the Taker-away in the perturbation of his strength. Which strength, however, is not taken away, but being disturbed is weary; to the end that the shaken mind, while it fears that it is even now about to lose it, being ever made humble, may never lose it.

CHAPTER LV.

ON THE SAME.---As it pleased the Lord, so is it come to pass; blessed be the name of the Lord.

87. What the tempted man should do.---In this, that we are shaken by internal perturbation, it is right that we should have recourse to the judgment of our Creator; that our heart may yield greater praises to its Helper from the very source whence, being buffeted, it more truly weighs the imbecility of its own infirmity. Moreover, it is well said:

CHAPTER LVI.

VERSE 22.---In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

88. He must not murmur at temptation.---Because the grieving soul ought to guard with skillful care, lest when temptation pricks it within, it should break out into words of unlawful speech without, lest it should murmur at its trial, and the fire which consumes it as gold, should by the excess of unlawful speech turn it into the ashes of straw.

[Vet. XLI, Rec. XXVIII.] 89. The gifts of God are sometimes profitably withdrawn. The Spirit of prophecy is not always present with the prophets.---Nothing indeed hinders but that what we have said of the virtues, we should feel also of those gifts of the Holy Spirit which are given in the manifestation of virtue. For to some are given prophecy, to others kinds of tongues, to others the virtues of healings. But because these very gifts are not always in the mind in the same manner, it is clearly shown that, lest the mind should lift itself up in presumption, they are sometimes profitably withdrawn. For if the spirit of prophecy were always present with the prophets, surely Elisha the prophet would not say; "Let her alone; for her soul is vexed within her: and the Lord hath hid it from me" (2 Kings 4:27). If the spirit of prophecy were always present with the prophets, Amos the prophet, being questioned, would not say: "I am no prophet," where also he added: "Neither am I a prophet's son; but I am an herdsman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit" (Amos 7:14). How then was he not a prophet, who predicted so many true things concerning the future? Or how was he a prophet, if he denied what was true of himself in the present? But because in the same hour in which he was questioned he felt that the spirit of prophecy was wanting to him, he bore true testimony concerning himself, saying: "I am no prophet." Who yet following added: "Now therefore hear thou the word of the Lord." Thus saith the Lord: Thy wife shall be an harlot in the city, and thy sons and thy daughters shall fall by the sword, and thy land shall be divided by line; and thou shalt die in a polluted land" (Amos 7:16, 17). By which words of the prophet it is openly shown that while he was speaking those things of himself, he was filled; and soon deserved to have the spirit of prophesying, because he humbly acknowledged that he was not a prophet. And if the spirit of prophecy were always present with the prophets, Nathan the prophet would by no means have granted to King David, when consulting him about the building of the temple, what he denied a little after (2 Sam 7:3, 5).

90. To have the Spirit permanently is the privilege of Christ. How He is said to be about to abide also in the disciples.---Whence also it is well written in the Gospel: "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on Him, the same is He which baptizeth" (John 1:33). For the Spirit comes into all the faithful, but remains in a singular manner in the Mediator alone, because He never deserted His humanity, from whose divinity He proceeds. In Him, therefore, He abides, who alone is able to do all things and always. For the faithful, who receive Him, since they cannot always have the gifts of signs, as they wish, testify that they have received Him as it were in a manifestation of passage. But when again it is said of the same Spirit to the disciples by the mouth of the Truth, "He shall dwell with you, and shall be in you" (John 14:17), why is this same abiding of the Holy Spirit declared by the divine voice to be the sign of the Mediator, when it is said: "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on Him"? If therefore, according to the Master's voice, He abides also in the disciples, how will it now be a singular sign that He remains in the Mediator? Which, however, we sooner learn, if we distinguish the gifts of the same Spirit.

BOOK THIRD.

The whole second chapter of the book of Job, in the manner of the former books, he explains historically, allegorically, and morally.

CHAPTER I.

THE HISTORICAL SENSE.---1. Blessed Job, sought for unto death in temptation, grew unto life from the stripe; and the old enemy, from the very source whence he thought to extinguish his goods, grieved that he had multiplied them. But because in the first contest he considers himself to have succumbed, he restores himself to other wars of temptations, and still shamelessly hopes for evil from the holy man; because the evil man cannot believe in good things, even those experienced. Moreover, those things which were premised in his first percussion are again subjoined, when it is said:

VERSES 1, 2, 3.---Again there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them to present himself before the Lord. And the Lord said unto Satan, From whence comest thou? And Satan answered the Lord, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered My servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?

The infirmity of the devil's pride is rebuked.---Because we have discussed these things more at large above, we better pass them over in silence: lest, while we repeat things often discussed, we come more slowly to things undiscussed. Although this, which is said by the voice of the Lord to Satan, "From whence comest thou?" I by no means think is said to him as before. For when he returns conquered from that contest in which he had been let loose; and it is asked from whence he comes, when it is known from whence he comes; what else is rebuked than the infirmity of his pride? as if the divine voice said to him openly: Behold, thou art conquered by one man placed even in infirm flesh, thou who endeavourest to raise thyself against Me, the Author of all things. Whence soon the Lord, as He would say the good things of blessed Job as before, enumerating these with the triumphs of victory, subjoins:

CHAPTER II.

ON THE SAME.---And still he holdeth fast his integrity.

2. Job preserved his integrity more gloriously under the stripe.---As if He should say openly: Thou indeed hast exercised thy malice, but he has not lost his integrity; and from the very source whence thou thoughtest to diminish his advancement, thou hast been compelled to serve his advancement, because the integrity of mind, which he gloriously held in tranquility, he more gloriously preserved under the stripe. It follows:

CHAPTER III.

ON THE SAME.---Although thou movedst Me against him, to destroy him without cause.

3. God afflicted Job in vain, because in him He did not punish sin; and not in vain, because He increased his merit.---Since God is just and true, it is much to be questioned how He indicates that He has afflicted blessed Job in vain. For because He is just, He could not afflict in vain; but again because He is true, He could not have said otherwise than He did. That therefore both may agree with the Just and True One, so that He may both speak true things and not do unjust things; let us know that blessed Job was smitten in one respect in vain, and again in another respect not in vain. For because the Just and True One asserts these things of Himself, let us show both that what He said was true, and that what He did was right. For it was necessary that the holy man, known to God alone and to himself, should be made known to all for imitation, in how great virtue he excelled. For he would not openly give examples of virtue to others, if he himself remained without temptation. It was so done, therefore, that both the very force of the percussion should show his strengths to be imitated by all, and the scourges should bring forth what had been hidden in tranquility. But by the same scourges the virtue of patience grew, and from the pain of the stripe the glory of reward was increased. That therefore truth may be held in the word of the Lord, and righteousness in the deed, blessed Job is both not smitten in vain, because merit is increased; and yet he is smitten in vain, because no transgression is punished. For he was smitten in vain, to whom no fault is imputed; and he was not smitten in vain, on whom the merit of virtue is heaped up.

[Vet. II.] 4. How God is understood to be moved.---But what is it that is said: "Thou movedst Me against him"? Is the Truth kindled by the words of Satan, that He should be instigated to the tortures of His subjects? Who would think these things of God, which he considers unworthy even of a right man? But because we know not how to strike unless moved, the divine percussion itself is called a moving; and the divine voice descends to our words, that His deed may be in some way grasped by man. For that power which created all things without necessity, and presides over all without contempt, and sustains all without labor, and rules all without occupation, also corrects without moving, and so forms human minds by scourges to those things which He wills, that it may not pass from the light of its own immutability into the shadow of diversity. It follows:

CHAPTER IV.

VERSES 4, 5.---And Satan answered the Lord, and said, Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. But put forth Thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse Thee to Thy face.

5. God allows the devil to renew the war against the saints, that being often conquered he may be put to silence.---The old enemy gathers from external things what he inflicts as a crime of mind upon the blessed man. For he asserts that skin is given for skin, because often when we see a blow coming against our face, we oppose our hand to our eyelids, that we may defend our eyes from the blow; and we object our body to the wound, lest we be wounded in a more tender part of the body. Satan therefore, knowing these things to be commonly done, says: "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life." As if he should say openly: Therefore Job endures so many scourges outside himself with equanimity, because he fears lest he himself should be struck. It is care for his flesh, then, that he is not moved by the loss of carnal affections, because while he fears for himself, he feels less the percussions of his own. Whence also he soon demands that his flesh be struck, saying: "Put forth Thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse Thee to Thy face" (Job 2:5). He had said above: "Touch all that he hath, and he will curse Thee to Thy face" (Job 1:11). Now as if forgetful of his former proposition, being broken he demands one thing after another. Which however is rightly permitted by divine dispensation, to the end that the impudent disputant, being often conquered, may be put to silence. It follows:

CHAPTER V.

VERSE 6.---And the Lord said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life.

6. Job is so delivered into the hand of his adversary, that he is always retained in the hand of his Helper.---Behold again the permission of the stripe is accompanied by the guard of protection, and divine dispensation by guarding deserts its elect, and by deserting guards him; it betrays some things of his, and protects others. For if He should desert Job entirely in the hand of so great an adversary, what would man be? In the very justice of the permission, therefore, is mixed a certain balance of piety, to the end that in one and the same contest both the humble servant may profit from oppression, and the proud enemy may succumb from permission. The holy man is therefore delivered into the hand of the adversary, but yet in his inmost parts he is retained in the hand of his Helper. For he was of those sheep of which the Truth Itself says in the Gospel: "No man shall pluck them out of My hand" (John 10:28); and yet it is said to the demanding enemy: "Behold, he is in thine hand." The same man, therefore, is in the hand of God, and the same is in the hand of the devil. For in saying: "He is in thine hand," when He immediately adds: "But save his life," the pious Helper was plainly made known, because He held him whom He granted, and in giving He gave him not, whom He hid while casting him out to the darts of his adversary.

[Vet. III.] Satan is said to "save" that into which he is not allowed to break.---But what is this that is said to Satan: "Save his life"? For in what way does he guard, who always desires to break into what is guarded? But Satan is said to "save," in that he dares not break in, as on the contrary we petition the Father in prayer, saying: "Lead us not into temptation" (Matt 6:13). For neither does the Lord lead into temptation, who always mercifully protects His subjects from temptation: but yet His "leading into temptation," as it were, is His not fortifying us against the allurements of temptation. And then He does not lead us into the snare of temptation, when He does not permit us to be tempted beyond what we are able. As therefore God is said to lead us into temptation, if He allows us to be led in by the adversary; so the adversary is said to save the life when he is prohibited from overcoming it by tempting.

VERSE 7.---So went Satan forth from the presence of the Lord.

In what manner Satan goes forth from the presence of the Lord, those things which were said above already manifest. It follows:

VERSE 7.---And he smote Job with a very sore ulcer, from the sole of his foot unto his crown.

7. That the same Job, who lost so many things and so many pledges, was not yet struck in his flesh by the snares of the enemy, is said by the part of the devil to be already conquered in this very thing, because he is preserved in the integrity of the flesh: for the enemy evidently thinks he overcomes his flesh in every part then, when he not only plucks it in the losses of the pledges, but already penetrates to the wounds of the limbs. Now therefore, when Job is smitten in the flesh, it is to be weighed again what kind of contest this is which the Lord proposes for Himself. For first He delivered all things of his to the devil, but He did not deliver the flesh of Job. But now He delivers the whole of Job to the devil, but He did not deliver the soul of Job. Behold, hence already in order the devil is conquered, when he is not permitted to reach that point of Job where alone there could be danger from the snares of the enemy.

CHAPTER VII.

VERSE 8.---Who took him a potsherd to scrape the filth withal, sitting on a dunghill.

9. Job scraping the filth of the body with a potsherd, teaches us that the earthen vessel which we carry is quickly to be broken.---From what is a potsherd made, unless from clay? What indeed is the filth of the body, but clay? Therefore he is said to scrape the filth with a potsherd, as if it were plainly said: With clay he wiped away clay. For the holy man weighed whence that was taken which he carried, and with a fragment of an earthen vessel he scraped the broken earthen vessel. By which act it is plainly shown how he subdued his body to himself when sound, which he also thus despising cared for when smitten; what softness he allowed to his sound flesh, who applied not a garment, nor his fingers, but even a potsherd to his wounds. Therefore with a potsherd he scraped the filth, that considering himself even in a fragment, he might also from the wiping of the wound take care for his mind.

[Vet. IV.] 10. Lying on a dunghill he thinks the body is soon to be dung. Because indeed the mind is often puffed up by those things which are about the body, and by that which is done towards us the frailty of our body is removed from the eyes of the heart (as some worldly people, when they are supported by temporal dignities, while they preside in higher places, while they see the obsequious services of many available to them at their wish, neglect to look at their own frailty, and the earthen vessel which they carry, how quickly it is to be broken, forgetting it they do not at all attend to it), blessed Job, that he might draw a consideration of his frailty even from the surrounding things, and might increase the force of his contempt before his eyes, is described to have sat not anywhere on the earth, which is found clean almost everywhere, but on a dunghill. He placed his body on a dunghill, that the mind, profiting well, might weigh what was the substance of the flesh taken from the earth. He placed his body on a dunghill, that also from the stench of the place he might understand that the body would quickly return to stench.

[Rec. V]. 11. From the scourges of the saints it is to be understood what reward is reserved for them, and what punishment for the wicked.--- But behold, while blessed Job sustains the losses of so many things, is grieved being struck by so many deaths of his pledges, endures so many wounds; while he scrapes the running filth with a potsherd, while flowing down through rottenness he resides on a dunghill; it is pleasant to behold what it is, that Almighty God afflicts those whom He beholds as so dear to Himself for ever, so vehemently as if despising them. But behold, while I consider the wounds and tortures of blessed Job, suddenly I bring back the eyes of my mind to John, and not without the deepest admiration I weigh, that he who was filled with the spirit of prophecy within his mother's womb, and, so to speak, was reborn before he was born: that friend of the bridegroom, he than whom among those born of women none greater has arisen; he so much a prophet, as to be even more than a prophet (Matt. 11:9), is cast into prison by the wicked, and for the dancing of a girl is beheaded, and a man of such severity dies for the laughter of the vile. Do we believe there was anything that such a despised death should wipe away in that life of his? But when did he sin even in food, who ate only locusts and wild honey? What did he offend God even as to the quality of his covering, who covered his body with camels' hair? What could he offend from his conversation, who did not depart from the desert? What guilt of loquacity polluted him, who was far separated from men? When did the fault of silence even touch him, who so vehemently rebuked those coming to him, saying: "Ye offspring of vipers, who has shown you to flee from the wrath to come?" (Matt 3:7; Luke 3:7; Mark 1:4.) What is it, therefore, that Job is preferred by God's testimony, and yet is prostrated by stripes even to the dunghill? What is it, that John is praised by God's voice, and yet dies for the words of a drunkard as a reward for dancing? What is it, that Almighty God so vehemently despises in this world those whom He chose so sublimely before the worlds: unless this, which is open to the piety of the faithful, because for this reason He so presses them in the lowest things, because He sees how He may reward them in the highest; and He casts them out even to despised things, because He leads them within even to incomprehensible things. Hence, therefore, let everyone gather what they shall suffer there whom He reprobates, if here He so tortures those whom He loves; or in what way they shall be struck who are to be rebuked in judgment, if the life of those is so pressed who are praised by the Judge's own testimony. It follows:

CHAPTER VIII.

VERSE 9.---Then said his wife unto him: Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Bless God, and die.

12. The devil tempts those standing either to break them with tribulations, or to soften them with persuasions. He seeks a woman as a ladder, by which he may ascend into the heart of Job: but in vain.---The old enemy is accustomed to tempt the human race in two ways; that is to say, so that he may either break the hearts of those standing with tribulations, or soften them with persuasions. In both ways, therefore, he vehemently exercised himself against blessed Job. For first he brought losses of things to the master of the house, he bereaved the father by the death of his children, he struck him while sound with the rottenness of wounds. But because he beheld him rotting without, but still standing sound within; and he envied him whom he rendered naked without, becoming richer within through the exhibited praise of the Creator; cunningly thinking he weighs that the athlete of God is raised up from that whence he is pressed against him, and being conquered he turns himself to subtle arguments of tempting. [Vet. V.] For he repeats the snares of his old art; and because he knows how Adam is wont to be deceived, he recurs to Eve. For he saw blessed Job among so many losses of things, among so many wounds of strokes, standing unconquered as in a certain citadel of virtues. For he had fixed his mind on high; and for that reason hostile snares were not able to break into it. It is sought therefore by the adversary by what steps this most fortified citadel may be ascended. Now a woman is near to a man and joined to him. He held therefore the heart of the woman, and found her as a ladder by which he might have been able to ascend to the heart of the man. He occupied the mind of the wife, the ladder of the husband. But he prevailed nothing by this art, because the holy man attended to the woman subjected to him, and not set over him; and speaking right things he taught her, whom the serpent instigated to speak perverse things. For it was worthy that manly censure should restrain the flowing mind, since indeed even from that first lapse of the human race he knew that a woman knew not how to teach right things. Whence it is well said also through Paul: "But I suffer not a woman to teach" (1 Tim 2:12); because doubtless sometimes when she taught, she separated from the eternity of wisdom. The old enemy therefore lost from Adam on the dunghill, he who overcame Adam in paradise; and while he kindles his helper the woman to words of evil persuasion, he sent her to the doctrine of holy erudition; and she who had been excited that she might destroy, was instructed lest she should perish. So, so by our strong men is the enemy struck, that even his own weapons are snatched from him. For whence he thinks to exaggerate the pain of the wound, thence he suggests to them against himself the arms of virtue.

13. The devil tempts us through those who adhere to us.---But from the words of the evilly persuading spouse we ought vigilantly to behold that the old adversary busies himself to incline the state of our mind not only through himself, but also through those who adhere to us. For when he does not subvert our heart by his own persuasion, he creeps to it doubtless through the tongues of those adhering to us. For hence it is written: "Beware of thy sons, and take heed to thy domestics" (Ecclus. 32:26). Hence it is said through the prophet: "Let everyone take heed of his neighbor, and in every brother of his let him not have confidence" (Jer. 9:4). Hence again it is written: "A man's enemies are they of his own household" (Matt 10:36). For the cunning adversary, when he beholds himself repelled from the hearts of the good, searches for those who are greatly loved by them; and through their words he speaks flatteringly, who are loved more than the others; that while the force of love pierces the heart, the sword of his persuasion may easily break into the fortifications of inmost rectitude. After the losses of things, therefore, after the deaths of the pledges, after the wounds and rendings of the limbs, the old enemy moved the tongue of the wife.

14. In the series of temptations of Job, what are the arts of the enemy.---And it is to be noted at what time he studied to corrupt the mind of the man with virulent speech. For he introduced words after wounds, that doubtless when the force of pain increased, the perverse suggestion of persuasion might easily prevail. [Vet. VI.] But if we carefully weigh the order of his temptation itself, we find with what cunning he rages. For he first moved the losses of substance, which indeed were both outside nature and outside the body. He took away the sons, which indeed was no longer outside nature, but yet still to some extent outside his own body. At last he struck also the body. But because he was not able to reach the wound of the mind by the wounds of the flesh, he sought also the tongue of the joined woman. For because he grieved that he was overcome in open contest, he hurled a dart from the mouth of the spouse as if from an ambush, who indeed should say: "Dost thou still retain thine integrity?

Bless God, and die." Behold, by tempting he took away all things, behold, by tempting he left the woman, and cunningly he snatched away all things from the holy man; but much more cunningly he reserved the woman his helper, that she might say: "Dost thou still retain thine integrity?" Eve repeats her words. For what is it to say: "Desert integrity," unless: "Despise obedience by eating the forbidden thing"? And what is it to say: "Bless God, and die," unless: "By transcending the precept, live beyond what thou art created"? But our strong Adam lay on the dunghill, he who once stood weak in paradise. For he immediately replied to the words of the evilly persuading one, saying:

CHAPTER IX.

VERSE 10.---Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?

15. Job empty of external things, full of God within. How far scourges may be called evil.---Behold the enemy is broken everywhere, everywhere he is overcome, through all arguments of temptation he has succumbed, because he has also lost that familiar solace of his even from the woman. Among these things, therefore, it is pleasant to behold the holy man, empty of things without, full of God within. Paul, when he beheld in himself the riches of internal wisdom, and saw himself to be an external corruptible body, said: "We have this treasure in earthen vessels"

(2 Cor 4:7). Behold in blessed Job the earthen vessel felt the rendings of ulcers without; but this treasure remained entire within. For without it cracked through wounds, but the treasure of wisdom, being born indefectibly within, flowed forth through the words of holy erudition, saying: "If we have received good at the hand of the Lord, why should we not sustain evil?" calling good things, namely, the gifts of God either temporal or eternal; but evil things, the present scourges, of which the Lord says through the prophet: "I am the Lord, and there is none else, forming the light, and creating darkness; making peace, and creating evil" (Isa 45:7). For neither are evil things, which subsist by no nature of their own, created by the Lord; but the Lord indicates that He creates evil things, when He forms things well created into a scourge for us acting evilly, so that those very things both through the pain with which they strike are evil to the delinquent; and through the nature by which they exist, they are good. Whence also poison is indeed death to a man, but yet life to a serpent. For by the love of present things we have departed from the love of our Creator; and the perverse mind, while it subjected itself to the love of the creature, separated from the society of the Creator. From these things, therefore, it was to be struck by the Creator, which the wandering one had preferred to the Creator, so that whence man was not afraid as a proud one to admit a fault, thence as one to be corrected he should find punishment; and he should recover his senses so much the more quickly to those things which he lost, as he should behold those things to be full of pain which he sought. Whence also it is well said: "Forming the light, and creating darkness," because when through scourges the darkness of pain is created without, within through erudition the light of the mind is kindled. "Making peace, and creating evil," because then peace with God is restored to us, when these things which were well created, but not well desired, are turned into scourges in those things which are evil to us. For through fault we stood discordant with God; it is worthy therefore that we should return to His peace through scourges; so that when each thing well created is turned into pain for us, the corrected mind may be humbly reformed to the peace of the Creator. These scourges, therefore, blessed Job calls evil; because he weighs the good of salvation and tranquility, by what perturbation they strike.

16. The pain of the scourge is to be tempered by the memory of the gift, and the joy of the gift is to be tempered by the fear of the scourge. Fault is in the sense of the wicked, not in the sex.---But that is greatly to be considered in his words, with how great art of consideration he collects himself against the persuasion of his spouse, saying: "If we have received good at the hand of the Lord, why should we not sustain evil?" [Vet. VII.] For it is a great consolation of tribulation, if when we suffer adverse things, we recall the gifts of our Creator to memory. Nor does that which meets us from pain break us, if that which raises us from the gift occurs more quickly to the mind. For hence it is written: "In the day of good things be not unmindful of evil things, and in the day of evil things be not unmindful of good things" (Ecclus. 11:27). For whoever perceives gifts, but in the time of the gifts by no means fears also the scourges, falls into elation through joy. But whoever is worn away by scourges, but in the time of the scourges by no means consoles himself from the gifts which it happened to him to have received, is destroyed from the state of his mind by all-mode desperation. Thus therefore both are to be joined, so that one may always be supported by the other; to the end that both the memory of the gift may temper the pain of the scourge, and the suspicion and dread of the scourge may bite the joy of the gift. The holy man therefore, that he may soothe his oppressed mind among his wounds, weighs the blandishments of the gifts in the pains of the scourges, saying: "If we have received good at the hand of the Lord, why should we not sustain evil?" Where also he well prefaces, "Thou hast spoken as one of the foolish women." For because the sense of the perverse woman, but not the sex, is in fault, he by no means says: "Thou hast spoken as one of the women," but, "of the foolish women," that it may evidently be shown that what savors of perversity is of acceding folly, but not of created nature. It follows:

CHAPTER X.

IBID.---In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

17. Job did not sin with his lips, because he neither said unjust things, nor was silent as to just things.---We fail with our lips in two ways, when we either say unjust things, or are silent as to just things. For if sometimes even to be silent were not a fault, the prophet would not say: "Woe is me, because I have been silent" (Isa 6:5). Blessed Job therefore in all that he did, in no wise sinned with his lips, because he neither spoke proud things against Him that smote him, nor was silent as to right things against her that persuaded him. Therefore neither speaking nor being silent did he fail, who both returned thanks to his scourging Father, and ministered the wisdom of doctrine to his evilly persuading spouse. For because he knew what he owed to God, and what to his neighbor, namely, patience to his Creator, wisdom to his spouse, therefore he both taught her by refuting her, and praised Him by giving thanks. But who of us, if he received any one wound of so great a stroke as this, would not soon lie prostrate from his inmost parts? Behold, prostrate without with the wounds of the flesh, he remains erect within by the fortification of the mind; and he beholds every dart fly past under him, which the raging enemy with strict hand fixes in him externally, vigilantly he apprehends the darts, twisted against him now with wounds from the front, now with words as it were from the side. And our warrior, apprehended by the fervor of the surrounding contests, everywhere opposes the shield of his patience; he meets the shafts coming from every side, and through all the sides of the virtues he rotates his circumspect mind against the rushing wounds.

[Vet. VIII.] 18. He is tempted through his friends.---But the old enemy, by how much more valiantly he is conquered, by so much the more ardently is he still instigated to snares. For because the wife, being rebuked, was silent, he immediately excited others who, by rebuking, should rise up to contumelies. For as he studied to strike the losses of things by announcing them more frequently; so now he busies himself to penetrate the robust breast by striking it more often with the contumelies of words. It follows:

CHAPTER XI.

VERSE 11.---Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that had happened unto him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite: for they had made an appointment together to come to visit him and to comfort him.

19. The right intention of Job's friends is darkened by indiscretion.---They who come by appointment to the consolation of the afflicted, are demonstrated how great charity they had both among themselves and towards the smitten one. Although also by this, that Scripture testifies them to have been friends of so great a man, it is shown that they were of good study and of right intention; but yet this very intention of theirs, when they burst forth into words, is darkened before the eyes of the strict Judge by an arising indiscretion. It follows:

CHAPTER XII.

VERSE 12.---And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, they knew him not; and they lifted up their voice, and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven.

20. He who is about to comfort the afflicted ought to mourn. But let him set a limit to his grief.---Because the stroke had changed the appearance of the smitten one, the friends crying out wept, rent their garments, sprinkled their heads with dust; that when they saw him changed, to whom they had come, spontaneous grief might change even the appearance of the comforters themselves. For the order of consolation is, that when we wish to suspend any afflicted person from mourning, we should first study by mourning to agree with his grief. For he cannot comfort one grieving, who does not agree with his pain, because by that very thing by which he differs from the affliction of the mourner, he is the less received by him, from whom he is separated by the quality of the mind. The mind therefore ought first to be softened, that it may agree with the afflicted, agreeing it may adhere, adhering it may draw. For neither is iron joined to iron, unless both be liquefied by the burning of fire; and a hard thing does not adhere to a soft unless its hardness first being tempered it becomes soft, so that it may as it were become that very thing, which it is cared for that it may hold. So neither do we raise those lying, unless we be inclined from the rigor of our state, because while the rectitude of the standing differs from the position of the lying, it by no means lifts him to whom it neglects to condescend. The friends of blessed Job therefore, that they might suspend the afflicted from pain, took care necessarily to grieve at the same time; and when they saw his wounded body, they themselves studied to rend their garments; and when they beheld him changed, they studied to defile their heads with dust; to the end that the afflicted man might receive their words so much the more easily, as he should have recognized in them something of his own affliction.

[Vet. IX.] 21. But among these things it is to be known that he who desires to comfort the afflicted, it is necessary that he set a measure to the grief which he takes up, lest he not only do not soothe the grieving one, but by grieving intemperately, he press the mind of the afflicted to the weight of desperation. For so is our grief to be joined to the grief of the mourners, that through temperament it may relieve, but not through increase burden. Whence perhaps it is to be gathered that the friends of blessed Job grieved more than had been necessary in consolation, who while they behold the stroke, but know not the mind of the smitten one, were so turned into immense grief, as if the smitten man of such great fortitude, in the stroke of the body, had fallen also from the heart. It follows:

CHAPTER XIII.

VERS. 13.---So they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him; for they saw that his grief was very great.

22. Whether the friends sat with Job for seven days and nights continuously or at intervals is uncertain.---Whether they sat with the afflicted Job for seven continuous days and seven nights, or indeed for as many days and nights they stayed close to him with frequent visitations, we do not know. For often we are said to do anything for so many days, although we do not occupy ourselves continuously with it during those same days. But often Sacred Scripture is accustomed to put the whole for the part, just as it puts the part for the whole. For it speaks of the part for the whole, as Jacob describing his family says: Jacob entered into Egypt with seventy souls (Gen. 46:27). Which surely, when it mentions souls, it is certain that it also includes the bodies of those entering. Again, it intimates the whole for the part, as Mary complains at the tomb, saying: They have taken away the Lord from the tomb, and we know not where they have laid him (John 20:2). For she had come to seek only the body of the Lord, and as it were she deplores the whole Lord together as taken away. Whether, therefore, in this place also the whole is said for the part is uncertain.

23. Let speech be neither headlong, nor indiscreet after due silence.---But yet this, that they were silent for a long time, and at some time were reproved for speaking, is not to be passed over neglectfully. For there are some who both begin to speak precipitately, and more unrestrainedly carry out what was unrestrainedly begun. And there are some who indeed begin to speak late, but once beginning, they know not how to have a limit to their speech. The friends of blessed Job, therefore, seeing his grief, were silent for a long time; but beginning late, they spoke indiscreetly, because they would not spare the grieving one. They held their tongue, lest it should begin too hastily; but once beginning they by no means moderated it, lest it should unrestrain itself from consolation even to insults. And indeed they had come with a good intention to comfort; but this, which the pious mind offered pure to God, precipitated speech vitiated. For it is written: If thou offerest rightly, but dost not rightly divide, thou hast sinned (Gen. 4:7, according to LXX). For it is offered rightly, when anything is done with a right intention. But it is not divided rightly, if that which is done is not also subtly discerned. For to divide things offered rightly is to weigh any of our good studies by solicitously discerning them. Which surely he who disregards to do, even though offering rightly, sins.

[Vet. X.] 24. It must be provided that what we begin with a right study, we complete with a right end.---Often, therefore, even that which we carry on with a good study, while we neglect to discern it cautiously, we know not by what end it may be judged; and sometimes that becomes a guilt of crime which is thought to be a cause of virtue. Whoever considers the deeds of the friends of blessed Job, is not ignorant of with how pious an intention they came to him. For let us weigh of what charity it was to have met together concordantly at the afflicted one; what a virtue of long-suffering it stood forth to have been silent with the afflicted for seven days and nights; what humility to have sat upon the ground for so many days and nights; what compassion to have sprinkled their heads with dust. But yet beginning to speak, whence they estimated themselves to acquire a prize of reward, thence it happened to them to find a guilt of reproof, because to the incautious that is often turned to an end of sin which is begun for the sole study of reward. Behold, by precipitate speech they lost the good which they had purchased with so much labor. And unless the grace of the Divine One had commanded them to offer a sacrifice for their guilt, they could have been justly punished by the Lord from that source whence they wonderfully estimated themselves to please the Lord. Thence they displease the Judge, whence they please themselves as if for the defense of the Judge through unrestraint. Therefore we say these things that we may recall them to the memory of the readers, to the end that each one may solicitously consider those things which are perpetrated with a bad vow, with how much animadversion the Lord punishes, if those things begun with a good study, but mixed with the negligence of indiscretion, He chastises with so much invective. Who would not believe that he had completed a cause of reward, if he should say anything against his neighbor in defense of God, or indeed should be silent for seven days and nights for the grief of his neighbor? And yet the friends of blessed Job, doing these things, arrived at fault by laboring, because they knew indeed the good of consolation which they were doing, but with how great a balance of discretion it was to be done, they knew not. Whence it is necessary that we not only look at what we do, but also with how much discretion we complete it. First indeed, lest we do evil things in any way, but afterwards lest we do good things incautiously. To which good things indeed to be performed solicitously the prophet admonishes us, saying: Cursed is the man who does the work of the Lord negligently (Jer. 48:10). To this end let these things profit, that before the subtle and incomprehensible examination of the terrible Judge we may fear not only the evil things which we have committed, but also those very things, if any well-done things are in us, because often in His judgment that is found to be a fault which is thought to be a virtue before the judgment; and whence a pious reward of the work is expected, thence the punishment of just vengeance follows.

[Vet. XI. Rec. XI.] 25. ALLEGORICAL SENSUS.---How great is the union of Christ and the Church.---We have run through these things briefly treated according to the history, now let us turn our words to the mystery of allegories. But because in the beginning of this work, while we were treating of the unity of the head and the body, we set forth with solicitous intention how great a compagination of charity is in them, because surely the Lord still suffers many things through the body, which we are, and already His body, that is the Church, glories in its head, namely the Lord, in heaven; so now the passions of the same head ought to be expressed, that it may be shown how many things He sustains even in His body. For if our torments did not touch our head, He would by no means cry out from heaven to His persecutor for the afflicted members: Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? (Acts 9:5.) If our tortures were not His pains, the converted and afflicted Paul would by no means say: I fill up those things which are wanting of the passions of Christ, in my flesh (Col. 1:24). And yet already exalted by the resurrection of his head he says: Who hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places (Eph. 2:6). Truly the torments of persecutions had constrained this man on earth; but pressed by the weights of his pains, behold already through the glory of the head he was residing in heaven. Because, therefore, we know the head and the body united in all things, so we begin from the smiting of the head, that subsequently we may come to the scourges of the body. But this, that on a certain day Satan is said to have stood before the Lord, that he is asked whence he comes, that blessed Job is preferred with great praises of the Creator, because we have often discussed these things already, we avoid repeating them. For if for a long time the mind is involved in things discussed, it is hindered from arriving at things undiscussed.

There, therefore, we now set the beginning of the allegory, where after words often repeated, we know something new is added. Therefore he says:

CHAPTER XIV.

Thou hast moved me against him, to afflict him without cause.

26. Christ afflicted without cause for Himself, but not without cause for us.---If blessed Job holds the type of our Redeemer placed in His passion, how is it said by the Lord to Satan: Thou hast moved me against him? Indeed the Mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus, that He might extinguish the faults of our transgression, came to endure the scourges of our mortality; but because He is of one and the same nature with the Father, how does the Father assert that He was moved against Him by Satan, when it is certain that no inequality of power, no diversity of will, interrupts the concord of the Father and the Son? But yet the same, who is equal to the Father through His divinity, came for us to scourges through the flesh. Which scourges surely He would not receive, unless by redeeming He had taken the form of condemned man. And unless the first man had sinned, the second would by no means have come to the shames of the passion. When, therefore, the first man was moved by Satan against the Lord, then was the Lord moved in the second man. Satan, therefore, moved the Lord to his affliction then, when in paradise he cast down the first man from the height of justice by the fault of disobedience. For unless he had drawn the first Adam through voluntary vice into the death of the soul, the second Adam without vice would not have come to the voluntary death of the flesh. Well, therefore, is it said to him also concerning our Redeemer: Thou hast moved me against him, to afflict him without cause. As if it were said more plainly: While this one dies not for His own cause, but for his, then thou didst move me to His affliction, when thou didst draw him from me by crafty persuasion. Concerning which it is also well added, without cause. For he was afflicted without cause, who was both pressed by the vengeance of fault, and was not stained by the contagion of fault. He was afflicted without cause, who being incarnate, had not His own committed sins, and yet He received the punishment of carnal men without fault. For hence it is that He speaks through the Prophet, saying: That which I took not away, I then paid back (Ps. 68:5). For another, created for paradise, proudly wished to snatch away the likeness of divine power, but yet the Mediator without fault paid back the guilt of this pride. Hence it is that a certain wise man says to the Father: Since thou art just, thou disposest all things justly, and also condemnest him who ought not to be punished (Wisd. 12:15).

27. How God afflicted the innocent Christ with punishments.---But it is to be weighed how He is just, and disposes all things justly, if He condemns him who ought not to be punished. For our Mediator ought not to have been punished for Himself, because He committed no contagion of fault. But if He Himself had not taken up the undue, He would never have liberated us from the due death. The Father, therefore, since He is just, in punishing the Just One, disposes all things justly; because by this He justifies all things, in that He condemns Him who is without sin for sinners; that by this all the elect might rise to the height of justice; whereby He who is above all might sustain the losses of our injustice. Because, therefore, there he is said to be condemned when he ought not, here he is mentioned as afflicted without cause. Who yet according to Himself was afflicted without cause, but according to our acts not without cause. For the rust of vice could not be purged away except by the fire of torment. He came, therefore, without vice, who would subject Himself voluntarily to torment; that the punishments due to our iniquity might justly release their guilty ones, in that they had unjustly held this one free from themselves. Without cause, therefore, and not without cause, was He afflicted, who indeed had no committed sins in Himself, but by His own blood wiped away the stain of our guilt.

CHAPTER XV.

VERS. 4, 5.---And Satan answered and said: Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, will he give for his life. But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and then thou shalt see that he will bless thee to thy face.

28. Whence Satan may know Christ, and whence he may doubt of Him. In estimating the charity and patience of Christ, whence he may be deceived. The speech of Satan both through himself and through his own.---The malignant spirit when he beholds our Redeemer shine with miracles, cries out: We know who thou art, the Holy One of God (Luke 4:34). Who saying these things, by knowing the Son of God is sore afraid; but yet ignorant of the power of supernal piety, sometimes while he considers Him passible, he thinks Him a pure man. But he had learned of many placed in a pastoral location under the appearance of sanctity, who being very much alienated from the bowels of charity, weighed the losses of others as very little. Collecting this one therefore as if from others, because many things being taken away, he did not see Him overcome, he so flared up even to His flesh, through the touch of the passion, that he said: Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, will he give for his life. But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and then thou shalt see that he will bless thee to thy face. As if he said plainly: He neglects to be moved by those things which are outside himself; but then he is truly recognized who he is, if he experience in himself what he may grieve. These things Satan, when he desires them to be done, said through himself, not by words, but by desires. These things through his members he brought in both by words and by desires. For he himself speaks, when according to the voice of the prophet his followers say: Let us put wood into his bread, and let us erase him from the land of the living (Jer. 11:19). For to put wood into bread is to apply the stake of the cross by fastening it to his body; and they think themselves able to erase his life from the land of the living, whom while they behold mortal, they suspect is finished by death.

CHAPTER XVI.

VERS. 6.---And the Lord said unto Satan: Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life.

29. The members of Satan are all those who live wickedly. The hand of Satan is his power. The Lord, delivering Himself to him, compels him to serve Him.---Who, even if foolish, would believe that the Creator of all things was delivered into the hand of Satan? But yet, taught by the truth, who does not know that all those who are joined to him by living perversely are the members of that same Satan? For Pilate stood forth as his member, who, even to the extremities of death, did not know the Lord coming for our redemption. The chief priests stood forth as his body, who attempted to repel the Redeemer of the world from the world, by pursuing Him even to the cross. When, therefore, for our redemption, the Lord delivered Himself into the hands of the members of Satan, what else did He do than permit the hand of that same Satan to rage against Himself; so that whence He Himself might outwardly succumb, thence He might deliver us both outwardly and inwardly? If, therefore, the hand of Satan is taken for his power, He endured his hand according to the flesh, whose power over the body He tolerated even to the spittings, the buffets, the scourges, the cross, and the lance. Whence also He says to Pilate, namely to his body, when coming to His passion: Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above (John 19:11). But yet this power, which He had given him from without against Himself, He compelled to serve His own gains within. For Pilate, or Satan, who had stood forth as the head of that same Pilate, was held under the power of Him over whom he had received power; because also the Superior Himself had disposed this which, coming from below, He tolerated from the persecutor; so that while it arose from the evil mind of the unfaithful, yet that very cruelty might serve the utility of all the elect. Piously, therefore, He disposed within what He wickedly permitted Himself to suffer without. For hence it is said of Him at the supper: Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God, and went to God; he riseth from supper, and layeth aside his garments (John 13:3). Behold, being about to go into the hands of persecutors, He knew that He had received even those very persecutors into His own hand. For He who knew that He had received all things, it is clear that He also held those by whom He was held; so that He Himself might turn to the use of piety whatever of their malice permitted might rage against Him. Let it be said to him, therefore: Behold, he is in thine hand; because he received license raging for the striking of the flesh, but unknowingly he served His power.

30. The devil is proved unable to overcome the soul of Christ.---But he is commanded to save his life (soul), not that he is prohibited from tempting this, but that he is proved unable to overcome this. For not as we, who are pure men, are often shaken by an rushing temptation, so was the soul of our Redeemer troubled by the necessity of temptation. For our enemy, even if permitted he took Him up into a high mountain, if he showed that he would give the kingdoms of the world, if he showed stones to be turned as if into bread (Matt. 4:8; Luke 4:4), yet he was not able to shake the mind of the Mediator of God and men by temptation. For He so deigned to receive all these things outwardly, that His mind, however, inwardly adhering to His divinity, remained unshaken. Who even if at any time He is said to have groaned being troubled in spirit (John 11:33, 38), He Himself divinely disposed how much He Himself should be troubled humanly, presiding immutably over all things, and showing Himself mutable in the satisfaction of infirmity. Remaining quiet, therefore, in Himself, He disposed whatever He did even being troubled, for the showing of the humanity which He had received.

31. The elect can be called the soul of Christ. These are exempted from the power of the devil.---But because when we love rightly, we love nothing in created things more dearly than our soul; and as we say that we love them as our soul, to whom we attempt to express the weight of our love, the life of the elect can be signified by His soul. And when Satan is permitted to strike the flesh of the Redeemer, he is separated from the soul; because while he takes His body for the passion, he loses the elect of Him from the right of his power; and while the flesh of that One dies through the cross, the mind of these is solidified against temptations. Let it be said, therefore: Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life (soul). As if he should plainly hear: Receive license against His body, and lose the right of wicked domination from His elect, whom He possesses, foreknowing them with Himself before the ages.

CHAPTER XVII.

VERS. 7.---So went Satan forth from the presence of the Lord, and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown.

32. Christ smitten in His own from the beginning of the world.---No one of the elect has come into this life, who has not sustained the adversities of this enemy. Moreover, they stood forth as the members of our Redeemer, even those who from the very beginning of the world, while living piously, have suffered cruel things. Or did not Abel show himself to be a member of Him, who signified His death—of whom it is written: He shall be led as a sheep to the slaughter, and as a lamb before his shearer he shall be dumb, and shall not open his mouth (Isa. 53:7)—not only by pleasing in sacrifice, but also by being silent in dying? From the very beginning of the world, therefore, he has attempted to assault the body of our Redeemer. From the sole of the foot, therefore, even to the crown he has inflicted the wound, because beginning from pure men, he arrived even to the very Head of the Church by raging. But it is well said:

CHAPTER XVIII.

VERS. 8.---He scraped the filth with a potsherd.

33. With the potsherd, that is, with His flesh taken from the earth, He scraped away the filth of sin.---For what else is the potsherd in the hand of the Lord, except the flesh taken from the mud of our substance? For a potsherd is solidified by fire. Moreover, the flesh of the Lord stood forth the more robust from His passion, in that dying through infirmity, He rose from death without infirmity. Whence it is also rightly said by the Prophet: My strength is dried up like a potsherd (Psalm 22:15). For His strength dried up like a potsherd, who strengthened the infirmity of the assumed flesh by the fire of His passion. But what ought to be understood by the filth (sanies), except sin? For by flesh and blood the sins of the flesh are wont to be designated. Whence it is said by the Psalmist: Deliver me from bloodguiltiness (Psalm 51:14). Filth, therefore, is the putrefaction of blood. What then do we take as filth, except the sins of the flesh become worse from long antiquity? A wound, therefore, is turned into filth, when a neglected fault is weighed down more grievously by use. Therefore, the Mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus (1 Tim. 2:5), delivering His body into the hands of persecutors, scraped the filth with a potsherd, because He blotted out sin by His flesh. For He came, as it is written, in the likeness of sinful flesh, that He might condemn sin concerning sin (Rom. 8:3). And while He opposed the innocence of His flesh to the enemy, He wiped away the contagions of our flesh; and by that through which the enemy held us captive, through that He expiated us as free; because that which we made an instrument of fault, this was turned for us through the Mediator into arms of justice. The filth, therefore, is scraped with a potsherd, when fault is overcome by the flesh. But it is well added:

CHAPTER XIX.

IBID.---And he sat down among the ashes (on a dunghill).

34. He sat on a dunghill, because He chose the weak things of the world.---Not in the forum, in which the law resounds; not in the building, which lifts itself up with its summit on high; but He resides on a dunghill, because namely the Redeemer of the human race coming to the flesh, as Paul attests, chose the weak things of the world, that he might confound the strong (1 Cor. 1:27). Or does He not reside on a dunghill as if in falling buildings, who, having left the proud Jews, rests in that gentility which He had long ago cast off? He is found in a wound outside the habitation, who, in that He endured the opposing Judea, felt the pain of the passion, being despised by His own nation; as John attests, who says: He came unto his own, and his own received him not (John 1:11). But how He may rest sitting on a dunghill, let this same Truth say of Himself: for He says: There shall be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance (Luke 15:7). Behold, grieving He sits on a dunghill, who after faults have been perpetrated willingly possesses the hearts of the penitent. Or are not the hearts of the penitent as it were a certain dunghill, who while they consider their evils by weeping, heap them up as it were dung before themselves, by casting themselves down? Job, therefore, being smitten did not seek the mountain, but sat down on a dunghill, because the Redeemer coming to His passion, deserted the high hearts of the proud, and rested in the humility of the afflicted. Which however He indicated concerning Himself even before He was incarnate, when He said through the Prophet: To whom shall I look, but to him that is humble and quiet and trembles at my words? (Isa. 66:2, according to LXX).

35. Christ suffers many things in His own, both from infidels and from carnal-minded believers.---But who may consider, how many pious things He brought to men, as many perverse things as He tolerated from men? Who may consider, how great things He tolerates even now, even when He reigns from heaven over the hearts of the faithful? For He Himself daily suffers everything by which His elect are torn by the reprobate. And although the Head of this body, which namely we are, now exerts Himself free above all things, yet He still feels the wounds of the reprobate through His body, which He retains below. But why do we say these things of infidels, when in the Church itself we see many of the carnal-minded fight with perverse manners against the life of the Redeemer? For there are some who pursue Him with perverse acts, because they cannot with swords; because while they see that what they covet is lacking to them in the Church, they become enemies of the good; and not only do they insert themselves into perverse action, but they also strive to bend the rectitude of the just to perverse things. For they neglect to look at eternal things, and they succumb to the appetite of temporal things by the pusillanimity of the mind; and they fall the more deeply from eternal things, as they suspect temporal goods to be as it were alone. To these the simplicity of the just is displeasing, and when they find an occasion of perturbation, they persuade them to seize their own duplicity. Whence this also fits aptly which is added:

CHAPTER XX.

VERS. 9.---Then said his wife unto him: Dost thou still retain thine integrity (simplicity)? Bless God, and die.

36. The wife of Job suggesting evil is a figure of the carnal-minded placed in the bosom of the Church.---For whose likeness did the woman suggesting evil hold, except that of any carnal-minded persons placed in the bosom of the Church, who, by the fact that they are within by words of professed faith, the more grievously press the good by their uncorrected manners?

For they would perhaps have done less harm, if the holy Church, admitting them within, did not receive them even to the bedchamber of faith; whom, while she receives through professed faith, she undoubtedly makes almost inevitable to herself. Hence it is that, with the crowd pressing, one woman touched our Redeemer; whence also that same Redeemer of ours immediately says: Who touched me? To whom when the disciples answered: The multitudes throng thee and press thee, and sayest thou: Who touched me? He straightway added: Somebody hath touched me; for I perceive that virtue is gone out of me (Luke 8:44-46).

37. These press Christ, they do not touch Him.---Many, therefore, press the Lord, and one touches Him, because all the carnal-minded in the Church press Him, from whom they are far off; and they alone touch Him who are joined to Him truly humble. The crowd, therefore, presses, because the multitude of the carnal-minded is the more heavily tolerated as they are admitted within. It presses, and does not touch, because it is both troublesome by presence, and absent by life. For sometimes they pursue us with perverse speeches, sometimes however with perverse manners alone. For sometimes they suggest what they hold; but sometimes even if they do not suggest, they do not cease to offer examples of iniquity. Those, therefore, who allure us to evils either by words or by examples, are surely our persecutors from whom we take up the contests of temptations, which at least we may overcome in the heart.

38. They suggest perverse things sometimes from fear, sometimes from audacity.---But it must be known that the carnal-minded in the Church sometimes strive to suggest perverse things from fear, sometimes however from audacity; and when they themselves fail either from pusillanimity or from elation, they strive to infuse these into the hearts of the just as if from love. Namely Peter retained a carnal mind before the death and resurrection of the Redeemer; with a carnal mind the son of Zeruiah, joined to his leader David, had clung to him; but yet one sinned from dread, the other from elation. For that one, hearing of the death of the Master, said: Be it far from thee, Lord: this shall not be unto thee (Matt. 16:22); but this one, not bearing the injuries of the leader, said: Shall not Shimei be put to death for this, because he cursed the Lord's anointed? (2 Sam. 19:21). But to the former it is soon said: Get thee behind me, Satan; and this one with his brother heard immediately: What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah, that ye should this day be as a Satan unto me? (2 Sam. 19:22). Those, therefore, suggesting evil are judged by the name of the apostate angel, who with bland words draw to unlawful things as if loving. But they are much worse, who succumb to this fault not from dread, but from elation: of whom especially the wife of blessed Job held the figure, who proudly attempted to suggest to her husband, saying: Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Bless God, and die. She rebuked the simplicity (integrity) in her husband, because despising all transitory things, he desires eternal things alone with a pure heart. As if she should say: Why do you simply seek eternal things, and groan with equanimity under present evils? Transgressing, despise eternal things, and escape present evils even by dying. But how great a form of rectitude all the elect show when they tolerate perverse things within from the carnal-minded, let us learn from the words of the wounded and the whole, the sitting and the upright, who says:

CHAPTER XXI.

VERS. 10.---Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?

39. The saints oppose the shield of patience to those who smite them, and hurl the darts of doctrine at those who suggest evil.---Holy men, being caught in the war of tribulations, when they at one and the same time bear some smiting them and others suggesting evil, oppose the shield of patience to the former, and hurl the darts of doctrine at the latter; and they raise themselves to either mode of fighting with the wonderful art of virtue; so that they may both wisely teach perverse things within, and bravely despise adversities without; that they may correct these by teaching, and press those by tolerating. For they despise rising enemies by suffering, but they bring back weakening citizens to health by compassionating: they resist those, lest they also draw away others; they fear for these, lest they utterly lose the life of rectitude.

40. This is proved by the example of Saint Paul.---Let us see the soldier of the camps of God fighting against both. He says: Without were fightings, within were fears. He enumerates the wars which he tolerates from without, saying: In perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren (2 Cor. 7:5; 11:26). But in this war, what darts he may hurl against the adversary, let him add: In labour and travail, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness (Ibid.). But caught among so many contests, let him say with how great a defense of watchings he also guards the camps. For he straightway adds: Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches. Behold, he bravely takes up wars in himself, and mercifully spends himself in protecting his neighbors. He tells the evils which he suffers, he subjoins the goods which he imparts. Let us consider, therefore, of what labor it is, at one and the same time to tolerate adversities without, and to protect the weak within. Without he suffers fightings, because he is cut with scourges, bound with chains; within he tolerates fear, because he dreads that his passion may be a hindrance not to himself, but to his disciples. Whence also he writes to the same, saying: That no man should be moved by these afflictions: for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto (1 Thess. 3:3). For he feared the fall of others in his own passion, lest while the disciples recognized him afflicted with scourges for the faith, they should refuse to profess themselves faithful. O bowels of immense charity! he despises what he himself suffers, and takes care lest the disciples suffer anything of perverse persuasion in their heart. In himself he contemns the wounds of the body, and in others he heals the wounds of the heart. For the just have this proper to them, that being placed in the pain of their tribulation, they do not desert the care of the utility of others; and when they grieve for themselves suffering adversities, they provide necessary things for others by teaching, and as it were some great smitten physicians, they are sick. They themselves tolerate the rendings of the wound, and bring forth the medicaments of health to others. But it is of much less labor, either to teach when you tolerate nothing; or to tolerate, when you teach nothing. Whence holy men skillfully extend themselves to both; and when they are perhaps smitten with tribulations, they so take up external wars, that they solicitously think lest the internal things of their neighbors be torn. Thus holy men stand bravely in the line of battle; and from there they smite opposing breasts with darts, from here they protect the weak placed behind with a shield, and thus on both sides they watch with the velocity of circumspection; so that they both transfix the audacious before them, and defend the trembling after them from a wound. Because, therefore, holy men know how so to tolerate adversities without, that they also know how to correct perverse things within, let it be said rightly: Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. For because it is said to the elect: Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen your heart (Psalm 31:24), the minds of the carnal, which serve God with a flux intention, are not undeservedly called women.

41. He who tends toward eternal goods does not take temporal evils ill.---If we have received good things from the hand of the Lord, why should we not sustain evil things? As if he should say: If we tend toward eternal goods, what wonder is it if we suffer temporal evils? Moreover, Paul had solicitously inspected these goods, when he tolerably bore the evils brought upon him, saying: The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us (Rom. 8:18).

IBID.---In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

He is contumelious neither toward God, nor toward his adversaries.---Holy men, when they suffer persecution from without and from within, not only do not exceed in injuries toward God, but neither do they hurl contumelious words against their adversaries themselves. Which Peter, the leader of the good, rightly admonishes, saying: Let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as a reviler (maledicus) (1 Peter 4:15). For he suffers as a reviler, who at the time of his passion is unbridled in injury of his persecutor unto his own salvation. But because the body of the Redeemer, namely the holy Church, so bears the weight of sorrows that it does not pass the measure of humility through words, it is rightly said of this one grieving:

CHAPTER XXII.

IBID. AND VERS. 11.---In all this did not Job sin with his lips; neither did he speak anything foolishly against God. Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place: Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite.

42. Heretics adumbrated in the friends of Job.---In the preface of this work we said that the friends of blessed Job, although they come together with a good intention toward him, yet hold the likeness of heretics for this reason, that they glide into fault by speaking indiscreetly. Whence also it is said to them by the same blessed Job: I desire to dispute with God, first showing you to be fabricators of a lie, and cultors of perverse dogmas (Job 13:3-4). Therefore the holy Church, being placed in affliction through all this time of her pilgrimage, while she sustains wounds, while she grieves at the falls of her members, moreover tolerates other enemies of Christ under the name of Christ. For unto the increase of her pain, even heretics come together in contention, and transfix her as if with certain darts, by irrational words.

43. The place whence they came is pride.---But it is well said: They came every one from his own place. For the place of heretics is pride itself; because unless they first swelled in the heart, they would not come to the contests of perverse assertion. For thus pride is the place of the evil, just as on the contrary humility is the place of the good. Concerning which it is said through Solomon: If the spirit of him that hath power rise up against thee, leave not thy place (Eccles. 10:4). As if he should say plainly: If you consider the spirit of the tempter to prevail against you in anything, do not relinquish the humility of penitence. That he called our place the humility of penitence, he shows by the following words, saying: For healing will cause the greatest sins to cease (Ibid.). For what else is the humility of lamentation, except the medicine of sin? Heretics, therefore, come from their own place, because they are moved against the holy Church from pride.

44. The names of Job's friends signify the action of heretics.---Whose perverse action is also gathered from the interpretation of their names themselves. For they are called Eliphaz, Bildad, Zophar; and, as we said above, Eliphaz is said to be interpreted as "contempt of God." For unless they contemned God, they would by no means feel perverse things concerning Him. But Bildad is interpreted as "oldness alone." For while they truly shrink from being overcome, and seek to be victors by perverse study, they neglect the conversation of the new life; and it is from oldness alone that they intend. But Zophar is "dissipating the watchtower" (speculam). For these, who are situated in the holy Church, humbly contemplate the mysteries of their Redeemer with true faith; but while heretics come with false allegations, they dissipate the watchtower, because they incline the minds of those whom they draw to themselves from the intention of right contemplation.

45. The curiosity, loquacity, and hypocrisy of heretics designated by the places of Job's friends.---But the places from which they come are well described as congruent with the acts of heretics. For it is said: the Temanite, the Shuhite, the Naamathite. For Teman (Thema) is interpreted as the South wind (Auster); Shuah (Suhi), as speaking; Naamah (Naama), as beauty (decor). But who does not know that the South is a hot wind? Heretics, therefore, because they desire to know (to taste) more ardently, as it were more than is necessary, study to be hot. For sloth corresponds to the numbness of cold, and again the restlessness of immoderate curiosity corresponds to intemperate heat. Because, therefore, they desire to perceive the heat of wisdom more than they ought, they are reported to come from the South wind. From this heat of immoderate wisdom Paul had taken care to temper the minds of the faithful, when he said: Not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly (Rom. 12:3). Hence it is that David smote the valley of salt pits (2 Sam. 8:13), because namely our Redeemer, by the examination of His strictness, extinguishes the folly of immoderate taste in those who feel perverse things concerning Him. But Shuah is called "speaking." For they desire to have heat not that they may live well, but that they may speak elately. From Teman, therefore, and Shuah, that is, from heat and loquacity, they are reported to come, because through the fact that they exhibit themselves as students of the Scriptures, they lack not the words of loquacity alone, but the bowels of charity. But Naamah is interpreted as "beauty." For because they desire not to be, but to seem learned, from the words of erudition they take the appearance of those living well; and through the heat of loquacity they show in themselves an image of beauty, so that through the beauty of the tongue they may easily persuade perverse things, in that they cunningly hide the foulness of life from the sense. But neither are the names of the places themselves distinct in an inordinate narration. For first Teman, afterwards Shuah, and then Naamah is placed; because first an inordinate heat inflames them, then the brightness of loquacity raises them up, and then at last hypocrisy shows them beautiful to men.

CHAPTER XXIII.

IBID.—For they had made an appointment together to come to visit him and comfort him. —46. Heretics agree together against the Church. They can be called friends. Heretics make an appointment together when they feel certain perverse things concordantly against the Church; and in those things in which they disagree with the truth, they agree with one another in falsehood. But all who instruct us concerning eternity, what else do they do but comfort us in the affliction of our pilgrimage? But heretics, because they desire to teach holy Church their own things, approach her as if comforting her. Nor is it a wonder that those who express the form of adversaries are called friends, since it is said also to the traitor himself: Friend, whereto art thou come? (Matt. 26:50); and the rich man, who is burned in the fire of hell, is called son by Abraham (Luke 16:25); because even if through us the evil neglect to be corrected, it is nevertheless fitting that they be called friends by us, not from their wickedness, but from our benignity.

CHAPTER XXIV.

VERSE 12.—And when they had lifted up their eyes afar off, they knew him not. 47. They do not know the Church. Why.—Heretics, whenever they consider the facts of holy Church, lift up their eyes, because namely they themselves are placed in the lowest part, and when they look back at her works, the things they discern are situated on high; but yet they do not know her when she is placed in sorrow. For she desires to receive evils here, so that, being purged, she may arrive at the prize of eternal remuneration. Often she fears prosperous things, and grows cheerful in the discipline of instruction. Heretics, therefore, because they desire present things as great, do not know her when she is placed in wounds. For that which they discern in her, they do not read over again in the knowledge of their own hearts. When therefore she profits even by adversities, they stick to their own amazement; because by experience they are ignorant of the things they see.

[Old Edit. XIX].

IBID.—And they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven. 48. They are rent into many parts.—As we receive all the faithful as the garments of the Church; whence also it is said by the prophet: Thou shalt be clothed with all these as with an ornament; so the garments of heretics are all those who, adhering concordantly to them, are involved in their errors. But heretics have this peculiar to them, that in that degree in which they go out from the Church, they cannot stand for long; but they rush daily to worse things, and by feeling worse things, they rend themselves into many parts, and are for the most part divided even from themselves by the altercation of their own confusion. Because, therefore, they still tear in much division those whom they join to their own perfidy, let it be rightly said that the friends who come rend their garments. But when the garments are rent, the body is shown, because often when their followers are rent, the malice of their thought is opened; so that discord may lay open the deceits which the heavy fault of concord before closed up. 49. They taste earthly things from heavenly words.—But they sprinkle dust upon their heads toward heaven. What is signified by dust, but earthly understanding? what by the head, but that which is our principal part, namely the mind? What is expressed by heaven, but the precept of supernal locution? To sprinkle dust, therefore, upon the head toward heaven, is to corrupt the mind with a worldly intellect, and to feel earthly things concerning heavenly words. But for the most part they discuss divine words more than they receive them. They sprinkle dust, therefore, over their heads, because in the precepts of God, through an earthly understanding, they strive beyond the strength of their own minds.

Verse 13.—So they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights. 50. They try to persuade proud things through a feigned humility.—In the day we recognize what we see; but in the night, either by blindness we discern nothing, or by doubt we are in darkness. By the day, therefore, understanding is designated, but by the night, ignorance. Moreover, by the number seven the sum of universality is expressed. Whence also in no more than seven days is all this transitory time consumed. What is it, therefore, that the friends of blessed Job are reported to have sat with him seven days and seven nights, but that heretics, whether in those things in which they understand the true light, or in those in which they suffer the darkness of ignorance, feign to condescend to holy Church as if weak, and prepare for her, under the appearance of blandishments, the deceits of deception? And although either in those things which they understand, or in those which they cannot understand, being swollen with the type of elation, they think themselves great among themselves, yet sometimes they incline toward holy Church as far as appearance goes; and while they soften their words, they infuse venom. To sit down on the ground, therefore, is to show something of the image of humility; so that while they exhibit humble things, they may persuade the proud things which they teach.

[Old Edit. XX.] 51. They sit with us on the earth when they agree with us concerning the Incarnation.—The incarnation itself of the Mediator can indeed be designated by the earth. Whence also it is said to Israel: An altar of earth thou shalt make unto me (Exod. 20:24). For to make an altar of earth to God is to hope in the incarnation of the Mediator. For then our gift is accepted by God, when our humility has placed whatever it works upon this altar, that is, upon the faith of the Lord's incarnation. In an altar of earth, therefore, we place the offered gift, if we solidify our acts with the faith of the Lord's incarnation. But there are some heretics who do not deny the incarnation of the Mediator which was made, but either they think otherwise concerning the Divinity than it is, or they disagree with us in the quality of the incarnation itself. Those, therefore, who maintain with us the true incarnation of the Redeemer, sit as it were with Job on the earth. Moreover, they are described as sitting seven days and seven nights on the earth, because whether in this that they understand something of the fullness of the truth, or in this that they are blinded by the darkness of their own folly, they cannot deny the mystery of the incarnation. To sit on the earth with blessed Job, therefore, is to believe the true flesh of the Redeemer with holy Church.

52. They are friends to the silent, but become adversaries to those who contradict.—Sometimes indeed heretics rage against us even with punishments, sometimes they follow us with words alone, sometimes they provoke the quiet, but sometimes, if they see us silent, they are quiet; and they are friends to the silent, but they oppose the speaking. Whence because blessed Job had not yet said anything in discussion to them, it is rightly added: And none spake a word unto him. For we have adversaries when we are silent, if we neglect to beget sons of the true faith by preaching. But if we begin to speak right things, we soon feel heavy contumelies from their response; immediately they leap forth into adversity, and break out into a voice of grief against us, because namely they fear lest the right voice of the speaker should draw to the height the hearts which the weight of folly aggravates in the lowest things. Because therefore, as we have said, the adversaries love us when silent, and hate us when speaking, it is rightly said while Job was silent:

CHAPTER XXVII.

IBID. None spake a word unto him. 53. Sometimes heretics are compelled to be silent. —Sometimes, however, when they consider the hearts of the faithful to be in the torpor of inertia, they do not cease from scattering the seeds of error by speaking. But when they see the minds of the good to savor high things, to seek the return to their country, to grieve strenuously for the misery of this exile, they curb their tongue with solicitous circumspection, because they see that speaking in vain against the hearts of those who grieve, they are more quickly struck dumb. Whence also rightly, when it was said: None spake a word unto him, soon the cause of the silence is subjoined, when it is said:

CHAPTER XXVIII.

IBID.—For they saw that his grief was very great. 54. When the heart grieves from the love of God, the adversary fears to speak perverse things.—For when the vehement grief of the love of God transfixes our hearts, the adversary fears to speak perverse things at random, because he sees that by provoking an intent mind, he is not only unable to draw it to perversity, but perhaps, through its being excited, he will lose even those whom he had held.

[Old Edit. XXI. Rec. XVI.] 55. In Scripture, things well done sometimes signify things to be done ill; and vice versa.—Perhaps it moves some that we have said these things, that those things which were well done by the friends, signify things to be done ill by heretics. But thus for the most part any thing whatever is a virtue through history, and a fault through signification: just as sometimes a thing done, in fact, is a cause of condemnation; but in writing it is a prophecy of virtue. Which truth we shall show more quickly if we bring forward one testimony of holy Scripture to prove both. For who hearing it, not only of the faithful, but of the infidels also, would not in every way detest that David, walking on the roof, should lust after Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah? Whom nevertheless, returning from the battle, he admonishes to go to his house and wash his feet. Who immediately answered, saying: The ark of the Lord is under skins (tents), and shall I rest in my house? (2 Sam. 11:11). Whom David received at his own table, and delivered to him letters by which he should die. But of whom does David, walking on the roof, hold the type, except of Him of whom it is written: He hath set his tabernacle in the sun? (Psalm 19:4). And what is it to bring Bathsheba to himself, but to associate to Himself by a spiritual intellect the law of the letter, joined to a carnal people? For Bathsheba is called the "seventh well," because namely through the knowledge of the law, by the infusion of spiritual grace, perfect wisdom is ministered to us. But whom does Uriah signify, but the Jewish people?

Whose name interpreted is said to be "my light of God." But the Jewish people, because they are extolled concerning the knowledge of the law which they have received, glory as it were in the light of God. But from this Uriah David took his wife, and joined her to himself: because namely the "strong of hand," which David is called, the Redeemer appearing in the flesh, while He made known that the law spoke of Him spiritually, by this, that it was held according to the letter, He showed this to be a stranger from the Jewish people; and joined it to Himself, because He declared that Himself was preached through it. Nevertheless, David admonishes Uriah to go to his house and wash his feet, because the incarnate Lord coming commanded the Jewish people to return to their conscience, and to wipe away the filth of their works with tears; so that they might spiritually understand the mandates of the law, and after such great hardness of the precepts, finding the font of baptism, they might return to the water after labor. But Uriah, who remembered that the ark of the Lord was under skins, answered that he could not enter his house. As if the Jewish people should say: I see the mandates of God in carnal sacrifices, and I do not seek to return to conscience through spiritual understanding. For as it were he says that the ark is under skins, who understands the precepts of God only for exhibiting the ministry of carnal sacrifice. Nevertheless, David calls him even when unwilling to return to his house to the table; because although the Jewish people contemn returning to conscience, yet the Redeemer coming preaches to them spiritual mandates, saying: If ye had believed Moses, ye would perhaps have believed me also; for he wrote of me (John 5:46). The Jewish people, therefore, hold the law, which speaks of His divinity, which same people deign not to believe. Whence also Uriah is sent to Joab with letters from which he ought to be killed, because the very same Jewish people carry the law by which, it convicting them, they may die. For while retaining the mandates of the law they refuse to fulfill them, they themselves namely carry the judgment whence they may be condemned. What therefore can be said more wicked than this deed of David? what more pure than Uriah? But again, through the mystery, what is found more holy than David, what more unfaithful than Uriah, when both he, through the fault of his life, signs innocence in prophecy; and the other, through the innocence of his life, expresses fault in prophecy? Therefore it is not incongruously that through those things which were well done by the friends of Job, things to be done ill by heretics are signified, while the power of the sacred eloquence so relates past things as to express future things; so approves a thing in fact as to contradict it in mystery; so condemns deeds as to persuade that these things are to be done mystically.

MORAL SENSE.—[Old Edit. XXII]. 56. Why the devil sometimes rests from temptation.—Therefore, since we have fulfilled the mysteries of allegory by unfolding them limb by limb, let us now proceed by touching briefly upon the understanding of morality. For the mind hastens to discuss more obscure things; and if it is involved for long in open things, it is hindered from knocking at closed things, as is fitting. Often the ancient enemy, after he has inflicted the contest of temptations on our mind, recedes from his contest for a time; not that he may provide an end to his malice, but that returning suddenly, he may more easily break in unawares upon the hearts which he has rendered secure through quiet. Hence it is that he returns again to tempt the blessed man, and seeks his tortures, whom nevertheless supernal piety grants to him while withholding him, saying:

CHAPTER XXIX.

VERSE 6.—Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life (soul). 57. Sometimes God deserts us that He may keep us. Temptation occurs with the soul safe, when consent is denied. The wound of delight, however, must be cured by penitence. —For He so deserts us that He may keep us; He so keeps us, that yet by the permitted article of temptation He may show us the state of our own infirmity. Who soon went out from the face of the Lord, and wounded him whom he had received by striking him from the sole of the foot even to the crown of the head, because namely when he perceives license, beginning from the least things, and arriving even to the greater, he as it were transfixes the whole body of the mind by tearing it with the temptations inflicted. But yet he does not arrive at the soul by striking, because more interior than all thoughts, among the very wounds of delights which it receives, the intention of the secret purpose resists; so that although delight may bite the mind, yet it does not bend the deliberation of holy rectitude even to the softness of consent. We ought, however, through the asperity of penitence to wipe the very wounds of delights, and by the censure of rigid strictness, to cleanse if anything fluid emanates in thought. Whence well is it soon subjoined,

VERSE 8.—And he took him a potsherd to scrape the filth (pus). 58. To scrape the filth with a potsherd is to purge sin by judging oneself and contemplating one's own fragility. —For what is received by the potsherd but the vigor of strictness; what by the filth but the flux of illicit thought? Stricken, therefore, we scrape the filth with a potsherd when, after the pollutions of illicit thought, we cleanse ourselves by harshly judging ourselves. A potsherd can also be understood as the fragility of mortality. To cleanse the filth with a potsherd, therefore, is to weigh the course and fragility of mortality, and to wipe away the putrefaction of miserable delight. For while each one considers how quickly the flesh returns to dust, he speedily overcomes that which within basely assails him concerning the flesh. When, therefore, a perverse thought flows into the mind from temptation, filth as it were runs down from a wound. But the filth is more quickly wiped away if in our consideration fragility is held like a potsherd in the hand.

59. Perverse thoughts are not to be despised. —For neither are those things to be lightly esteemed which, although they do not draw out to the effect, yet are illicitly turned in the mind. Hence it is that our Redeemer had come as it were to scrape the filth from wounds, when He said: Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery: But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart (Matt. 5:27-28). The filth, therefore, is wiped away when the fault is cut off not only from the work but also from the thought. Hence it is that Jerubbaal, when he was shaking out the corn from the chaff, saw an angel, at whose command he immediately cooked a kid, which he placed upon a rock, and poured the broth of the flesh over it; which things the angel touched with a rod, and a fire going out from the rock consumed them (Judg. 6:11, 12, 19). For what is it to beat the corn with a rod but, by the rectitude of judgment, to separate the grains of virtues from the chaff of vices? But the angel appears to those doing these things, because the more the Lord denounces interior things, the more zealously men purge themselves from exterior things. He who commands the kid to be killed, that is, every appetite of our flesh to be immolated, and the flesh to be placed upon the rock, and the broth of the flesh to be poured over it. Whom else does the rock signify but Him of whom it is said by Paul: And that rock was Christ (1 Cor. 10:4). We place the flesh upon the rock, therefore, when we torture our body in the imitation of Christ. He also pours the broth of the flesh over it, who in the conversation of Christ empties out even carnal thoughts from himself. For as it were broth is poured from liquid flesh upon the rock, when the mind is also emptied of the flux of carnal thoughts. Which nevertheless the angel soon touches with a rod, because the power of divine help by no means deserts our intention. But from the rock fire goes out and consumes the broth and the flesh, because the spirit breathed from the Redeemer burns our heart with such a flame of compunction that it consumes everything in it that is illicit both of work and of thought. That, therefore, which there is to pour the broth upon the rock, this is here to cleanse the filth with a potsherd. For the perfect mind alertly watches that it not only refuses to do perverse things, but also wipes away everything that basely melts in itself through thoughts. [Old Edit. XXIII.] But often from the victory itself a war arises, so that when an unclean thought is conquered, the mind of the victor is struck with elation. Thus, therefore, it is necessary for the mind to be raised up through purity, that yet it should solicitously be laid low in humility. [Rec. XXVIII.] Whence also when it was said of the holy man, He scraped the filth with a potsherd, it is immediately aptly subjoined,

CHAPTER XXXI.

IBID.—Sitting in the dunghill.

60. The victor of temptation should preserve humility. The small elation of those who act, and those who think great things of themselves. The elation of the iniquitous, where others sin in things in which they themselves do not sin.—To sit in the dunghill, indeed, is for someone to feel vile and abject things about himself. For us to sit in the dunghill is to bring back the eyes of the mind to those things which we have done illicitly, by repenting; so that when we discern the filth of sins before us, we may incline everything that rises in the mind from elation. He sits in the dunghill who, solicitous, looks back at his own infirmity, and does not extol himself for the good things which he has perceived through grace. Had not Abraham sat in the dunghill within himself, who said: I will speak to my Lord, whereas I am dust and ashes (Gen. 18:27)? For we clearly discern in what place he had positioned himself within himself, who estimated himself as dust and ashes even while he was speaking with God. If, therefore, he so despises himself who has ascended even to the honor of divine conversation, it must be considered with solicitous intention by what punishment those are to be struck who neither profit toward the highest things and yet are extolled for the least. For there are some who, when they do small things, think great things of themselves: they raise the mind on high, and think that they precede others in the merits of virtues. These surely desert the dunghill of humility within themselves, and ascend the heights of elation; imitating him, namely, who first extolled himself within himself, but by elevating he prostrated himself; imitating him who was not content with the received dignity of his condition, saying: I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of heaven (Isa. 14:13). Whence also Babylonia, that is, the confused multitude of sinners, evilly joined to him, says: I sit a queen, and am no widow (Isa. 47:8, according to LXX). Whoever, therefore, swells within, has placed himself on high within himself. But he depresses himself more heavily in the lowest things by as much as he contemns to feel truly low things of himself. But there are some who indeed study to do nothing of virtue, but yet when they behold others sinning, they suspect themselves to be just in comparison with them. For neither does one or a similar fault transfix the hearts of all. For pride ensnares this one, anger perhaps supplants that one, but avarice tortures this one, and luxury indeed inflames that one. And it often happens that he whom pride depresses looks at another to see how anger enkindles him; and because anger does not instigate him as quickly, he already reputes himself better than the angry man, and is extolled within himself as if from justice, because he neglects to weigh the vice by which he is more heavily held.

It often happens that he whom avarice wounds sees another submerged in the whirlpool of luxury; and because he sees himself alienated from carnal pollution, he does not attend to with what filth of spiritual vice he is internally polluted; and while he weighs in another the evil which he himself does not have, he neglects to consider in himself what he does have: and so it happens that while the mind is led to judging the things of others, it is deprived of the light of its own judgment; and it becomes proud against the things of others more harshly by as much as it more negligently ignores its own.

[Old Edit. XXIV.] 61. He who is perfect should not lose humility by the sight of another's fault. Temptation sometimes knocks without and within.—But on the contrary those who truly desire to rise to the heights of virtues, when they hear of others' faults, immediately bring back the heart to their own; and they judge those others more rightly by as much as they more truly deplore their own. Because, therefore, every chosen one restrains himself in the consideration of his own infirmity, let it be said rightly that the holy man sits grieving in the dunghill. For he who truly humbles himself, with the eye of continual consideration, weighs as he profits with what filth of sins he is hedged about. But it is to be known that often in prosperous things the mind is touched by importunate temptation; but yet sometimes we also suffer adverse things externally and are fatigued within by the impulse of temptation; so that both scourges torture the flesh, and yet carnal suggestion floods to the mind. Whence also well after so many wounds of blessed Job, there were still subjoined also the words of the evilly persuading wife, who says:

CHAPTER XXXII.

VERSE 9.—Dost thou still continue in thy simplicity? Bless God and die.

62. Job's wife, evilly persuading, is carnal thought.—The wife indeed evilly persuading is carnal thought harassing the mind. For often, as has been said, we are both worn down by scourges without and fatigued by carnal suggestion within. For hence it is that Jeremiah deplores, saying: Abroad the sword destroyeth, and at home there is death like unto it (Lam. 1:20). For abroad the sword destroyeth, when vengeance striking us externally pierces us. But at home there is death like unto it, because one indeed sustains scourges, and yet within the conscience is not clean from the filth of temptation. Hence David says: Let them be as dust before the face of the wind, and let the angel of the Lord afflict them (Ps. 35:5). For he who in his heart is carried away by the breeze of temptation is elevated like dust before the face of the wind. And when amidst these things divine strictness strikes, what else but the angel of the Lord afflicts?

63. The chosen receive temptation in one way, the reprobate in another.—But these things are done in one way by the reprobate, in another by the chosen. For the hearts of the former are so tempted that they consent. But those of the latter indeed receive temptations, but they resist. The mind of the former is captured with delight; and if for a time that which is evilly suggested displeases, yet afterwards through deliberation it pleases. But these so receive the darts of temptations that they are always fatigued by resisting; and if at any time the tempted mind is carried away even to delight, they nevertheless are sooner ashamed of that very subreption of their delight, and with strong censure they redargue whatever they detect arising carnal within themselves. Whence also well it is soon subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXIII [Rec. XIX]. VERSE 10.—Thou hast spoken like one of the foolish women. If we have received good things at the hand of the Lord, why should we not receive evil? 64. How one must resist things harsh or smooth.—It is indeed worthy that the holy mind should restrain by spiritual correction whatever carnally murmurs insolently within itself; lest the flesh, either speaking harsh things, should draw it to impatience, or speaking smooth things, should dissolve it to the fluxes of lust. Therefore let manly censure, redarguing the suggestion of illicit thought, repress the dissolved softness of turpitude, saying: Thou hast spoken like one of the foolish women. But whoever desires to subdue vices, and tends toward the eternal heights of internal retribution with the steps of true intention, the more he sees himself besieged on all sides by the war of vices, the more robustly he girds himself with the arms of virtues; and he fears the darts by so much the less as he strongly fortifies his breast against these coming things.

65. Vices hide themselves under the appearance of virtues.—But often while we strive to be supported by great virtues against this war of temptations, certain vices hide themselves under the appearance of virtues to us, and come to us as if with a smooth face; but of what adversity they are is felt when they are discussed. Whence also the friends of blessed Job come as if for consolation, but they break out into contumelies; because ensnaring vices take the face of virtues, but they strike us with hostile invective. For often immoderate anger wishes to appear as justice; and often dissolved remission, as mercy. Often incautious fear appears as humility; often unbridled pride desires to appear as liberty. Therefore friends come to console, but they slide into words of reproof; because surely vices cloaked with the appearance of virtues begin indeed with a smooth surface, but they disturb us with harsh contrariety. Well, however, it is said:

And again let the consideration of gifts refrain the impatience of harsh thought, saying: If we have received good things at the hand of the Lord, why should we not receive evil?

CHAPTER XXXIV.

VERSE 11.—For they had made an appointment together, that they might come and visit him together.

66. They enter into a league against us.—Vices indeed make an appointment with one another under the pretext of virtues, because there are certain ones which are joined together among themselves by a certain agreement against us, just as pride and anger, remissness and fear. For anger is close to pride, remissness to fear. Therefore they come by appointment, which are associated against us from a certain kinship of perversity. [Old Edit. XXV.] But if we recognize the misery of our captivity, if from the love of the eternal fatherland we grieve in our innermost parts, the vices, which steal upon the evilly joyful, cannot prevail over the well sorrowful. Whence also well it is added:

CHAPTER XXXV.

VERSE 12.—And when they had lifted up their eyes afar off, they did not know him.

67. Affliction puts vices to flight.—For vices by no means know us when we are afflicted, because as soon as they have knocked at a sorrowful heart, being reprobated they leap back; and those things which had known us when joyful, because they penetrated us, are unable to know us when mourning, because they are broken by our very rigor. But the ancient enemy, by as much as he sees himself strongly detected in them, by so much the more deeply he hides them under the image of virtues. Whence also it is added:

CHAPTER XXXVI. IBID.—And crying out they wept, and rending their garments they sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven, and they sat with him on the ground seven days and seven nights. 68. Unless they should be mocked under the appearance of virtues.—For piety is signified by weeping, discretion by the rending of garments, the affection of works by the dust of heads, humility by sitting. For sometimes the ensnaring enemy simulates something pious, so that he may lead to the end of cruelty; as it is when he prohibits a fault from being punished through discipline, so that what is not repressed here may be struck by the fire of Gehenna. Sometimes he presents the image of discretion to the eyes, and leads to the snares of indiscretion; as it is when, by his impulse, we grant more of nourishment to ourselves as if discreetly for infirmity, but indiscreetly we excite the wars of the flesh against ourselves. Sometimes he simulates the affection of good works, but through this he inflicts the inquietude of labors; as it is when someone is not able to rest, and as if from leisure fears to be judged. Sometimes he ostentates the image of humility, so that he may subtract the affection of utility; as it is when he asserts some to be more infirm and useless to themselves than they are, so that while they consider themselves too unworthy, they may fear to minister the things in which they could profit their neighbors.

69. Compunction fortifies against vices.—But these vices which the ancient enemy hides under the appearance of virtues, the hand of compunction examines very subtly. For he who truly grieves within, strongly foresees what things are to be done without, and what are not to be done. For if the virtue of compunction affects us in our innermost parts, all the noise of perverse suggestion falls silent. Whence also follows:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

VERSE 13.—And no one spoke a word to him: for they saw that his grief was very great.

70. Those who can make vices serve the use of virtue.—For if the heart truly grieves, vices have no tongue against us. For when the life of rectitude is fully sought, the superfluous suggestion of perversity is stopped. But often if we bind ourselves with strong study against the incentives of vices, we even change those very vices to the use of virtue. For anger possesses some: but this, while they subject it to reason, they turn into the ministry of holy zeal. Pride raises some; but while they incline the mind to divine fear, they change this to the defense of justice into the voice of free authority. The strength of the flesh entices some; but while they subject the body to exercising pious works, whence they suffered the sting of iniquity, thence they purchase the gains of piety. Whence also well the same blessed Job after many contests immolates a victim for his friends. For those whom he bore long as enemies through contention, at length through sacrifice he restores as citizens; because while by subduing we turn whatever vicious thoughts into virtues, we change the adverse studies of temptations through the victim of intention, as it were to friendly hearts. Let it suffice that we have discussed these things in three volumes in a threefold way. For in the very beginning of this work we fixed the root of the tongue as if into the mass of a tree about to be born, so that we may afterwards produce the branches of exposition, as individual places require.

BOOK FOUR.

In which Gregory, having prefaced with a few words that the letter of Scripture sometimes fights with itself, and that the imprecations of Job like those of Jeremiah and David, according to that which they sound, cannot be understood without absurdity, exposes the words of Job from the beginning of the third chapter, to the twentieth verse historically, mystically, and morally.

CHAPTER I.

PREFACE. 101. The letter of Scripture sometimes contradicts itself.

The sense of Scripture is penetrated by the humble by assiduity of reading.—He who considers the text and ignores the sense of sacred locution, does not so much instruct himself with erudition as confound himself with ambiguity, because sometimes the words of the letter contradict themselves; but while they dissent from themselves through contrariety, they send the reader to the understanding of the truth. For what is it that Solomon says: It is better to eat and drink (Eccles. 2:24); and not long after subjoins: It is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting (Eccles. 7:3)? Why did he prefer mourning to feasting, who before praised eating and drinking? For if by election it is good to eat and drink, without doubt it ought to be better to hasten to the house of joy than to the house of lamentation. Hence it is that he again says: Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth (Eccles. 11:9). And a little after subjoins: For youth and pleasure are vain (ibid. 11:10). What is this, that he either first commands things to be reprehended, or after commands he reprehends, except that he hints by the words of the letter themselves, that he who suffers difficulty externally should consider the understanding of truth, which he may follow? which understanding of truth surely, when it is sought through humility of heart, is penetrated by assiduity of reading. For as we discern the faces of unknown men and do not know their hearts, but if we are joined to them by familiar locution, by the use of colloquy we also investigate their thoughts; so when in sacred eloquence only the history is looked at, nothing else than the face is seen; but if we are joined to this by assiduous use, we surely penetrate its mind as if from the familiarity of conversation. For while we collect some things from others, we easily recognize in its words that it is one thing which they intimate, another which they sound. But by so much is anyone rendered a stranger to that knowledge as he is bound in its surface alone.

CHAPTER II.

Job's imprecations cannot be understood according to the letter without absurdity.

Ecce, for that which blessed Job is described to have cursed his day, saying: Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said: A man-child is conceived; if it be attended to according to the surface, what is found more reprehensible than these words? For who does not know that the day in which he was born could by no means stand then? For it is the mode of time that it has no state of mansion. For because it tends to be through things to come, it always hastens from things past not to be. Why therefore would so great a man curse a thing which he was not ignorant did by no means subsist? But perhaps someone may say that from this the weight of his virtue is seen, because being moved by tribulation, he brings a curse upon that thing which it is clear least subsists. But a perceived reason quickly destroys this, because if the thing which he cursed did subsist, he brought in a pernicious curse: but if it did not subsist, an idle one.

Whoever indeed is full of His spirit, who says: Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment (Matt. 12:36), fears so to admit idle things, as also pernicious ones. To which sentence is still added: Let that day be turned into darkness, let not God regard it from above, and let it not be in recordation, and let it not be illustrated with light: let darkness and the shadow of death obscure it, let a mist occupy it, and let it be involved in bitterness. Let a darksome whirlwind possess that night, let that night be solitary, nor worthy of praise; let it expect light, and not see it, nor the rising of the surging aurora. Why is the day, which is known to have passed by the course of time, said to be turned into darkness? And since it was clear that it did not subsist, why is it wished that the shadow of death obscure it; or what mist occupies it, what implication of bitterness involves it; or what darksome whirlwind possesses the night, which no state holds? Or how is it wished to become solitary, which by passing was already nothing? Or how does it expect light, which both lacks sense and does not remain in its own state? To which words is still subjoined:

VERSE 11.—Why did I not die in the womb? Why did I not perish immediately as I came out of the belly? 71. Nothing of impatience in Job.—If we consider only the surface of the history, nothing of impatience seems more open than that so great a man, broken by the weight of sorrows, should seek his own death. But because it is certain that he was not broken by sorrows, it remains that he should be sought in the sense of his words. For he who, when he had lost everything, said: The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; as it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done: blessed be the name of the Lord (Job 1:21); he who, when he was struck with a wound, said: If we have received good things at the hand of the Lord, why should we not receive evil? (Job 2:10); how could he, who was not broken by the loss of things, nor by the death of children, nor by the wound of the body, be broken by the words of a wife? For he who stood firm against things, how could he fall before words? Why therefore does he curse his day, except that the 'day' here is not that which passes by the course of time, but that which is the light of knowledge? And the 'night' here is not that which follows the day, but that which is the ignorance of the mind.

But what is understood by the 'day' but that very time of the fall of man? For then the light of truth was as it were turned into the darkness of error for him. Or what is understood by the 'day' but the very light of the knowledge of God, which man lost by sinning? For he who by sinning lost the light of knowledge, surely fell into the night of ignorance. Why therefore does he curse the day of his birth, except that he deplores the very condition of human fragility? For he who is born in the night of ignorance, surely seeks the light of truth. But he who is born in the light of knowledge, if he sins, loses the light which he had. Therefore he curses the day of his birth, because he deplores that he was born to sin. For he who is born to sin, surely is born to the night of ignorance. Whence also follows:

CHAPTER III.

Why did I not die in the womb, why did I not perish immediately as I came out of the belly? Why was I received upon the knees? Why was I suckled at the breasts? For now I should have been lying still and quiet, and I should have rested in my sleep.

A confirmation of the proposed argument. How men were delivered from original sin before baptism was instituted. If he had perished immediately upon coming out of the womb, would he have conceived the merit of retribution from this very destruction? Do the stillborn enjoy eternal rest? For whoever is not released by the water of regeneration is held bound by the guilt of the first bond. But what the water of baptism avails among us, this among the ancients was effected either by faith alone for little ones, or by the virtue of sacrifice for those older, or for those who had come from the stock of Abraham, by the mystery of circumcision. For that everyone is conceived with the fault of the first parent, the Prophet testifies, saying: Behold, I was conceived in iniquities (Psal. L, 7). And because he whom the water of salvation does not wash does not lose the punishments of original guilt, Truth openly declares through itself, saying: Unless a man be born again of water and the Holy Spirit, he shall not have eternal life (John III, 5). What is it then that he desires to have been dead in the womb, and hopes that he could have rested by the benefits of that same death, since it is certain that the rest of life would by no means receive him, if the sacraments of divine knowledge had by no means delivered him from the guilt of original fault? He who still adds with whom he could have rested, saying: With kings and counselors of the earth, who build solitudes for themselves. Who is ignorant that the kings of the earth and the counselors are as far from solitude as they are thronged by innumerable crowds of followers? Or how difficult it is for those to tend toward rest who are bound by such hard knots of multiple reasonings? Scripture attesting, which says: A most severe judgment shall be for those who are in authority (Wisd. VI, 6). Whence in the Gospel Truth says: To whom much is given, much will be required of him (Luke XII, 48). He who still suggests whom he would have had as companions in the same rest, saying: Or with princes, who possess gold, and fill their houses with silver. It is very rare that those who possess gold tend toward rest, since Truth says through itself: It is difficult for those who have riches to enter into the kingdom of heaven (Matth. XIX, 24). For those who here gape for the multiplying of riches, what joys of the other life do they hope for? Which, however, to show that it is very rare, and can happen only from a divine miracle, our Redeemer said: With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible. Because therefore these words on the surface disagree with reason, the letter itself already indicates that the holy man says nothing according to the letter in them.

[Old III].

The imprecations of neither David nor Jeremiah are to be taken literally. But if we first discuss other curses in the sacred eloquence, we shall more subtly investigate that which was uttered by the mouth of blessed Job. For what is it that David, who did not return evil to those who requited him with evil, when Saul and Jonathan fell in war, curses the mountains of Gilboa, saying: Ye mountains of Gilboa, let neither dew nor rain come upon you, neither let there be fields of firstfruits, for there the shield of Saul was cast away, as though he had not been anointed with oil (II Sam. I, 21)? What is it that Jeremiah, when he saw his preaching hindered by the difficulty of his hearers, curses, saying: Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father, saying: A man child is born to thee (Jerem. XX, 15)? What then did the mountains of Gilboa offend at the death of Saul, so that neither dew nor rain should fall on them, and the word of the sentence should dry them from every bud of greenness? But because Gilboa is interpreted as "a running down," and by Saul, anointed and dead, the death of our Mediator is expressed; not undeservedly by the mountains of Gilboa the proud hearts of the Jews are signified, which while they flow down in the desires of this world, mixed themselves in the death of Christ, that is, the Anointed. And because in them the anointed king dies corporally, they themselves are dried from all dew of grace. Of whom also it is well said: That they may not be fields of firstfruits. For the proud minds of the Hebrews do not bear firstfruits, because at the coming of the Redeemer, for the most part remaining in perfidy, they would not follow the beginnings of faith. For the holy Church, fertilized in her firstfruits by the multitude of the Gentiles, will hardly at the end of the world receive the Jews whom she shall find; and gathering the last, she will place them as the remnants of the crops. Of which remnants indeed Isaiah says: If the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved (Isaiah X, 22, sec. LXX; Rom. IX, 27). However, the mountains of Gilboa can for this reason be cursed by the mouth of the prophet, so that while the fruit does not arise because the earth is parched, the possessors of the earth may be struck with the loss of sterility, so that they themselves might receive the sentence of the curse, who had deserved by their iniquity to receive the death of the king among them. But what is it that that man received the sentence of the curse from the Prophet, who announced his birth to his father? This indeed is as much more full of mystery within as it is void of human reason without. For if anything outwardly reasonable had perhaps sounded, it would by no means have kindled us to the study of interior understanding. Therefore he hints something more fully to us within, by showing nothing reasonable without. For if from his mother's womb the prophet came forth to be afflicted in this world, what did the messenger of his birth offend? But what does the person of the fluctuating prophet designate, if not the mutability of the human race coming through the merit of punishment? And what is expressed by his father, if not this world from which we are born? And who is that man who announces our birth to the father, if not the ancient enemy, who when he considers us fluctuating in thoughts, instigates the minds of the evil, who excel from the authority of this world, to the persuasion of our deception; and when he sees us act weakly, he extols those things as strong with favors, and speaks as of male children born, when he congratulates that we have stood out as corrupters of truth through a lie? Therefore he announces a male born to the father, when he demonstrates to this world him whom he has persuaded to be made a corrupter of innocence. For when it is said to anyone sinning and being proud, Thou hast acted like a man, what else is he declared than a male born in the world? Rightly therefore the man who announces the male born is cursed, because by his very announcement the reprobate joy of our corrupter is indicated. By these curses of holy Scripture, then, we learn what to seek in the voice of the curse in blessed Job, lest the reader, not understanding, should presume to redargue his words, whom God remunerates after wounds and words. Because therefore we have in some way distinguished these things which were to be sought in the preface, let us now follow the words of the history by discoursing on them.

[Rec. V].

CHAP. III. VERS. 1-3.---After this Job opened his mouth, and cursed his day, saying: Let the day perish in which I was born.

1. HISTORICAL AND MYSTICAL SENSE. Job did not utter a curse out of impatience.---It must not be discussed neglectfully what is said, He opened his mouth. For sacred Scripture indicates from these things which it smallly premises, that those which it subjoins are to be reverently expected. For as we do not know what closed vessels have within, but when the mouth of the vessels is opened we recognize what is contained inside; so the hearts of the saints, which are hidden while the mouth is closed, are detected when the mouth is opened; and when they detect their thoughts, they are said to open the mouth, so that with an intent mind, as if from opened vessels, we may hasten to know what they contain within, and recreate ourselves with their inward odor. Whence also to the Lord about to speak sublime precepts on the mount it is premised: Opening His mouth He spoke (Matth. V, 2); although there this also ought to be taken, because then He opened His mouth in precepts, in which He had long since opened the mouths of the prophets. But it is to be very skillfully observed what is said, After this, so that indeed the virtue of the thing which is done may be truly felt from the time. For first the vastness of things, the extinction of pledges, the pain of wounds, the persuasion of the wife, the arrival of the friends are described, who are remembered to have rent their garments, and to have wept crying out, to have sprinkled their heads with dust, and to have sat long in the earth in silence, and then it is subjoined: After this Job opened his mouth, and cursed his day; so that by the very order of the narration it may be weighed that he by no means uttered a curse through impatience, who broke out into the voice of the curse while his friends were still silent. If indeed being moved by anger he cursed, at the hearing of the loss of substance, at the knowledge of the death of his sons, the pain would surely excite him to the curse. But what he then said we have heard. For he said: The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away (Job I, 21). Again, if being moved by anger he cursed, at least being struck in the body, or being evilly persuaded by his wife, he could have brought in a curse. But what he then answered we have acknowledged. For he said: Thou hast spoken as one of the foolish women. If we have received good things from the hand of the Lord, why should we not sustain evil things? (Job II, 10.) But after this it is described that the friends come, weep, sit, are silent; and soon this is subjoined, that he is said to have cursed his day. Too incongruous, therefore, it is that we should suspect him, with no one instigating, with no one striking, to break out into the voice of the curse from impatience, whom indeed we know among the losses of things and the death of sons, among the wounds of the body, among the words of the evilly persuading wife, to have returned great praises to the creator with a humble mind. He manifested, therefore, with what mind he said these things in quiet, who even being struck poured out so many praises of God. Nor indeed could he afterwards be proud when not struck, whom pain showed humble even in the striking. But when we certainly know that sacred Scripture prohibits a curse, why do we say that that is sometimes rightly done which we are not ignorant is to be avoided by the same sacred eloquence?

[Rec. VI.] 2. One curse is from judgment, another from vengeance.---It is to be known indeed that sacred Scripture mentions a curse in two ways, one indeed which it approves, another which it condemns. For a curse is uttered in one way by the judgment of justice, in another by the malice of vengeance. For a curse by the judgment of justice was uttered to the first man himself when he sinned, when he heard: Cursed is the earth in thy work (Gen. III, 17). A curse is uttered by the judgment of justice when it is said to Abraham: I will curse them that curse thee (Gen. XII, 3). Again, because a curse is brought forth not by the judgment of justice, but by the malice of vengeance, we are admonished by the voice of the apostle Paul preaching, who says: Bless, and curse not (Rom. XII, 14). And again: Neither shall railers possess the kingdom of God (I Cor. VI, 10). God therefore is said to curse, and yet man is prohibited to curse; because what man does from the malice of vengeance, God does only from the examination and virtue of justice. But when holy men utter the sentence of a curse, they do not break out into this from a desire for revenge, but from the examination of justice. For within they behold the subtle judgment of God, and they know that they ought to strike with a curse the evils arising without; and in that they do not sin in the curse, in that they do not disagree from the internal judgment. Hence it is that Peter twisted the sentence of a curse against Simon offering him money, saying: Thy money be with thee unto perdition (Acts VIII, 20). For he who did not say, is, but be, signified that he said these things in the optative, not the indicative mood. Hence Elijah said to the two captains of fifty coming to him: If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven and consume thee (II Kings I, 10). With how much reason of truth the sentence of both of these prevailed, the end of the case showed. For both Simon perished in eternal perdition, and a flame coming from above consumed the two captains of fifty. Therefore the subsequent virtue testifies with what mind the sentence of the curse is brought forth. For when both the innocence of the curser remains, and yet the curse absorbs him who is cursed even unto destruction, it is gathered from the end of both parts that the sentence taken from the one and inward Judge is hurled against the guilty one.

3. Job's curse is from the rectitude of the judge.---Therefore if we subtly weigh the words of blessed Job, his curse is not from the malice of a delinquent, but from the rectitude of a judge; it is not of one moved by anger, but of one tranquil in doctrine. For he who brought in such right things while cursing did not succumb to the vice of perturbation, but bestowed the mastership of doctrine. For he saw the friends weep with a cry, he saw them rend their garments, he saw them sprinkle their heads with dust, he saw them become mute by the consideration of his percussion; and the holy man perceived that those who were seeking temporal prosperity, from the comparison of their own mind had believed him broken by temporal adversity. He perceived that they would not weep so desperately for him struck with transitory affliction, unless they themselves withdrew a desperate mind from the hope of internal health; and while he breaks out outwardly into the voice of grief, he shows to those wounded within the virtue of the medicine, saying: Let the day perish in which I was born.

[Rec. VII.] 4. He curses the day of mutability from the intuition of eternity.---For what ought to be understood by the day of birth, but all this time of our mortality? which as long as it retains us in this corruption of our mutability, the immutability of eternity does not appear to us. He therefore who already sees the day of eternity sustains with difficulty the day of his mortality. And it is to be noted that he does not say, Let the day perish in which I was fashioned; but, Let the day perish in which I was born. For man was fashioned in the day of justice, but born already in the time of fault. For Adam was fashioned, but Cain was first born. What is it therefore to curse the day of birth, but openly to say: Let the day of mutability perish, and the light of eternity break forth.

[Vet. VII.] 5. The time of our mutability will one day utterly perish. The day which is here so desired to perish that it be ill, is the apostate spirit.---But because we are accustomed to say "perish" in two ways (for we say "perish" in one way when we wish something not to be; and we say "perish" in another way when we wish it to be ill), by this which is subjoined of this day, Let darkness obscure it, and let it be wrapped in bitterness, it is clearly shown that this day is desired to perish not so that it be not, but so that it be ill. For that cannot be wrapped in bitterness which is not in every way utterly lost. But this time of our mutability is not some day so to perish, that is, to pass away, that it be ill; but so that it utterly be not, the angel in the sacred eloquence attesting, who says: By Him that liveth for ever and ever, that time shall be no longer (Apoc. X, 6). For even if the Prophet says, Their time shall be for ever (Psal. LXXX, 16), because time fails by moments, he called their failure by the name of time, showing that those who are separated from the consolation of internal vision fail without utter failure. Because therefore this time of our mortality perishes not so that it be ill, but so that it be not; it is to be sought what it is that is desired to perish not so that it be not, but so that it be ill. For the human soul, or the angelic spirit, is so immortal that it can die; so mortal that it cannot die. For it loses living blessedly, whether through vice or through punishment. But it does not lose living essentially, neither through vice nor through punishment. For it fails from the quality of living, but it does not feel the destruction of subsisting in every way even while dying. So that I may speak briefly, it is both immortally mortal and mortally immortal.

[Rec. VIII.] While therefore the day is desired that it perish, and a little after is said to be about to be wrapped in bitterness; whom shall we believe that the holy man wished to express by the name of day, but the apostate spirit, who in the essence of living subsists even by dying? whom the destruction of life does not withdraw, because being placed in eternal pain, an immortal death extinguishes him by preserving him: who being already cast down from the glory of blessedness, is still desired to perish, so that, indeed, being thrust back with worthy punishments, he may also lose the license of tempting.

[Vet. VIII, Rec. IX]. 6. For what reason it is day, or for what reason it is night. What is desired for him, while he is desired to perish.---He indeed exhibits himself as day, because he entices through prosperity; but he ends in the darkness of night, because he leads to adversity. For he was showing day when he said, In whatever day you eat of it, your eyes shall be opened, and you shall be as gods (Gen. III, 5); but he brought in night when he led to the darkness of mortality. The day therefore is the brought-in promise of better things; but the night is the exhibited experience of calamities. The ancient enemy is day by nature well fashioned; but he is night by merit fallen into darkness. He is day when by promising good things he simulates himself an angel of light to human aspects, Paul attesting who says, For Satan himself transformeth himself into an angel of light (II Cor. XI, 14), but he is night when he obscures the minds of those consenting with the darkness of error. The holy man, therefore, bewailing the cause of the whole human race in his own grief, and thinking nothing special in every way in a special wound, let him bring back to mind the origin of the fault; and by the consideration of justice, let him temper the pain of the punishment. Let him see the human race whence whither it fell, and let him say: Let the day perish in which I was born, and the night in which it was said, A man is conceived. As if he should say openly: Let the hope brought in by the apostate angel perish, who simulating himself as day, shone forth from the promise of divinity; but exhibiting himself as night, obscured to us the light of our immortality. Let the ancient enemy perish, who showed the light of promise, and conferred the darkness of sin; who made himself known as day by fawning, but led even to the dark night from the impressed blindness of the heart. It follows:

CAPUT II.

VERS. 4.---Let that day be turned into darkness.

7. It is turned into darkness when the prosperity which it promises is understood to be adversity.---This day as it were shines to the minds of men when the persuasion of its depravity is believed to be prosperity, and what it is within is not seen. But when its iniquity is acknowledged as it is, the day of false promise is as it were obscured by certain darkness before the eyes of our judgment; because, indeed, what it is by merit is perceived such in its blandishment. Into darkness, therefore, the day is turned, when we understand as adversity even the prosperity which it promises by persuading. Into darkness the day is turned when the ancient enemy is perceived by us as he is when raging, even while lurking under blandishments; lest he should mock by feigned prosperities as if from the light of day, and draw us through true miseries to the darkness of sin. It follows:

[Old IX].

IBID.---Let not God seek it from above, and let it not be illustrated with light.

8. Why human nature was repaired, and not the angelic.---Omnipotent God, as He was able to make good things out of nothing, so, when He willed, through the mystery of His incarnation He repaired even lost goods. But He had made two creatures for understanding Him, namely, the angelic and the human: but pride struck both, and broke them from the state of innate rectitude. But one had the covering of flesh, but the other bore nothing weak of flesh. For an angel is only spirit, but man is both spirit and flesh. Therefore the Creator, having pitied that He might redeem, ought to have brought back to Himself that one which in the perpetration of the fault is certain to have had something from weakness; and He ought to have repelled the apostate angel so much more deeply, as when he fell from the fortitude of persisting, he bore nothing weak from the flesh. Whence rightly the Psalmist, when he said that the Redeemer had pitied men, expressed also the very cause of the mercy, saying: And He remembered that they are flesh (Psal. LXXVII, 39). [Rec. X.] As if He were saying: By how much He saw their weak things, by so much He would not strictly punish their faults. There is yet another thing, for which both lost man ought to be repaired, and the proud spirit could not be repaired, because indeed the angel fell by his own malice, but an alien one prostrated man. Because therefore the human race is brought back to the light of penitence by the coming of the Redeemer, but the apostate angel is recalled to the light of restoration by no hope of pardon, by no amendment of conversion; let it be rightly said: Let not God seek him from above, and let him not be illustrated with light. As if it were openly said: Because he himself brought in darkness, let him tolerate without end what he did; nor let him ever receive the light of his former status, because he lost this even without being persuaded. It follows:

CHAPTER IV.

VERS. 5.---Let darkness and the shadow of death obscure it.

9. The blindness of error so overwhelms the devil, that he is not about to rise again to the light of penitence.---By the shadow of death, oblivion ought to be understood; because as death slays life, so oblivion extinguishes memory. Because therefore the apostate angel is delivered to eternal oblivion, he is obscured by the shadow of death. Let it be said therefore: Let darkness and the shadow of death obscure him; that is, let the blindness of his error so overwhelm him, that he may by no means rise again further to the light of penitence through the memory of divine regard. It follows:

CHAPTER V

[Old X].

IBID.---Let a dark cloud occupy it, and let it be wrapped in bitterness.

10. What he suffers now, and what he is about to suffer after the judgment.---The ancient enemy, bound by the chains of his own iniquity, is suffering one thing now, and will suffer another at the end. For because he fell from the order of inward light, he now confounds himself within by the dark cloud of error. But after this he is wrapped in bitterness, because from the merit of his voluntary dark cloud he is tortured with the eternal torment of Gehenna. Let it be said therefore: He who lost the serenity of inward light, what is it that he tolerates before the extreme punishment? Let a dark cloud occupy him. Let there also be subjoined the subsequent punishment which devastates him even without end: Let him be wrapped in bitterness. For everything which is wrapped indicates its end as if nowhere; because as it does not show where it begins, so it does not detect where it ceases. The ancient enemy, therefore, is said to be wrapped in bitterness, because punishments not only of every kind, but also infinite, are prepared for his pride.

Which punishment of his indeed receives its beginning when the Judge, having become strict, comes to the extreme judgment. Whence also it is well added:

CHAPTER VI

[Rec. XI].

VERS. 6.---Let a dark whirlwind possess that night.

11. With how great a tempest he is snatched to eternal punishments.---For it is written: God our God shall come manifestly, and shall not be silent. A fire shall burn in His sight, and a mighty tempest round about Him (Psal. XLIX, 3). A dark whirlwind therefore possesses this night, because that dreadful tempest snatches the apostate spirit from the sight of the strict Judge to eternal punishments. By a whirlwind therefore this night is possessed, because his proud blindness is struck by strict animadversion. It follows:

CHAPTER VII.

IBID.---Let it not be accounted in the days of the year, nor numbered in the months.

12. What is to be understood by the name of day, month, and year, in the words of Job.---We receive not inconveniently the year as the preaching of supernal grace; because as in a year time is perfected by gathered days, so in supernal grace the manifold life of virtues is completed. By the year also the multitude of the redeemed can be understood; because as a year is drawn from a multitude of days, so from the collection of all goods, that innumerable universe of the elect is filled. For Isaiah preaches this year of perfect multitude, saying: The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me: He hath sent me to preach to the meek, that I might heal the contrite of heart, and preach indulgence to the captives, and opening to those shut up, that I might preach the acceptable year of the Lord (Isai. LXI, 1). For the acceptable year of the Lord is preached when the future people of the faithful to be illustrated with the light of truth is foretold. But what through the days, if not each single mind of the elect; what through the months, if not their multiplied Churches, which make one catholic one, is designated? That night therefore let it not be accounted in the days of the year, nor numbered in the months; because the ancient enemy, pressed by the darkness of his own pride, beholds indeed the coming of the Redeemer, but by no means returns to pardon with the elect. For hence it is written: For nowhere doth He take hold of angels, but of the seed of Abraham He taketh hold (Hebr. II, 16). [Rec. XII.] For for this reason our Redeemer was made not an angel, but man, because this without doubt ought to have been made, which He redeemed; so that He might both desert the lost angel by not taking hold of him, and repair man by taking hold of him in Himself. [Vet. XI.] These days which remain in internal light can also be understood as angelic spirits; but the months as their orders and digni-ties. For each single spirit, because they shine, are days. But because they are distinguished by certain certain dignities, as some are thrones, others dominations, others principalities, others powers; for this very distribution of the hosts, they are called months. But because the ancient enemy by no means is reduced to the merit of light, by no means to the order of supernal hosts: he is neither numbered in the days of the year, nor in the months. For thus the blindness of perpetrated pride weighs him down, that he should not return further to those supernal hosts of inward clarity. By no means already is he mixed with the standing dignities of light, because by the merit of his own darkness he is always depressed to the lowest parts. Who because he remains for ever void of that frequency of the heavenly country, rightly is there still subjoined:

CHAPTER VIII.

VERSE 7.---Let that night be solitary, and not worthy of praise.

13. The devil, when man is redeemed and idols are rejected, becomes solitary and without praise.---That night is made solitary, because it is separated by a perpetual distinction from the frequency of the heavenly country. Which, however, can also be understood in another way, namely, that it loses man, whom it had made its companion to perdition; and the enemy perishes alone with his own body, while the grace of the Redeemer reforms many whom he had destroyed. Therefore, the night is made solitary, when those who are elect being taken away, the ancient enemy alone is delivered over to the eternal fires of Gehenna. But it is well said: "Nor worthy of praise." For when the human race, weighed down by the darkness of error, believed stones to be gods, by this very fact that it served idols, what else did it do than praise the deeds of its seducer? Whence it is well said by Paul: "We know that an idol is nothing; but the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons" (1 Cor. 8:4). Those therefore who were subjected to the veneration of idols, what else did they praise than the darkness of night? But behold we now see, that that night is known not to be worthy of praise, when already the veneration of idols is rejected by the redeemed human race; and a solitary night is left, because one does not go to torments with the damned apostate spirit. It follows:

CHAPTER IX.

VERSE 8.---Let them curse it who curse the day, who are ready to raise up Leviathan.

14. By Christ his malice is already destroyed; in the end of the world his power shall be extinguished.---In the old translation it is not so said; but, "Let him curse it, who cursed the day, who is to take the great whale." By which words it is openly shown that the coming perdition of Antichrist at the end of the world is foreseen by the holy man. For the malignant spirit, who by merit is night, feigns himself to be day in the end of the world, when he shows himself as if God to men, when he falsely attributes to himself the clarity of Divinity, and exalts himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped. Therefore he curses the night, who curses the day; because He now destroys his malice, who by the illumination of His coming shall then also extinguish the power of his strength. Whence also it is well subjoined: "Who is to take the great whale." For the strength of this whale is taken in the waters, because the craftiness of the ancient enemy is overcome by the sacrament of baptism.

15. The elect angels indicate to us the darkness of his deceit.---But what is said in the old translation concerning the Author of all things, this in this translation, which is derived to us from the Hebrew and Arabic speech, is mentioned concerning His elect angels. Concerning these it is said: "Let them curse it who curse the day." [Rec. XIII.] For this proud spirit wished to show himself as day even to the angelic powers, when exalting himself above the rest as if in the power of divinity, he drew so many legions after him to destruction. But these indeed, who persisted with a humble heart in their Author, when they perceived night to be in his error, trod under foot the day of that clarity by thinking humble things of themselves: who now indicate to us the darkness of his deceit, and demonstrate how much his feigned clarity is to be despised. Let it be said therefore of the dark night, which closes the eyes of human infirmity: "Let them curse it, who curse the day," that is, let those elect spirits denounce by damning the darkness of his error, who see the magnitude of that clarity already feigned from the beginning. But it is well added: "Who are ready to raise up Leviathan." For Leviathan interpreted is called "their addition." Of whom indeed, but of men? But it is rightly called "their addition," because after he brought in the first fault by evil suggestion, he does not cease to increase this daily by more grievous persuasions. Or certainly by way of reproach he was called Leviathan, that is, called the addition of men. For he found them immortal in paradise; but by promising divinity to immortals, he promised as it were to add to them something beyond what they were. But while he blandly asserted that he would give things not possessed, he craftily withdrew also those possessed. Whence also the prophet describes the same Leviathan, saying: "Upon Leviathan the bar serpent, upon Leviathan the crooked serpent" (Isai. 27:1). For this Leviathan in that which he promised to add to man, crept to him with crooked windings; because while he falsely promised impossibilities, he truly took away also possibilities. [Vet. XII.] We must indeed inquire why he who had said "serpent," and immediately subjoining "crooked," interposed "bar," unless perhaps because in the crookedness of the serpent there is a flowing softness, but in the bar there is the hardness of rigidity. That he might therefore mark him both as hard and soft, he names both "bar" and "serpent." For he is hard through malice, soft through blandishments. Therefore he is called a bar, because he strikes even to death; but a serpent, because he pours himself in softly through snares.

16. The elect of the angels keep the devil shut up in the pit of the abyss.---But the elect spirits of the angels now keep this Leviathan shut up in the pit of the abyss. Whence it is written: "I saw an angel coming down from heaven, having the key of the abyss, and a great chain in his hand: and he apprehended the dragon, the ancient serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years, and cast him into the abyss" (Apoc. 20:1, 2 et seq.). Whom however in the end of the world they recall to more open contests, and relax him entirely in his strengths against us. Whence also there again it is written: "When the thousand years shall be finished, Satan shall be loosed" (Ibid., 7). For that apostate angel, because he had been so created, that he was eminent above the other legions of angels, so by pride fell, that he is subjected to the dominion of the standing angels; so that either now for our utility, they ministering, he lies hid bound, or then for our probation, they relaxing him, being loosed he may exercise himself with all his strengths against us. Because therefore these elect spirits compress the proud apostate, who humble would not follow him, and by their administration it is disposed, that he should sometime be recalled to be utterly destroyed for the purpose of an open contest, let it be rightly said: "Who are ready to raise up Leviathan." But because the crafty enemy is not yet raised up to open wars, let it be insinuated how this night now latently obscures the months of some. It follows:

CHAPTER X.

VERSE 9.---Let the stars be darkened with the mist thereof.

17. Stars in the Scriptures are sometimes called saints, sometimes hypocrites. The light of hypocrites is obscured by open error.---In sacred Scripture by the name of stars sometimes the justice of the saints, which shines in the darkness of this life, is demonstrated, but sometimes the fiction of hypocrites, who show the good things which they do to men in order to receive praises. For if those living rightly were not stars, Paul would by no means say to his disciples: "In the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom you shine as lights in the world" (Philip. 2:15). Again, if among those who seem to act rightly, some did not seek the retribution of human favor for their action, John would by no means see stars fall from the heavens, saying: "The dragon sent his tail, and drew a third part of the stars" (Apoc. 12:4). For by the tail of the dragon a part of the stars is drawn, because by the extreme persuasion of Antichrist some who seem to shine shall be snatched away. For to draw stars to the earth, is to involve those who seem to adhere to the study of heavenly life in the iniquity of open error from earthly love. For there are some who shine before human eyes as if by great works; but because these very works do not proceed from a pure heart, being captured in hidden thoughts, they are obscured by the darkness of this night; who often lose even those works which they do not do with a pure heart. Because therefore night is permitted to prevail, when even among good works the intention of the heart is by no means purified, let it be rightly said: "Let the stars be darkened with the mist thereof"; that is, against those who before human eyes shine as if by good works, let the dark malice of the ancient enemy prevail; and let them lay down this light of praise which they had taken before human judgments. For they are obscured by the mist of night, when their life is confounded by open error; that doubtless such they may appear even without in action, as they do not fear to appear to the divine judgment within themselves. It follows:

CHAPTER XI.

IBID. Let it expect light, and not see it, nor the rising of the dawning day.

18. Christ with the good is one person, and the devil one with the reprobate. Those who act wickedly, or rightly not with a right heart, in vain expect eternal reward.---In the Gospel the Truth says: "I am the light of the world" (John 8:12). But as the same our Redeemer is one person with the congregation of the good; for He is the head of the body, and we the body of this head; so the ancient enemy is one person with the whole collection of the reprobate, because he himself as the head is eminent above them to iniquity, but they while they serve his persuasions, adhere like a body joined to the head. That therefore which is said of this night, that is, the ancient enemy, is worthy to be derived to his body, that is, to all the wicked. Because therefore the Redeemer of the human race is light, what is it that is said of this night: "Let it expect light, and not see it": unless that there are some who show that they hold the faith by words, which they destroy by works? Concerning whom it is said by Paul: "Who confess that they know God, but in their deeds they deny Him" (Tit. 1:16). These doubtless either the things which they do are wicked, or they follow right works not with a right heart. For they do not seek perpetual retributions for their works, but transitory favors; and yet because they hear themselves praised as if holy, they think themselves to be truly holy; and by as much as they think themselves irreproachable from the estimation of many, by so much more securely do they expect the day of strict judgment. Concerning whom it is well said by the prophet: "Woe to those that desire the day of the Lord" (Amos 5:18). To whom blessed Job brings forth the due sentence, with the zeal of one foretelling, not with the wish of one desiring, saying: "Let it expect light, and not see it." For that night, namely the dark enemy, expects light in his members, and sees it not, because either these who hold the faith without works, when for the sake of the same faith they trust that they can be saved in the last judgment, their hope shall be frustrated, because they have demolished by living that which they held by confessing, or those who for human praise exhibit themselves in good action, in vain expect the retribution of good works from the coming Judge; because while they do these for the ostentation of praise, they have already received their reward from the human mouth, the Truth attesting, who says: "Amen I say to you, they have received their reward" (Matth. 6:2, 5). Where also it is well added: "Nor the rising of the dawning day."

19. The wicked shall not see the brightness of the Church in the last judgment. For the Church is called the dawn, which is changed from the darkness of its sins to the light of justice. Whence also the Bridegroom wonders at her in the Song of Songs, saying: "Who is she that cometh forth as the rising dawn?" (Cant. 6:9). For the Church of the elect rises as a dawn, which deserts the darkness of its former wickedness and turns itself to the brightness of new light. Therefore, in that light which is shown at the coming of the strict Judge, the body of the damned enemy does not see the rising of the dawning day; because when the strict Judge comes for retribution, every wicked man, pressed down by the darkness of his own merits, is ignorant of with how great brightness the holy Church rises into the internal light of the heart. For then the mind of the elect is caught up on high, that it may be illustrated by the rays of the Divinity; and by that respect wherewith it is bedewed, it is raised above itself by the flashing of grace. Then the holy Church becomes a full dawn, when it utterly loses the darkness of its mortality and ignorance. In judgment, therefore, it is still dawn, but in the kingdom it is day; because although it already begins to see the light in judgment with the restoration of bodies, yet it consumes the fuller sight of it in the kingdom. The rising of the dawn, therefore, is the beginning of the brightening Church, which the reprobate cannot see, because they are dragged away from the sight of the strict Judge, pressed down to the darkness by the weight of their evils. Whence it is rightly said by the prophet: "Let the impious be taken away, lest he see the glory of God" (Isai. 26:10, sec. LXX). Hence it is that it is said of this dawn through the Psalmist: "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy face, from the disturbance of men" (Psal. 30:21). For every elect one in judgment is hidden by an internal sight in the face of the Divinity, while the blindness of the reprobate without is disturbed, being repelled by the strict animadversion of justice.

20. Hypocrites, beholding the works of the just but not their intention, see not their light. Which also we receive not inconveniently for the present, if we search more subtly into the hearts of simulators. For the arrogant and hypocrites behold the deeds of the good outwardly, and recognize them as praised by men in their deeds, and they wonder at their celebrated name, and see that they receive praises for things well done; but with what zeal they flee those same praises, they see not. They consider their open works; but that they work these with inward hope alone, they are ignorant. For those who are bright with the true light of justice are first changed from the darkness of internal intention, so that they may fully desert the obscurity of earthly appetite within, and perfectly convert their hearts to the desires of supernal light, lest while they appear bright to others, they be obscure to themselves. The arrogant, therefore, because they consider the deeds of the good and do not weigh their hearts, imitate that whence they may be able to be praised without, not that whence they may rise within to the light of justice: and as it were they know not how to see the rising of the dawning day, because they disdain to consider the intention of a religious mind.

21. Judea saw not the light of Christ coming and of the Church being born. The holy man also, full of the grace of the prophetic spirit, can behold the perfidy of Judea at the coming of the Redeemer, and prophesy the losses of its blindness through these words as from the quality of one wishing, so as to say: "Let it expect light, and not see it, nor the rising of the dawning day." For Judea expected the light, and saw it not; because it sustained that the Redeemer of the human race was indeed to come by prophesying, but knew Him not when He came; and those eyes of the mind which it opened to hope, it closed to the presence of the light. Which also saw not the rising of the dawning day: because it despised to venerate those weak beginnings of the holy Church; and while it believed that this was being weakened by the deaths of its own people, it was ignorant to what strong things it would arrive. But because speaking of the infidels, he has made known the members of the wicked head, he turns his words again to the head of the wicked themselves, saying:

CHAPTER XII.

Verse 10. "Because it shut not up the doors of the belly that bore me, nor took away evils from my eyes."

22. Paradise was the womb of the human race, whose doors the serpent opened. What the mother's womb is to each man, that supreme habitation of paradise was to the whole human race. For from it the offspring of the human race came forth as from a womb, and as if to the increments of the body, so to the increases of the progeny it emanated without. Our conception coalesced there, where the first man, the origin of men, dwelt. But the serpent opened the doors of this belly, because by crafty persuasion he dissolved the heavenly command in the heart of man. The serpent opened the doors of this belly, because he burst into the enclosures of the mind fortified by supernal admonitions. The holy man, therefore, in the punishment which he endures, brings back the eyes of the mind to the fault. Let him grieve for this, which the dark night, that is, the obscure suggestion of the ancient enemy, brought into human minds; let him grieve for this, that the human mind in its deception consented to the crafty suggestion, and let him say: "Because it shut not up the doors of the belly that bore me, nor took away evils from my eyes." Nor let it move that he complains of not having shut, whom he detests for having opened the gate of paradise. For he says "it shut not up," meaning it opened; and "it took not away evils," meaning it inflicted them. For as it were he would take them away, if he were to rest; and as it were he would shut them, if he were to cease from irruption. For he considers of whom he speaks, and weighs that it was to the evil spirit as if he had given us gains, if he had not brought losses. Thus we speak of robbers, that they give life to their captives, if they have not taken it away.

23. MORAL SENSE. It is pleasing to repeat these things from the beginning, and to retract them morally from that which we recognize in the use of present life. Blessed Job, considering, after the human race fell from the state of mind, with how great confidence it is raised up in prosperous things, or with how great perturbation it is broken by adverse things, recurs in mind to that state of immutability which it could have had in paradise, and declared by cursing how despicable he beheld the lapse of mortality varying through prosperity and adversity, saying:

CHAPTER XIII.

Verse 3. "Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, A man is conceived."

24. Day is prosperity, night tribulation. Day is the delight of sin, night the blindness of the mind. It is as it were a certain day when the prosperity of this world smiles. But this day ends in night, because often temporal prosperity leads to the darkness of tribulation. The prophet had despised this day of prosperity, when he said: "I have not desired the day of man, Thou knowest" (Jer. 17:16). The Lord announced that He would suffer this night of tribulation in the last time of His incarnation, when He said through the Psalmist as if from the past: "Even unto the night my reins have rebuked me" (Psal. 15:7). Moreover, by the day the delight of sin can be understood, and by the night the blindness of the mind, through which man suffers himself to be prostrated in the perpetration of fault. He wishes, therefore, the day to perish, that everything which is seen to flatter fault may be destroyed by the intervening vigor of justice. He wishes also the night to perish, that what the blinded mind perpetrates even by consent, it may extinguish by the animadversion of penitence.

25. Scripture calls man in three ways. Man is snatched from the delight of sin through voluntary darkness of the mind. But we must inquire why in the day man is said to be born, and in the night conceived? Sacred Scripture calls man in three ways, namely, sometimes by nature, sometimes by fault, sometimes by infirmity. For man is called by nature, as it is written: "Let us make man in our image and likeness" (Genes. 1:26). Man by fault, as it is written: "I have said, Ye are gods, and all children of the Most High; but ye shall die like men" (Psal. 81:6). As if He should openly say: Like delinquents ye shall die. Whence also Paul says: "Whereas there is among you envying and strife, are ye not carnal, and walk according to man?" (1 Cor. 3:3). As if he should say: Ye who lead discordant minds, do ye not yet sin from reprehensible humanity? Man is called by infirmity, as it is written: "Cursed is the man that putteth his trust in man" (Jerem. 17:5). As if he openly said, in infirmity. Man, therefore, is born in the day, but conceived in the night, because he is by no means snatched away by the delight of sin, unless he be first weakened through voluntary darkness of the mind. For first he becomes blind in mind, and afterwards he subjects himself to reprobate delight. Let it be said, therefore: "Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, A man is conceived": that is, let the delight perish which snatched man into fault, let the incautious infirmity of the mind perish, which blinded even to the darkness of wicked consent. For while man does not cautiously perceive the blandishments of delight, he falls even into the night of most wicked perpetration. We must, therefore, watch skillfully, so that when fault begins to flatter, the mind may recognize to how great destruction it is being drawn. Whence it is aptly added:

CHAPTER XIV.

Verse 4. "Let that day be turned into darkness."

26. The beginning of delight is to be chastised by the lamentations of penitence. For the day is turned into darkness when fault is seen in the very beginning of delight, to what end of destruction it snatches. We turn the day into darkness when, punishing ourselves strictly, we torment those same blandishments of wicked delight through the strict lamentations of penitence, when by weeping we pursue whatever we sin silently in the heart from the delight of sin. Because every faithful one is not ignorant that thoughts are to be subtly searched out in judgment, Paul attesting, who says: "Their thoughts between themselves accusing, or also defending one another" (Rom. 2:15); discussing himself inwardly, he vehemently examines himself before the judgment, that the strict Judge may come already more tranquilly, in that He sees his guilt, which He desires to discuss, already punished as a fault. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XV.

Ibid. "Let not God require it from above."

27. That he may not be punished by God in judgment. God requires those things which He discusses by judging; He does not require those which by forgiving He leaves already unpunished in His own judgment. Therefore this day, that is, this delight of sin, shall not be required by the Lord, if it is punished by spontaneous animadversion, Paul attesting, who says: "If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged of the Lord" (1 Cor. 11:31). For God to require our day, therefore, is to search out subtly in judgment everything which rejoices in fault against our mind; in which requisition He then more severely strikes him, whom He finds to have now more softly spared himself. But it well follows: "And let it not be illustrated by light." For the Lord appearing in judgment, illustrates by light everything which He then rebukes. For as it were under a certain obscurity is covered whatever is not then recalled to the memory of the Judge. For it is written: "But all things that are reproved are made manifest by the light" (Ephes. 5:13). As it were certain darknesses hide the sins of the penitent, of whom it is said by the Prophet: "Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered" (Psal. 31:1). Because, therefore, everything that is covered is hidden as it were in darkness; in the day of the last judgment that is not illustrated by light, which is not discussed by vengeance. For those acts of ours, which He shall not then have wished justly to punish, Divine mercy itself in some way hides from itself by knowing them. But in the light is shown whatever is then demonstrated in the sight of all. Let this day, therefore, be turned into darkness, so that we may strike everything wherein we fail through penitence. Let the Lord not require this day, and not illustrate it with light; so that we striking our own fault, He may not rebuke this by the animadversion of the last judgment.

28. The penitent alone finds a place where he may hide himself from God the Judge. But the Judge Himself is to come, who may penetrate all things, and touch all things. Who because He is everywhere, there is no place whither one may flee. But because He is appeased by the weepings of our correction, he alone finds a place of flight from Him, who after perpetrating fault now hides himself from Him in penitence. Whence also it is aptly added concerning this day of delight:

CHAPTER XVI.

Verse 5. "Let darkness and the shadow of death obscure it."

29. The hidden judgments of God are certain darknesses. Darkness indeed obscures the day, when the lamentations of penitence inflicted transfix the delight of the mind. By darkness also hidden judgments can be designated. For in the light we recognize what we see; but in darkness either we discern nothing at all, or we are blinded with uncertain sight. Hidden judgments, therefore, are as it were certain darknesses before our eyes, because they can by no means be searched out. Whence also it is written of God: "He made darkness His secret place" (Psal. 17:12). And because we do not deserve to be absolved, we acknowledge: but by Divine grace preventing us, we are liberated through His hidden judgments. Darkness, therefore, obscures the day, when His inscrutable judgments mercuryfully hide from that ray of strict animadversion the joy of our delight which is to be wept for. Where also it is aptly subjoined: "And the shadow of death."

30. The shadow of death is taken in three ways in the Scriptures. For in Sacred Scripture the shadow of death is sometimes taken for oblivion of the mind, sometimes for imitation of the devil, sometimes for death of the flesh. For the shadow of death is taken for oblivion of the mind; because, as we said above, as death makes that which it kills not to be in life, so also oblivion makes that which it intercepts not to be in memory. Whence also rightly, because John came to preach to the people of the Hebrews that God whom they had forgotten, it is said through Zacharias: "To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death" (Luke 1:79). For to sit in the shadow of death is to grow faint in oblivion from the notice of Divine love. The shadow of death is taken for imitation of the ancient enemy. For he, because he brought in death, is called death, John attesting, who says: "And his name was Death" (Apoc. 6:8). By the shadow of death, therefore, his imitation is designated; because as a shadow is drawn according to the quality of the body, so the actions of the wicked are expressed from the species of his imitation. Whence rightly Isaias, when he saw the Gentile peoples fail in imitation of the ancient enemy, and rise again to the rising of the true sun, relates as if from the past what he considers certainly to be future, saying: "To them that sat in darkness and the shadow of death, light is risen unto them" (Isai. 9:2). The shadow of death is also taken for death of the flesh; because as true death is that by which the soul is separated from God, so the shadow of death is that by which the flesh is separated from the soul. Whence rightly it is said by the voice of the martyrs through the Prophet: "Thou hast humbled us in the place of affliction, and the shadow of death has covered us" (Psal. 43:20). For those whom it is certain die not in spirit, but in the flesh alone, say that they are by no means covered by true death, but by the shadow of death.

31. Christ by His single death deleted the double death of men. What is it, therefore, that blessed Job asks for the shadow of death to obscure the day of wicked delight; except that for deleting sins before God's eyes, he requires the Mediator of God and men, who would take upon Himself only the death of the flesh for us, and delete the true death of delinquents through the shadow of His death? For He came to us who were held in death of the spirit and the flesh; He brought His one death to us, and loosed our two which He found. For if He Himself should take both, He would liberate us from neither. But He mercuryfully accepted one, and justly condemned both. He brought His single death to our double death, and dying He subdued our double death. Whence also not undeservedly He lay in the sepulcher for one day and two nights, because namely He joined the light of His single death to the darkness of our double death. He therefore who took only the death of the flesh for us, bore the shadow of death, and hid from God's eyes the fault which we committed. Let it be said therefore rightly: "Let darkness and the shadow of death obscure it." As if it were openly said: let Him come who, to snatch debtors from death of the flesh and spirit, may pay the death of the flesh not owing. But because the Lord relaxes no sin unpunished, for either we pursue this by weeping, or He by judging, it remains that the mind always watch skillfully for its emendation.

In what therefore each one considers himself to be mercuryfully succored, this it is necessary that confessing he wipe away. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XVII.

Ibid. "Let a mist occupy it."

32. The salutary mist of a penitent mind. Because in a mist the eye is confounded, that very confusion of our mind through penitence is called a mist. For as a cloudy mist obscures the day with a nebulous mass, so confusion clouds the mind with perturbed thoughts. Concerning which it is said by someone: "There is a shame that bringeth glory" (Ecclus. 4:21). For when by repenting we bring back to the mind things badly done, we are soon confounded by heavy grief, a crowd of thoughts makes an uproar in the soul, grief crushes, anxiety devastates, the mind is turned into misery, and is as it were obscured by a certain cloud of mist. For this mist of confusion had salutarily oppressed the mind of those to whom Paul said: "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed?" (Rom. 6:21). Therefore let a mist occupy this day of sin, that is, let the affliction of penitence perturb the blandishment of wickedness with worthy grief. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ibid. "Let it be involved in bitterness."

33. Salutary grief for wicked delight. For the day is involved in bitterness when, the mind returning to cognition, the torments of penitence follow the blandishments of sin. We involve the day in bitterness when we behold what punishments follow the joy of wicked delight, and surround this with sharp weepings. For because that which is involved is covered on every side, it is desired that the day be involved in bitterness, so that each one may behold from every part what evils threaten the uncorrected, and may wipe away the wantonness of his pleasure by the lamentations of sadness.

34. How much greater it ought to be for consent to fault. But if we have heard the day, which we called the delight of sin, assailed by so many prayers, that namely surrounding weepings may expiate whatever the soul through negligence commits while delighted, with how great animadversion of penitence is the night of this day to be struck, namely the very consent to fault? For as it is of lesser fault when the mind is carnally snatched into delight, but yet resists its delight through the spirit; so it is of heavier and full wickedness not only to be dragged into the enticement of sin by delight, but also to serve it by consent. By a hand of penitence so much the tighter, therefore, is the mind to be wiped from pollution, as it beholds itself more filthily defiled through consent. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XIX.

Verse 6. "As for that night, let a dark whirlwind seize upon it."

35. The force of compunction. For the excited spirit of grief is as it were a certain whirlwind of a tempest. For while each one understands the sin which he has done; while he subtly weighs the wickedness of his own depravity, he clouds the mind with grief, and as if the air of serene joy were shaken, he devastates all tranquility of heart with the whirlwind of penitence. For unless this whirlwind crushed the mind as it recognizes itself, the Prophet would by no means have said: "In a vehement spirit Thou shalt break the ships of Tarshish" (Psal. 47:8). Tarshish indeed is called the exploration of joy. But when the vehement spirit of penitence occupies the mind, it perturbs in it all exploration of reprehensible joy, so that it no longer pleases it to do anything but weep, it attends to nothing but what can terrify it. For it sets before its eyes on one side the strictness of justice, on the other the merit of fault: it beholds with what punishment it is worthy, if the piety of the sparing One be wanting, which is accustomed to rescue from eternal penalty through present lamentations. A vehement spirit, therefore, breaks the ships of Tarshish, when the strong force of compunction confounds our minds given to this world, as to a sea, with salutary terror. Let him say therefore: "As for that night, let a dark whirlwind seize upon it"; that is, let not the blandishments of secure quiet cherish the perpetration of fault, but let the piously raging bitterness of penitence burst in.

36. What it is to possess the night, and to be possessed by the night. But it is to be known, that when we leave sins unpunished, we are possessed by the night; but when we punish these with the animadversion of penitence, doubtless we possess the night which we have made. But then the sin of the heart is brought back under the possession of our right, if it is repressed when it begins. Whence also it is said by the Divine voice to Cain thinking wicked things: "Thy sin shall be at the doors, but the appetite thereof shall be under thee, and thou shalt have dominion over it" (Genes. 4:7). For sin is present at the doors, when it knocks in thoughts. Whose appetite is underneath, and man has dominion over it, if the wickedness of the heart being inspected, it is more quickly pressed down, and before it grows to hardness, it is subdued by a resisting mind. That the mind therefore may more quickly feel its transgression, and restrain the tyranny of fault under its own right by repenting, let it be rightly said: "As for that night, let a dark whirlwind seize upon it." As if it were openly said: Lest the captive mind serve fault, let it not leave fault free from penitence. And because what we pursue by weeping, we certainly hope this will by no means be objected to us by the coming Judge, it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XX.

Ibid. "Let it not be counted in the days of the year, nor numbered in the months."

37. God is to be asked that the evils we have done may not be objected to us in judgment. The year of our illumination is then perfected, when, the eternal Judge appearing to the holy Church, the life of its pilgrimage is completed. Then it receives the remuneration of its labor, when, this time of war being fulfilled, it returns to the fatherland. Whence it is well said by the Prophet: "Thou shalt bless the crown of the year of Thy goodness" (Psal. 64:12). For as it were the crown of the year is blessed, when the time of labor being finished, the remuneration of virtues is conferred. The days indeed of this year are each of the individual virtues; but the months are the multiple deeds of virtues. But behold when the mind is raised up through confidence, so that it hopes to be remunerated for its virtues when the Judge comes, there occur to its memory also the evils which it has done; and it greatly fears, lest the strict Judge who comes to remunerate virtues, also examining those things which have been illicitly done, should subtly weigh them; lest when He completes the year, He should also number the night. Let it say, therefore, of this night: "Let it not be counted in the days of the year, nor numbered in the months." As if it should pray to the strict Judge, saying: When, the time of the holy Church being completed, Thou manifestest Thyself for the last examination, so remunerate the gifts which Thou hast conferred, that Thou require not the evils which we have committed. For if that night is counted in the days of the year, everything which we have done is confounded from the estimation of our depravity. And the days of virtues no longer shine, if the dark confusion of our night obscures them in Thy sight.

38. Therefore let us leave nothing unpunished. But if we do not wish an inquisition to be moved then concerning our night, it is now to be greatly cared for, that we watch in the discussion of it; lest any fault whatever remain unpunished for us, lest the perverse mind dare to defend what it has done, and by defending, join wickedness to wickedness. Whence also it is well subjoined:

[Rec. XIX].

VERSE 7.---Let that night be solitary, and not worthy of praise.

39. Let us not exaggerate by excusing.---There are some who not only in no way bewail what they do, but even do not cease to praise and defend it. And surely while a fault is defended, it is doubled. Against which it is rightly said by a certain one: Thou hast sinned, add not again (Ecclus. 21:1). For he indeed adds sin to sin, who also defends his ill deeds; and he does not leave the night solitary, who also adds the patronage of defense to the darkness of his fault. Hence it is that the first man, being questioned concerning the night of his error, would not have that same night be solitary; because while he was called to penitence by the questioning, he added to it the supports of excuse, saying: The woman, whom Thou gavest to be my companion, gave me of the tree, and I did eat (Gen. 3:12); namely, secretly twisting the vice of his transgression upon the Author, as if he were to say: Thou didst provide the occasion of delinquency, who gavest the woman. Hence it is that the branch of this error is protracted in the human race from that root even until now, so that what is ill done is still even defended. Let him say therefore: Let that night be solitary, and not worthy of praise. As if he were openly to pray, saying: Let the fault which we have committed remain alone, lest while it is praised and defended, it bind us more manifoldly in the sight of our Judge. We ought not indeed to have sinned; but would that, not joining other things, we might at least leave alone those things which we have done.

40. He truly pursues his own fault, who treads underfoot the prosperity of the world.---But among these things it is to be known, that he truly pursues his own fault, who is now instigated to the love of the present world by no appetite for prosperity; who considers how fraudulent are the blandishments of this world, and weighs its favors as certain persecutions. Whence also it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XXII

[Rec. XX].

VERSE 8.---Let them curse it, who curse the day.

41. He punishes past faults who detects the snares of the seducer in the very suggestion.---

As if he were openly to say: Let those truly strike the darkness of this night by repenting, who now, despising, tread underfoot the light of the prosperity of the world. For if we take the day as the joy of delight, it is rightly said of this night: Let them curse it who curse the day; because surely those truly correct past evils through the animadversion of penitence, who are now carried away by no delight to deceptive goods. For as for those whom other harmful things still delight, it is false what is seen, because they bewail other things perpetrated. But if, as was said above, we take the crafty suggestion of the old enemy, they are understood to curse the night, who curse the day; because namely those truly punish past faults, who detect the snares of the malignant seducer in the very bland suggestion. But it is well subjoined:

[Vet. XXIV, Rec. XXI].

[VERSE 8.] Who are ready to raise up Leviathan.

42. They raise up the devil against themselves, who despise his tyranny.---For all who tread underfoot with the mind those things which are of the world, and desire with full intention those things which are of God, raise up Leviathan against themselves, because they inflame his malice by the instigation of their conduct. For those who are subject to his will are possessed by him as if by quiet right, and their proud king enjoys a certain security, while he dominates their hearts with unshaken power. But when the spirit of each one grows warm again toward the desire for his Creator, when he leaves the torpor of negligence, and kindles the cold of his former insensibility with the fire of holy love; when he remembers his innate liberty, and blushes as a servant to be held by the enemy, because that same enemy considers himself to be despised, because he sees the ways of God being apprehended, he grieves that the one taken should resist against him, and soon he is kindled with zeal, soon he is moved to contest, soon he excites himself to innumerable temptations against the rebelling mind, and instigates in every art of laceration, so that by hurling the darts of temptations he may pierce the heart, which but a short time ago he possessed by quiet right. He was, as it were, sleeping indeed, while he rested lulled in the depraved heart; but he is awakened in the provocation of the contest, when he has lost the right of perverted domination. Let those therefore curse this night, who are ready to raise up Leviathan: that is, let those strongly raise themselves against sin by the judgment of strictness, who in their temptations do not fear to excite the ancient adversary. For it is written: Son, coming to the service of God, stand in justice and fear, and prepare thy soul for temptation (Ecclus. 2:1). For whoever hastens to be girded in divine service, what else does he do than prepare himself for the contest against the ancient adversary, so that being free in the contest he may receive blows, who quiet under tyranny served in captivity? But in that very thing, that the mind is girded against the enemy, that it subdues some vices, and resists others, sometimes something of a fault, which however may not greatly harm, is permitted to remain.

43. On account of humility God allows that he who has subdued many and grave vices, should not expugn one very small one.---And often the mind, which overcomes many and strong adversities, does not expugn one in itself, and perhaps a very small one, although it watch with great intention. Which is surely done by divine dispensation, lest shining on every side with virtues, it be lifted up in elation; so that while it sees in itself some small thing reprehensible, and yet is not able to subdue this, it may by no means attribute the victory to itself, but to the Author in those things which it is able strongly to subdue. Whence also it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIV

[Rec. XXII].

VERSE 9.---Let the stars be darkened by the mist thereof.

44. Thus those who are stars, are obscured by some mist.---For the stars of this night are darkened by mist, when even those who already shine with great virtues, still sustain something remaining of the obscurity of fault, so that they also shine with great clarity of life, and yet still unwillingly drag the relics of the night. Which is done for this purpose, as has been said, that the mind advancing to the virtue of its justice, may be better strengthened by infirmity; and may shine more truly in good things from that source, whence small reprehensible things humbly obscure it even unwillingly. Whence also well with the Israelitish people, having received the land of promise, the Gentile people of the Canaanites, not being slain, but made tributary, is said to have been divided, as it is written: The Canaanite dwelt in the midst of Ephraim, being made tributary (Josh. 16:10). For what does the Canaanite, a Gentile people indeed, signify but vice? And often with great virtues we enter the land of promise, because we are strengthened by inward hope of eternity. [Vet. XXV.] But while among sublime deeds, we retain certain small vices, we as it were allow the Canaanite to live in our land. Who nevertheless is made tributary, because this very vice, which we cannot subdue, we humbly turn back to the use of our utility; so that from it the mind may feel mean things of itself even in the highest, in that it does not expugn even the small things which it desires by its own strength. Whence well again it is written: These are the nations which the Lord left, that He might instruct Israel in them (Judges 3:1). For to this end certain of our minimal vices are retained, that our intention may always exercise itself solicitous in the contest; and may not be proud of victory from that source, from which it sees enemies living in itself, by whom it still fears to be overcome. Israel therefore is instructed by the reserved nations, when in certain minimal vices the elation of our virtue is compressed, and it learns in the small things resisting it, that of itself it does not subdue the greater.

45. No one in this life, with however great holiness he may shine, is able to see God as He is.---This nevertheless which is said: Let the stars be darkened by the mist thereof; can also be understood otherwise. For that night, namely the consent to fault, which was propagated to us by the transgression of the first parent, struck the eye of our mind with so great obscurity, that in the exile of this life, oppressed by the darkness of its own blindness, with however great force it has intended the light of eternity, it is not able to penetrate it. For after the punishment we are born condemned sinners, and we come to this life with the merit of our death; and when we raise the edge of the mind to the ray of the supernal light, we are darkened by the very obscurity of our infirmity. And indeed many in this infirmity of the flesh have been strengthened with so great virtue, that they were able to shine to the world as stars. Many in the darkness of the present life, while they exhibit superior examples of themselves, shine above us in the manner of stars; but with however great coruscation of work they shine, with however great fire of compunction they kindle themselves; it is surely certain that while they are still burdened with corruptible flesh, they are by no means able to see the eternal light as it is. Let him say therefore: Let the stars be darkened by the mist thereof; that is, let even those in their contemplation still feel the darkness of the ancient night, concerning whom it is surely certain that they already expand the rays of their virtues to the human race in the mist of this life, because although they already leap up with the mind to the highest things, yet they are still burdened in the lowest things by the weight of the first fault. Whence it comes to pass that they provide examples of light without as stars, but yet within they do not ascend, being oppressed by the mist of the night, even to the certitude of fixed vision. For often the mind is so kindled, that although it be placed in the flesh, yet it is snatched away into God, all carnal thought being subjugated; and yet it does not behold God as He is, because namely, as has been said, the weight of the first damnation presses it in the corruptible flesh. Often it desires to be so absorbed as it is, that it may attain eternal life, if it could be done, without the intervention of bodily death. Whence Paul, when he ardently sought the internal light, but yet somehow feared the losses of exterior death, says: As long as we are in this tabernacle, we groan being burdened, because we would not be unclothed, but clothed upon, that that which is mortal may be swallowed up by life (2 Cor. 5:4). [Vet. XXVI.] Holy men therefore desire to see the true morning, and, if it be granted, they wish to attain even with the body that secret of inward light. But with however great ardor of intention they leap up, the ancient night still burdens them, and the just Judge presses down the eyes of this corruptible flesh, which the crafty enemy opened to concupiscence, from the contemplation of His internal splendor. Whence also it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XXV

[Rec. XXIII].

[VERSE 9.] Let it look for light, and not see it, nor the dawning of the rising aurora.

46. The rising of the aurora is the clarity of internal truth.---For with however great intention the still pilgrim mind bestirs itself to see the light as it is, it is not able, because the blindness of its own damnation hides this from it. (Now the rising of the aurora is the clarity of internal truth, which ought always to be new to us. Which the night undoubtedly does not see, because through fault our blind infirmity does not ascend to that light, which already irradiates the supernal citizens, while it is still placed in the corruptible flesh. For within this aurora rises, where to the spirits of the angels the clarity of the divinity is always shown new; and as it were the joy of light always arises, which is never finished.) But the rising of the aurora is that new birth of the resurrection, by which the holy Church, the flesh also being raised up, rises to contemplate the light of eternity. For if the resurrection of our flesh itself were not as it were a certain birth, the Truth would not have said of it: In the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the seat of His majesty (Mat. 19:28; Luke 22:69). He saw therefore that this was a rising, which He called a regeneration. But with however great virtue the elect now shine, they are not able to penetrate what that glory of the new birth will be, by which then with the flesh they ascend to contemplate the light of eternity. Whence also Paul says: That which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it ascended into the heart of man, what things God hath prepared for them that love Him (1 Cor. 2:9). Let him say therefore: Let it look for light, and not see it, nor the dawning of the rising aurora; because our infirmity, darkened by spontaneous vice, unless it first pay the debt of its own punishment through death, does not penetrate the clarity of the internal light. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVI

[Rec. XXIV].

VERSE 10.---Because it shut not up the doors of the womb that bore me, nor took away evils from mine eyes.

47. Our consent opened the doors of concupiscence, whence innumerable evils.---As also was said above, it shut not up, he says for it opened; and it took not away, for it brought upon. This night therefore, namely fault, opened the doors of the womb, because it unlocked the desires of concupiscence to man conceived to sin. For the doors of the womb are the desires of concupiscence, concerning which it is said by the Prophet: Enter into thy chambers, shut thy doors (Isai. 26:20). For we enter the chambers, when we enter the secrets of our mind. But we shut the doors, when we restrain illicit desires. These doors of carnal concupiscence therefore, while our consent opened them, drew us away to innumerable evils of corruption. Whence we groan even now under the weight of mortality, although we have come to this by our own will; because the justice of judgment also so requires, that what we did spontaneously, we should endure unwillingly. It follows:

VERSES 11, 12.---Why did I not die in the womb? Why did I not perish immediately as I came forth from the womb? Why was I received upon the knees? Why suckled at the breasts?

48. What is to be understood in the words of Job when he wishes himself an abortion.---Far be it from us to believe that blessed Job, endowed with so great knowledge of the spirit, praised by so great attestation of the internal Judge, wished that he had perished as an abortion. But because, as is also known by the remuneration, he has within a witness of his fortitude, his weights of locution are to be weighed within.

[Vet. XXVII. Rec. XXV.] 49. Sin is perfected in the heart in four modes or stages, and as many in deed.---For in four modes sin is perpetrated in the heart, in four it is consumed in deed. For in the heart it is perpetrated by suggestion, by delight, by consent, and by the audacity of defense. For suggestion is made by the adversary, delight by the flesh, consent by the spirit, the audacity of defense by elation. For the fault, which ought to have terrified the mind, extols it, and by casting it down elevates it, but by elevating it more heavily supplants it. Whence also the ancient enemy broke that rectitude of the first man with these four blows. For the serpent persuaded, Eve was delighted, Adam consented; who also being questioned, would not through audacity confess his fault. This indeed is done daily in the human race, which is not unknown to have been done in the first parent of our race. The serpent persuaded; because the hidden enemy secretly suggests evils to the hearts of men. Eve was delighted; because the carnal sense soon subjects itself to delight at the words of the serpent. But Adam, being placed over the woman, gave assent; because while the flesh is snatched away into delight, the spirit also being weakened is inclined from its own rectitude. And Adam being questioned would not confess his fault, because namely the spirit, by which in sinning it is disjoined from the truth, is in that degree more wickedly hardened in the audacity of its ruin. In the same four modes also sin is consumed in deed. For first the hidden fault is done; but afterwards it is even opened before the eyes of men without confusion of guilt; from then on it is also led into custom; at the last also it is nourished either by the seductions of false hope, or by the obstination of miserable despair.

50. Job deplores these four modes of sinning in the heart.---These modes of sin therefore, which are either done secretly in the heart, or perpetrated openly in deed, blessed Job considers, and deplores into how many stages of sins the human race has fallen, saying: Why did I not die in the womb? Why did I not perish immediately as I came forth from the womb? Why was I received upon the knees? Why suckled at the breasts? For the first womb of conception was the tongue of evil suggestion. But the sinner would have died in the womb, if man had recognized that he was about to die in the suggestion itself. Who nevertheless came forth from the womb; because after the suggesting tongue conceived him in sin, soon delight also snatched him away without. After the coming forth he was received upon the knees; because when he proceeded to the delight of the flesh, he surely consumed the fault through the consent of the spirit, all the senses being subjected as if the knees were placed under. But being received upon the knees, he was also suckled at the breasts. For in the consent of the fault, the senses of the spirit being addicted, many arguments of empty confidence followed, which nourished the soul born in sin with poisonous milk, and lest it should fear the harsh punishments of death, they cherished it with bland excuses. [Vet. XXVIII.] Whence also the first man after the fault stood forth more audacious, saying: The woman, whom Thou gavest to be my companion, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat (Gen. 3:12). Who indeed through fear had fled to hide himself; but yet being questioned it became known how much even in fearing he was swollen. For when present punishment is feared from sin, and the lost face of God is not loved; the fear is from swelling, not from humility. For he is proud, who does not leave sin, if it were permitted not to be punished.

51. He deplores and prays against the four modes by which men sin in deed.---But by these four modes, as has been said, fault, as it is done in the heart, is also perpetrated in deed. For he says: Why did I not die in the womb? For the womb of the sinner is the hidden fault of man, which secretly conceives the sinner, and still hides its guilt in darkness. Why did I not perish immediately as I came forth from the womb? One comes forth from the womb out of the uterus, when the sinner is not ashamed to commit also in the open those things which he has committed in secret. For as if from the womb of their hiding they had proceeded, of whom the Prophet said: And they have preached their sin as Sodom, and have not hidden it (Isai. 3:9). Why was I received upon the knees? Because surely the sinner, when he is no longer confounded by his iniquity, is also strengthened in that same iniquity by the supports of very bad custom. As if upon the knees the sinner is cherished that he may grow, while the fault is firmed by customs that it may flourish. Why suckled at the breasts? Because while the fault has begun to proceed into use, surely it feeds itself either with the false hope of divine mercy, or with the open misery of despair; so that it may by no means return to correction, in that it either inordinately simulates its Creator to be pious to it, or inordinately fears this which it has done. Let the blessed man therefore behold the falls of the human race, and let him intend into what precipices it has been merged into the pit of iniquity, saying: Why did I not die in the womb? that is, in that hidden perpetration of sin, why did I not wish to mortify myself from the life of the flesh? Why did I not perish immediately as I came forth from the womb? that is, after I went forth to open iniquity, why did I not even then know myself lost? For he would have perished in his own judgment, if he had known himself lost. Why was I received upon the knees? that is, even after the open fault, why did custom still receive me in it, so that it might render me stronger for wickednesses, and cherish me sustaining me in depraved uses? Why suckled at the breasts? that is, after I came into the custom of fault, why did I nourish myself for more atrocious wickedness either by the confidence of false hope, or by the milk of miserable despair? For when fault has come into use, the mind now resists it more weakly even if it desire it; because as many times as it is bound by depraved frequentation, it is as it were tied by so many chains to the mind. [Vet. XXIX.] Whence it comes to pass that the enervated mind, when it is not able to be loosed, inclines itself to certain solaces of false consolation; insofar as it promises itself so great mercy from the coming Judge, that He will not utterly kill even those whom He shall find to be rebuked. To which thing this worse happens, that the tongue of many like him consents to it, when many also exaggerate ill deeds with praises: whence it comes to pass that the fault grows incessantly, nourished by favors. But to cure the wound is neglected, which seems worthy of the reward of praise. Whence it is well said by Solomon: My son, if sinners suckle thee, do not acquiesce to them (Prov. 1:10). For sinners indeed suckle, when they either bring in evils to be perpetrated with blandishments, or extol those perpetrated with favors. Or are they not suckled, of whom it is said by the Psalmist: Since the sinner is praised in the desires of his soul: and he who does iniquitous things is blessed (Psalm 9:24)?

52. The fourth stage of sin is more difficult to correct.---It is also to be known, that those three modes of sinners are more easily corrected according to the order of their descent, but this fourth one is more difficult to emend. Whence also our Redeemer raises up the girl in the house, the young man outside the gate, but Lazarus in the sepulchre. For he still lies dead in the house, who is hidden in sin. He is already led out as if outside the gate, whose iniquity is opened even to the shamelessness of public perpetration. But he is pressed by the mound of burial, who in the perpetration of wickedness is also burdened being pressed by the use of custom. But these He mercifully recalls to life, because for the most part divine grace illustrates with the light of its respect not only those dead in hidden iniquities, but also in open ones, and those pressed by the mass of depraved custom. But the fourth dead man our Redeemer acknowledges at the report of the disciple, yet He does not raise him up, because it is very difficult that he whom after the use of bad custom even the tongues of flatterers receive, should be recalled from the death of his mind. Of whom it is also well said: Let the dead bury their dead (Luke 9:60). For the dead bury the dead, when sinners press down a sinner with favors. For what else is it to sin, but to fall; and to bury, but to hide? But those who follow the sinner with praises, hide the extinguished one under the mound of their words. But Lazarus also was dead, yet not buried by the dead. For faithful women had overwhelmed him, who also reported his death to the giver of life. Whence also he immediately returned to the light, because when the mind dies in sin, it is more quickly brought back to life, if solicitous thoughts live over it. But sometimes, as also was said above, false hope does not intercept the mind, but a worse despair pierces it, which while it utterly kills all hope of pardon, nourishes the soul more abundantly with the milk of error.

[Vet. XXX, Rec. XXVI]. 53. Job bewails that he sinned in the first man, and the miseries of this sin.---Let the holy man consider therefore, after the first fault how much worse evils man committed; after he lost paradise, even to how great precipices of this exile he descended, and let him say: Why did I not die in the womb? that is, when the suggestion of the serpent conceived me a sinner, then would that I had recognized what death would follow me, lest suggestion should snatch me away even to delight, and bind me more tightly to death. Why did I not perish immediately as I came forth from the womb? As if he were to say: Would that coming forth to exterior delight, I had recognized that I was being deprived of the interior light; and at least in that delight I might fall, lest through consent death should punish more sharply. Why was I received upon the knees? As if he were to say: Would that consent had by no means received me, my senses being subjected to depravity, lest that same consenting should snatch me away worse to audacity. Why suckled at the breasts? As if he were to say: Would that I had been unwilling to flatter myself at least after the evils perpetrated, lest I should bind myself more wickedly to the fault, the more softly I should cherish myself in it. By these voices of his reprehensions therefore he refutes that he sinned in the first parent. But if man by no means descended to the misery of this exile by sinning, let him say what quiet he could have enjoyed. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VERSE 13.---For now should I have been asleep and been silent, and should have rested in my sleep.

54. The first condition of man, from which he fell by sinning. The quiet silence of innocent man.---For this purpose man had been placed in paradise, that if he should bind himself to the obedience of his Creator by the bonds of charity, he might at some time pass to the heavenly fatherland of the angels without the death of the flesh. For so was he created immortal, that yet if he should sin, he could also die; and so was he created mortal, that if he should not sin, he could also not die; and by the merit of free will he might reach the beatitude of that region, in which he could neither sin nor die.

Where therefore after the time of redemption, the death of the flesh being interposed, the elect pass over, thither without doubt the first parents, if they had persisted in the state of their creation, could have been transferred even without the death of their bodies. Sleeping therefore he would be silent, and in his sleep man would rest, while being led to the rest of the eternal fatherland, he would find as it were a certain retreat from this clamor of human infirmity. For after sin he watches as if crying out, who bears repugnant the contention of his own flesh. This silence of rest man when created had, when he received the free choice of will against his enemy. To whom because he succumbed of his own accord, he soon found in himself what would make a noise against him, soon in the contest of infirmity he found tumults; and although he had been created by the author in the peace of silence, yet being voluntarily subjected to the enemy, he endured the clamors of the fight.

For the very suggestion of the flesh is as it were a certain clamor against the quiet of the mind, which before the transgression man did not feel; because doubtless he had not that which he might endure from infirmity. But after he voluntarily subjected himself to the enemy, bound by the chains of his own fault, he serves him in certain things even unwillingly, and suffers clamors in his mind, when the flesh struggles against the spirit. Or did he not hear clamors within, who endured the words of the depraved law against himself, saying: I see another law in my members fighting against the law of my mind, and leading me captive in the law of sin, which is in my members (Rom. 7:23)? Let the holy man contemplate therefore in how great peace of heart he would rest, if man had been unwilling to receive the words of the serpent, and let him say: For now should I have been asleep and been silent, and should have rested in my sleep, that is, I should retreat within the secret of the mind to the contemplation of the Creator, unless the fault of the first consent had betrayed me outside of myself to the tumults of temptations. But with what companions also he would enjoy the joys of this rest, let him add, saying:

CHAPTER XXIX.

VERSE 14.---With kings and consuls of the earth.

55. He would have been a companion of angelic joy. Who the angels are as kings and consuls.---From insensible things we learn what we should think of sensible and intelligible things. For the earth is fecundated by the air, and the air is disposed from the quality of the sky. So men are over the beasts, angels are over men, and archangels indeed over the angels. For that men are over the beasts, we both see by use, and are taught by the words of the Psalmist, who says: Thou hast subjected all things under his feet, all sheep and oxen, moreover also the beasts of the field (Psal. 8:8).

But that angels are over men, the angel testifies through the prophet, saying: The prince of the kingdom of the Persians resisted me (Dan. 10:13). But that angels are dispensed by the powers of the superior angels, Zechariah the prophet bears witness, who says: Behold the angel, who spoke in me, went forth; and another angel went forth to meet him, and said to him: Run, speak to this boy, saying: Jerusalem shall be inhabited without a wall (Zech. 2:3). For if in the very offices of the holy spirits the highest powers by no means disposed the least, in no way would the angel have known from the angel this which he should say to the man.

Since therefore the Creator of all things holds all things through Himself, and yet for the distinguishing of the order of the beautiful universe, He rules some things by the dispensing of others, not undeservedly do we receive the spirits of the angels as kings, who the more familiarly they serve the Author of all, the more do they rule the subjects. With kings therefore he would sleep, because doubtless man would already rest with the angels, if he had been unwilling to follow the tongue of the persuader. Who are well also called consuls, because they consult for the spiritual republic, while they join us to themselves as companions for the kingdom. They are well called consuls, because while we acknowledge the will of the Creator at their reporting, we find in them without doubt a counsel from this narrowness of our tribulation.

[Vet. 32.] 56. The saints before Christ were detained in hell, now they seek heaven without delay. The holy preachers are kings and consuls.--- But because blessed Job is filled with the holy spirit of eternity, and eternity has not "to have been" or "to be about to be," to which doubtless neither things past pass away, nor things which are to come, come, because it sees all things by the present, he can contemplate the future preachers of the Church in the presence of the spirit, who after they pass from their bodies, are by no means deferred by spaces of delays, like the ancient Fathers, from the perception of the heavenly fatherland. For as soon as they go out from the binding of the flesh, they rest in the heavenly seat, Paul attesting, who says: We know that if our earthly house of this habitation be dissolved, that we have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (2 Cor. 5:1).

But before our Redeemer by His death paid the penalty of the human race, the barriers of hell held even those who followed the ways of the heavenly fatherland, after their egress from the flesh: not that penalty should strike them as sinners, but that, because the intercession of the Mediator had not yet arrived, the guilt of the first fault might prohibit them, resting in more remote places, from the entrance of the kingdom. Whence according to the testimony of the same our Redeemer, the rich man who is tortured among those in hell, contemplates Lazarus resting in the bosom of Abraham (Luke 16:19). Who indeed if they were not still in the depths, he being placed in torments would not see them. Whence also the same our Redeemer, dying for the debt of our fault, penetrates the hells; that He might bring back His own, who had adhered to Him, to heavenly things.

But whither redeemed man now ascends, thither indeed if he had been unwilling to sin, he would reach even without redemption. Let the holy man consider therefore that if he had not sinned, he would ascend even not redeemed to that whither it is necessary for the holy preachers to arrive with great labor after redemption. And with whom he would already now rest, let him intimate, saying: With kings and consuls of the earth [Vet. 33]. For the kings are the holy preachers of the Church, who know both how to dispose rightly those committed to them, and how to rule their own bodies well; who while they temper the motions of desires in themselves, reign over the subjected thoughts by the law of virtue. Who are also well called consuls of the earth. For they are kings, because they preside over themselves; but consuls of the earth, because they provide a counsel of life to extinguished sinners. They are kings, because they know how to rule themselves; they are consuls of the earth, because they draw earthly minds to heavenly things through the counsel of their exhortation. Or was he not a consul of the earth, who said: But concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord, but I give a counsel (1 Cor. 7:25)? And again: She will be more blessed, if she so remain, according to my counsel (ibid., 40). But it is well added:

CHAPTER XXX.

THE SAME.---Who build solitudes for themselves.

57. They bear a tumultuous crowd within themselves. One given to luxury, angry, avaricious, proud, serving secular cares.---For all, who either desire unlawful things, or wish to be seen as something in this world, are compressed in the heart by dense tumults of thoughts; and while they excite crowds of desires within themselves, they trample the prostrate mind with the foot of a miserable frequentation. For one has subjected himself to the law of luxury, and fashions before the eyes of the mind schemes of base deeds: and when the effect of the work is not granted, this is more frequently done by the intention of the thought. Perfection of pleasure is sought, and the mind being enervatedly shaken, hence and thence both solicitous and blinded, searches into the occasion of the most wicked fulfillment. This mind therefore suffers as it were a certain people, which is devastated by the insolent tumult of thoughts.

Another has laid himself down under the dominion of anger; and what does he carry out in his heart, except strifes, even those which are absent? He often does not see those present, contradicts those absent, brings forth and receives insults within himself, and answers more harshly to those received; and when no one is present who might oppose him, he composes strifes in his heart with great clamors. He therefore sustains a crowd within, whom the vehement weight of inflamed thought presses.

Another has delivered himself to the law of avarice, and loathing his own things, covets those of others: He for the most part being unable to obtain the things coveted, turns the day indeed into idleness, but the night into thought: he is torpid from useful work, because he is fatigued by unlawful thought; he multiplies counsels, and expands the bosom of the mind more widely with inventions of thoughts; he is busy to reach the things coveted, and seeks certain most secret channels of causes to obtain these. Who as soon as he estimates that he has found something subtle in a cause, already exults that he has obtained what he had coveted: already he meditates what he should add even to the thing acquired, and treats how it ought to be cultivated in a better state. Because he already as it were possesses it, and as it were brings it to a better appearance, soon he considers the snares of the envious, and weighs what strife may be moved against him: he inquires what he should answer, and when he holds nothing, already the empty litigator labors in the defense of the thing which he desires. Although therefore he has received nothing of the coveted thing, he has yet in his heart already the fruit of concupiscence, the labor of strife. He is therefore pressed by a heavy people, who is devastated by the tumult of instigating avarice.

Another has subjected himself to the tyranny of pride; and while he raises the miserable heart against men, he subjects it to vice. He covets the fillets of high honors, seeks to be exalted by successes, and the whole of that which he desires to be, he depicts for himself within himself in his thoughts: already he as it were presides at the tribunal, already he sees the obediences of subjects obey him, already he is eminent above the rest, already he inflicts evils on others, or recompenses others because they have inflicted them. Already within himself, surrounded by wedges, he proceeds to the public, already he beholds by what obediences he may be supported; who yet thinking these things, creeps alone; already he tramples on some things, raises up others; already from those trampled on he satisfies his hatreds, already from those raised up he receives favors. He therefore who imprints so many phantasms on his heart, what else does he see than a waking dream? Because therefore he endures the causes of so many things which he fashions, doubtless he bears within him crowds born from desires.

Another already flees from unlawful things, but yet fears to be without the goods of the world: he desires to hold things granted, and is ashamed to be seen as less among men, and cares above all that he be not destitute in his house, nor despised in public. He inquires what may suffice him, what the necessity of subjects may ask; and that he may sufficiently fulfill the laws of patronage for his subjects, he seeks patrons whom he himself may serve; but while he is familiarly joined to these, he is doubtless implicated in their causes, to which he often consents in unlawful things, and commits evils which on account of himself he does not desire, on account of other things which he does not leave. For often while he trembles that his honor in this world should be diminished, he approves those things before greater persons, which he already damns by his own judgment. While he considers solicitously what he owes to patrons, what to subjects; what he may increase for himself, what he may benefit his affections, he is as it were pressed by so great a frequency of crowds, as he is torn by the importunity of cares.

[Vet. 34.] 58. They alone are with themselves who have subdued vices.---But on the contrary holy men, because they desire nothing of this world, are doubtless pressed by no tumults in the heart; for they cast out all inordinate motions of desires from the bed of the heart with the hand of holy consideration, and because they despise all transitory things, they do not suffer the insolences of thoughts arising from them. For they desire only the eternal fatherland; and because they love nothing of this world, they enjoy great tranquility of mind. Whence also it is rightly said: Who build solitudes for themselves. For to build solitudes is to expel the tumults of earthly desires from the secret of the heart, and with one intention to pant for the love of interior quiet of the eternal fatherland. Or had he not expelled all tumults of thoughts from himself, who said:

One thing have I asked of the Lord, this will I seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord (Psal. 26:4)? He had fled indeed from the frequency of earthly desires to a great solitude namely himself, where he might the more safely behold nothing extraneous, the more he loved nothing incompetent. He had sought from the tumult of temporal things a certain great retreat, a quiet mind, in which he might the more purely discern God, the more he should find Him alone with himself alone.

59. And they are truly consuls, because they do not cease to consult for others.---But well these, who construct solitudes for themselves, are also called consuls, because they so build the solitude of the mind in themselves, that yet in that in which they prevail, they by no means cease to consult for others through charity. This consul, therefore, whom we just now brought forward, let us weigh a little more subtly, how for the offering of examples of a more sublime life, he scatters the counters of virtues to the subjected wedges of peoples. Behold for the insinuating of the retribution of good for evil, he confesses of himself, saying: If I have repaid to those repaying me evil, let me fall deservedly empty from my enemies (Ps. 7:5). For the exciting of the love of the Creator he insinuates, saying: But for me it is good to adhere to God (Psal. 72:28). For the imprinting of the form of holy humility, he indicates the secrets of his heart, saying: Lord, my heart is not exalted, nor are my eyes lifted up (Psal. 130:1). For the imitating of the rectitude of zeal by his own example he excites us, saying: Did I not hate them, O God, who hated Thee, and did I not pine away over Thy enemies? I hated them with a perfect hatred, they were made enemies to me (Psal. 138:22). For the kindling in us of the desire of the eternal fatherland, he deplores the length of the present life, saying: Woe is me! that my sojourn is prolonged (Psal. 119:5). Truly he shone by the largess of the consulship, who by the example of his own conversation, scatters so many counters of virtues to us.

[Vet. 35.] 60. But let this consul tell whether he also builds a solitude for himself. For he says: Behold I have gone far off flying, and I remained in the solitude (Psal. 54:8). Flying he goes far off, because from the crowd of temporal desires he raises himself in the high contemplation of God. But he remains in solitude, because he perseveres in the remote intention of the mind. Concerning which solitude Jeremiah well says to the Lord: I sat alone from the face of Thy hand, because Thou hast filled me with threatening (Jer. 15:17).

For the face of the hand of God is that percussion of just judgment, by which He repelled proud man from paradise, and excluded him in this blindness of the present exile. But His threatening is the terror of the punishment still following. After the face of the hand therefore threats still terrify us, because by the experiment of judgment already both the punishment of the present exile has struck us, and if we do not cease to sin, it still adjudges to eternal punishments.

Let the holy man consider therefore, being cast forth hither, whence man has fallen, and this one sinning after those things, whither the justice of the judge still snatches; and let him cast out all crowds of temporal desires from himself, and hide himself in a great solitude of mind, saying: I sat alone from the face of Thy hand, because Thou hast filled me with threatening. As if he should say: While I consider what I already suffer by the experiment of judgment, trembling I seek a retreat of mind from the tumult of temporal desires, because I also still more sharply dread those eternal punishments which Thou threatenest. Well therefore it is said of kings and consuls: Who build solitudes for themselves. Because those who know both how to rule themselves well, and how to consult for others, since they cannot meanwhile be presented to that interior quiet, they imitate this within themselves through the study of a tranquil mind. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXI.

VERSE 15.---With princes, who possess gold, and fill their houses with silver.

61. The princes are the rectors of the Church, gold is wisdom, silver the word of God.---Whom else does he call princes, except the rectors of holy Church, whom divine dispensation substitutes without ceasing in the place of the preceding preachers? Of whom the Psalmist says to the same Church: Instead of thy fathers sons are born to thee: thou shalt constitute them princes over all the earth (Psal. 44:17). But what does he call gold, except wisdom? concerning which it is said through Solomon: A desirable treasure rests in the mouth of the wise (Prov. 21:20). Truly he saw wisdom as gold, which he called treasure. Which also is rightly signified by the appellation of gold; because as temporal things are bought with gold, so eternal goods with wisdom. If wisdom were not gold, in no way would it be said to the Church of Laodicea by the angel: I counsel thee to buy of me gold fired (Apoc. 3:18). For we buy gold, when being about to receive wisdom, we first offer obedience. To which contract indeed a certain wise man excites us, saying: Hast thou coveted wisdom? Keep the commandments, and the Lord will offer it to thee (Ecclus. 1:33).

But what are designated by houses, except consciences? Whence it is said to a certain healed one: Go into thy house (Matt. 9:6). As if he should hear openly: After the exterior miracle return to the conscience, and weigh what kind of one thou oughtest to exhibit thyself within to God. What also by silver, except the divine eloquences are figured? concerning which it is said by the Psalmist: The eloquences of the Lord are chaste eloquences, silver examined by fire (Psal. 11:7). The eloquence of the Lord is called silver examined by fire, because the word of God if it is fixed in the heart, is proved by tribulations.

[Vet. 36.] 62. If Adam had not sinned, only those would be born who are now to be saved.--- The holy man therefore full of the spirit of eternity, gathers together even what things are future; and those whom the centuries to come long after would beget, he comprehends with the bosom of the mind being relaxed; and with great admiration he considers with what elect he would rest without labor in eternity, if through the appetite of pride no one had sinned, and let him say: For now should I have been asleep and been silent, and should have rested in my sleep with kings and consuls of the earth who build solitudes for themselves, or with princes who possess gold, and fill their houses with silver.

For because if no rottenness of sin corrupted the first parent, he would by no means beget from himself sons of Gehenna; but these who now are to be saved through redemption, alone should be born elect from him, let him look upon the same elect, and let him intend how he could have rested with them. Let him see the holy apostles so ruling the Church received, that they do not cease to offer counsel to it by the word of preaching, and let him call them kings and consuls. Let him see after these rectors rise up in their place, who both by living wisely possess gold, and by preaching right things to others, shine with the silver of sacred locution, and let him remember those princes rich with gold and silver, their houses of consciences being filled.

But because sometimes it by no means suffices for the prophetic spirit that it should foresee future things, unless it also represents past and ancient things to the heart of the one prophesying, the holy man opens his eyes below and above, and not only beholds future things, but also brings back past things to memory. For he immediately joins:

CHAPTER XXXII.

VERSE 16.---Or as a hidden abortion I should not have subsisted: or as those who being conceived saw not the light.

63. The saints born before the time of redemption are as it were abortions. They were more than those whom Moses mentions.---An abortion, because it is born before the full time, being extinguished is immediately hidden. Whom else therefore does the holy man call abortions, with whom he considers that he could have rested, except all the elect, who from the very beginning of the world were born before the time of redemption, and yet took care to mortify themselves to this world? Who not having the tables of the written law, died as it were from the womb, because they feared their Author by the natural law; and since they believed the Mediator about to come, they studied above all, by mortifying pleasures, to keep even those precepts which they had not received in writing.

That time therefore, which near the beginning of the world brought forth our fathers dead to this age, was as it were the womb of an abortion. For there Abel, who is not read to have resisted his brother killing him (Gen. 4:8, 24). There Enoch, who exhibited himself such, that he should be transferred to walk with the Lord (Gen. 5:22, 24). There Noah, who by this, that he pleased the divine examination, was a survivor in a clean world (Gen. 7:23). There Abraham, who while he is a pilgrim in the age, was made a friend to God (Gen. 12:1). There Isaac, who with the eyes of the flesh being dimmed, did not see present things indeed by reason of age, but by the power of the prophetic spirit radiated with great light of seeing even in future ages (Gen. 27:1). There Jacob, who humbly fled the anger of his brother, and gently tamed it; who indeed was fecund with offspring, but yet more fecund with the abundance of the spirit, bound the same offspring under the bonds of his prophecy (Gen. 33:4).

But well this hidden abortion is said, because from the beginnings of the world, while we know some few by the writing of Moses, the greatest part of the human race is hidden from us. For it is not to be believed that only so many just ones existed even until the law was received, as many as Moses touched upon in a very brief description. Because therefore a multitude of good men brought forth from the beginning of the world, is for the most part withdrawn from our notice, it is called this hidden abortion. Which also is said not to have subsisted, because, a few being enumerated, their frequency is retained by no writing of memory among us.

[Vet. 37.] 64. They were conceived, but saw not the light, who were born after the law before Christ.---But it is rightly added: Or as those who being conceived saw not the light. For these, who after the law was received were born in this world, were conceived to their Author by the admonition of the same law. But yet being conceived they by no means saw the light, because they were unable to reach to the advent of the Lord's incarnation, although they faithfully believed it. For the incarnate Lord says: I am the light of the world (John 8:12). And the Light itself says: Many prophets and just men have desired to see the things which you see, and have not seen them (Matt. 13:17). They were conceived therefore and saw not the light, because being excited to the hope of the Mediator about to come by the open voices of the prophets, they could in no way discern His incarnation. In these therefore the interior conception brought forth the form of faith, but did not lead this as far as the open vision of the divine presence, because death intervening snatched these from the world before the manifest Truth illustrated the world.

[Vet. 38.] 65. Job seeing things past and future, pants for eternal things.---The holy man therefore full of the spirit of eternity, binds to memory all things passing away with the hand of the heart; and because every creature is narrow to the Creator, through the same spirit, which has nothing else in itself or beside itself, except always to be, he beholds this which will be, this which has passed; and he extends the eye of the mind below and above, and considering things to come as if past, he burns in his marrow for eternal being, saying: For now should I have been asleep and been silent. For now is of the present time. And what is it to seek a rest standing always in the present, except to pant for that joy of eternity, to which nothing comes, nothing passes? Which doubtless Truth, that He might in some way infuse His always-being into us, insinuates by Moses, saying: I am who I am. And thou shalt say to the children of Israel: He who is, has sent me to you (Exod. 3:14). But behold, because he beholds things passing, because he seeks a joy always present, because he remembers the light to come, because enumerating he weighs the orders of His elect: let him now insinuate to us more openly the rest of this light, and let him demonstrate by more manifest words what is done daily concerning the conversation of the wicked at that rest. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIII

[Old XXXIX, New XXX].

VERSE 17. --- There the wicked have ceased from tumult, and there the weary in strength have rested.

66. The wicked delivered from heavy labor by the benefit of the Incarnation. --- A little before we have already said that because the noise of desires possesses the hearts of sinners, a heavy tumult of instigating thoughts oppresses them. But in this light, which those conceived have not at all seen, the wicked are said to cease from their tumult, because doubtless the Gentile peoples have found for the rest of their life the advent of the Mediator, which the fathers placed under the law long waited for, Paul attesting, who says: That which Israel sought, he hath not obtained, but the election hath obtained it (Rom.

11:7). In this light, therefore, the wicked cease from tumult, while the minds of the perverse, the truth being known, flee the laborious desires of the world, and acquiesce in the tranquility of inward love. Does not the Light itself call to cessation, which says: Come to me all you that labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you: take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, because I am meek and humble of heart, and you shall find rest for your souls; for my yoke is sweet, and my burden is light (Matth. 11:28, 29, 30)? For what heavy thing does He impose upon the necks of our mind, who commands every desire that disturbs to be avoided? What heavy thing does He command His subjects, who admonishes that the laborious journeys of this world be declined? Moreover, Paul the apostle attesting, Christ died for the ungodly (Rom. 5:6). But for this reason the Light itself deigned to set for the ungodly, lest the ungodly should remain in the tumult of their darkness. Let the holy man, therefore, contemplate that the Light, through the mystery of His incarnation, delivers the ungodly from heavy labor, while He wipes away the desires of depravity from their hearts; let him contemplate that all who are converted already taste here, through the tranquility of the mind, the rest which they desire to perceive in eternity, and let him say: There the wicked have ceased from tumult, and there the weary in strength have rested.

134 67. The more we are strengthened in the love of God, the more we fail from our own virtue. Eternal light our place. --- For all who are strong in this world are strong as if by strength, not weary in strength. But those who are strengthened in the love of their Author, the more they grow strong in the desired fortitude of God, the more they fail from their own virtue; and the more robustly they seek eternal things, the more they are wearied by a healthy failing from temporal things. Hence the Psalmist, weary in the strength of his love, said: My soul hath failed in thy salvation (Psal. 119:81). For in advancing into the salvation of God he had failed, because desiring the light of eternity, now broken from confidence in the flesh, he panted. Hence again he says: My soul hath coveted and failed into the courts of the Lord (Psal. 84:3). Who doubtless when he said, Hath coveted, rightly added, And failed: because the coveting of divinity is much less if a proper failure does not soon also follow. For he who is kindled to desire the courts of eternity, it is surely worthy that he be wearied from this love of temporality, that he may grow as much cold from the study of the world as he rises more ardent into the love of God. Which if he perfectly seizes, he also fully leaves the world; and he dies to temporal things so much the more profoundly as he is animated more highly to the supernal life by the breath of eternity. Did she not find herself weary in her strength, who said: My soul melted when he spoke (Cant. 5:6)? Because doubtless the mind, while it is touched by the aspiration of hidden locution, weakened from the state of its own fortitude, is melted by that very desire by which it is absorbed; and thence it finds itself weary within itself, from where it beholds the fortitude which it ascends to be beyond itself. Hence the prophet, when he said that he had beheld a vision of God, adds: I languished and was sick for many days (Dan. 8:27), because when the mind is strained toward the virtue of God, the flesh is wearied from its own fortitude. [Old XL.] Hence Jacob, who held the angel, soon limped on one foot (Gen. 32:25), because he who with true love looks back at sublime things, no longer knows how to walk into this world with double desires. For he leans upon one foot, who is strengthened by the love of God alone; and it is necessary that the other wither, because, the virtue of the mind increasing, it must without doubt follow that the strength of the flesh grows torpid. Let blessed Job, therefore, look upon the deep hearts of the faithful, and let him weigh what bosom of inward rest they find, while in advancing into God they are wearied from their own powers, and let him say: There the weary in strength have rested. As if he should openly insinuate, saying: There the rest of light remunerates those whom here, inwardly refreshing, their progress fatigues. Nor ought it to move that naming the light, he by no means added: In this, but There. For that which he beholds to contain the elect, he discovers this to be as it were our place. Whence the Psalmist, when he looked upon the immutability of eternity, saying: But thou art the self-same, and thy years shall not fail (Psal. 102:27), denounces this to be the place of the elect, adding: The children of thy servants shall inhabit there (Ibid., 28). For God, who contains all things without position, remains a non-local place to us coming to Him. Which place while we reach, we see also even in this life how great the perturbation of our mind's tranquility was; because although the just are already quiet in comparison with the wicked, yet in the estimation of inward quiet they are by no means quiet. Whence also it is well added:

CHAPTER XXXIV.

VERSE 18. --- And formerly bound together without trouble.

68. The hard bonds with which even the just are bound here. --- For although no tumult of carnal desires possesses the just, yet the trouble of their corruption binds them, placed in this life, with hard bonds. For it is written: The corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly habitation casteth down the mind that museth upon many things (Wisd. 9:15). By this very fact, therefore, that they are still mortal, they are weighed down by the weight of their corruption, and bound, being tightened by trouble, because they do not yet rise up in that liberty of incorruptible life. For they tolerate one thing from the mind, another from the body, and they sweat daily in an internal contest against themselves. Are they not bound by a hard bond of trouble, whose mind doubtless is dissolved in ignorance without labor, and is not learned except with the study of labor? Forced it is raised, willingly it lies, from the lowest things it is scarcely lifted, and yet being elevated it straightway falls. laboriously overcoming itself, it beholds supernal things; but being beaten back, it flees the light which had irradiated it. Are they not bound by a hard bond of trouble, whom when the kindled spirit draws with full desire to the bosom of inward peace, the flesh disturbs with a fervent contest? Which although it no longer meets them as if in an army set up in opposition before their face, yet it still murmurs from the back of the mind as if captive: and although fearing, yet with a base noise it fouls the appearance of beautiful quiet in the heart. The elect, therefore, although they valiantly overcome all things, when they desire the security of inward peace, it is a heavy trouble to them still to have something to overcome. Who, besides these, sustain also those bonds which heavy necessity tightens from without. For to hunger, to thirst, to grow weary, are bonds of corruption: which indeed cannot be loosed, except when our mortality is changed into that glory of immortality. [Old XLI.] For we fill the body with refreshments, lest being attenuated it fail; we attenuate it with abstinence, lest being filled it oppress us. We enliven it with motions, lest it perish by the stillness of immobility; but we sooner stop this by placing it, lest it succumb by its own enlivening. We cover it with the aids of garments, lest cold destroy it, and we cast away the sought aids, lest heat burn it. Meeting so many diversities, therefore, what do we do, except serve corruptibility, so that at least the multiplicity of bestowed service may sustain the body, which the anxiety of weak mutability weighs down? Whence it is well said by Paul: For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected it in hope: Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the servitude of corruption, into the liberty of the glory of the children of God (Rom. 8:20). For the creature is subjected to vanity not willingly, because man, who willingly deserted the state of innate constancy, weighed down by the weight of just mortality, unwillingly serves the corruption of his mutability. But this creature is then snatched from the servitude of corruption, when it is raised up by rising incorrupt into the glory of the children of God. Here, therefore, the elect are bound by trouble, because they are still cast down by the penalty of their corruption. But when we are stripped of the corruptible flesh, we are relaxed as if from these bonds of trouble by which we are now tightened. For we already desire to be presented to God, but we are still hindered by the obligation of the mortal body. Rightly, therefore, are we said to be bound, because we do not yet have the free progress of our desire to God. Whence Paul well, desiring eternal things, but yet still carrying the burden of his corruption, being bound cries out: I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ (Phil. 1:23). For he would not seek to be dissolved, unless he doubtless saw himself bound. But these bonds, because he had seen that they were most certainly to be broken in the resurrection, the Prophet already rejoiced as if broken, when he said: Thou hast broken my bonds, I will sacrifice to thee the host of praise (Psal. 116:16).

Epilogue. --- Let the holy man, therefore, contemplate that internal light receives converted sinners, and let him say: There the wicked have ceased from tumult. Let him contemplate that holy men, fatigued by the exercise of desire, rest more deeply in that inward bosom, and let him say: And there the weary in strength have rested. Let him contemplate that, being absolved from all the bonds of their corruption at once, they reach those incorrupt joys of liberty, and let him say: And formerly bound together without trouble. Moreover, it is well said, Formerly bound; because while that always present gladness is discerned, all that will be and flows away already seems as if past. For while the end of things is attended to, all that passes is weighed as if already having been. But let him tell what all these whom inward rest will receive have done here in the meantime. It follows:

[New XXXI].

IBID. --- They have not heard the voice of the exactor.

69. The devil is the exactor. He is not heard when he who tempts is resisted. --- Who else ought to be understood by the name of exactor, except that importunate persuader, who once bestowed the coin of deception upon the human race, and from this daily does not desist from demanding the debt of death? Who in paradise lent to man the money of sin; but iniquity increasing, he daily demands this with usury. Concerning this exactor, Truth says in the Gospel: And the judge deliver thee to the exactor (Luke 12:58). The voice of this exactor, therefore, is the temptation of a wretched suggestion. Now we hear the voice of the exactor when we are beaten by his temptation; but we do not hear [so as to obey] if we resist him who beats. For he hears who feels the temptation; but he hears [so as to obey] who consents to the temptation. Let it be said, therefore, of the just: They have not heard the voice of the exactor, because although they hear his suggestion, because they are tempted, they do not hear [so as to obey], because they contemn consenting. [Old XLII.] But because what the mind greatly loves, it also more often repeats in speech, blessed Job, because with love he beholds the frequency of inward peace, again serves the description of it, saying:

CHAPTER XXXVI.

VERSE 19. --- The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master.

70. As merits are here, so in heaven will rewards be diverse. --- Because in this life there is a distinction of works for us, in that life there will doubtless be a distinction of dignities, so that what here one exceeds another in merit, there one may transcend another in retribution. Whence Truth says in the Gospel: In my Father's house there are many mansions (John 14:2). But in those same many mansions that very diversity of retributions will be in some way concordant; because so great a force in that peace associates us, that what each one has not received in himself, he may exult to have received in another. Whence also those not laboring equally in the vineyard (Matth. 20:10), all equally obtain a penny. And indeed in the Father's house there are many mansions, and yet disparate laborers receive the same penny; because there will be one beatitude of gladness for all, although there is not one sublimity of life for all. He had beheld the small and the great in this light, who said from the voice of the Head: Thy eyes did see my imperfect state, and in thy book all shall be written (Psal. 139:16). He had beheld the small and the great when he said: The Lord hath blessed all that fear him, the little with the great (Psal. 115:13).

71. Who is the servant of sin, who is free from it, and that here no one is free from it. --- Moreover, it is well added: And the servant free from his master. For it is written, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin (John 8:34); because doubtless whosoever subjects himself to an evil desire, submits the necks of his mind, formerly free, to the dominion of iniquity. But we contradict this master when we resist the iniquity which had taken us; when we violently resist habit, and treading under foot perverse desires, we claim for ourselves against this the right of our inborn liberty; when we strike at fault by repenting, and wash the stains of filth with tears. But for the most part, the mind already bewails that which it remembers to have done perversely; it now not only forsakes the things wickedly done, but even punishes them with most bitter lamentations; yet nevertheless, while it remembers those things which it has done, it is terrified with dread concerning the heavy judgment. It has now perfectly converted itself; but it does not yet perfectly raise itself into security, because while it weighs how great is the strictness of the last examination, it trembles anxious between hope and fear, because it knows not what the coming just Judge may repute concerning the things perpetrated, or what He may relax. For it remembers how wickedly it has committed things; but it knows not whether it has worthily bewailed the things committed; and it fears lest the enormity of the fault exceed the measure of penitence. And for the most part Truth already relaxes the fault, but the afflicted mind still trembles concerning pardon, while it is greatly anxious for itself. Here therefore the servant already flees his master, but he is not free, because man already forsakes his sin by correcting and repenting, but yet still he greatly fears the strict Judge concerning the retribution for it. There therefore the servant shall be free from his master, where there shall no longer be any doubt concerning the pardon of sin, where the memory of his fault no longer sentences the secure mind, where the soul does not tremble under guilt, but exults free in His indulgence.

72. Whether there is no memory of sin in heaven; and how this does not hinder beatitude.

--- But if man is touched by no memory of his sin there, whence does he congratulate himself on being rescued? Or how does he return thanks to the Bestower for the pardon he has received, if, by the intervening oblivion of past wickedness, he knows not himself to be a debtor to punishment? For that which the Psalmist says is not to be passed over neglectfully: The mercies of the Lord I will sing for ever (Psal. 89:1). For how does he sing the mercies of God for ever, if he knows not that he has been miserable? And if he remembers not past misery, whence does he return praises to the largess of mercy? But again it is to be asked, how the mind of the elect can be perfect in beatitude, if the memory of its guilt touches it amidst its joys? Or how does the glory of perfect light shine bright, which fault, brought back to the mind, overshadows? But it is to be known that as we now often remember sad things with joy, so then we remember past wickedness without injury to our beatitude. For for the most part in the time of health we bring back past pains to memory without pain; and by the more we recollect ourselves to have been sick, the more we love ourselves being healthy. There will therefore be even in that beatitude a memory of fault, not such as may pollute the mind, but such as may bind us more closely to joy; so that while the soul remembers its pain without pain, it may both more truly understand itself a debtor to the Physician, and love the health it has received all the more, by as much as it remembers from what trouble it has escaped. In that joy, therefore, we shall then so behold our evils without weariness, as now being placed in the light, we see darkness with the mind without any dimness of heart; because although that is obscure which we discern with the mind, this is of the judgment of light, not of the passion of blindness. And for ever therefore we return praise of mercy to our Bestower, and are in no wise burdened by the consciousness of misery; because while we look back upon our evils without any evil of the mind, both there will never be anything which may pollute the hearts of those praising from past iniquities, and there will always be that which may kindle these to the praise of the Deliverer. Because therefore the rest of internal light so raises the great in itself, that yet it does not leave even the little ones, let it be rightly said: The small and the great are there. And because the soul of the converted sinner is there so touched by the memory of its fault, that nevertheless it is depressed by no confusion of that same memory, it is congruously subjoined: And the servant free from his master.

BOOK FIVE.

It expounds the remaining part of the third chapter from verse 20, the whole of the fourth chapter, and the first two verses of the fifth.

CHAPTER FIRST.

1. That the saints here fear prosperity more than adversity. --- Although the divine judgments are very occult, as to why it often goes ill with the good in this life, and well with the bad, they are then more occult, when it also goes well with the good here, and ill with the bad. For when it goes ill with the good, and well with the bad, this is perhaps discovered, because even the good, if they have committed any faults, receive them here, that they may be more fully freed from eternal damnation; and the bad find here the good things which they do for this life, that they may be drawn forth to torments alone for the future. Whence also it is said to the rich man burning in hell: Son, remember that thou didst receive good things in thy lifetime, and likewise Lazarus evil things (Luke 16:25). But when it goes well with the good here, and ill with the bad, it becomes very uncertain whether the good receive good things for this reason, that being provoked they may grow to something better; or whether by a latent and just judgment they perceive here the remuneration of their works, that they may become empty of the rewards of the life following; and whether adversity strikes the bad for this reason, that it may defend them, by correcting them, from eternal punishments; or whether their punishment begins here, that when at length to be completed it may lead them to the last torments of Gehenna. Because therefore the human mind is pressed by the heavy dimness of its uncertainty amidst the divine judgments, holy men, when they behold the prosperity of this world to be at hand for them, are troubled with fearful suspicion. For they fear lest they receive the fruit of their labors here; they fear lest that which the divine justice beholds as a latent wound in them, it may repel them from inward things by heaping upon them outward gifts. But when they silently think that they do no good things except that they may please the Lord alone, nor do they exult in the very abundance of their prosperity, they indeed fear less the occult judgments against themselves concerning prosperous things, but nevertheless they bear the same prosperous things with difficulty, because they hinder them from their inward intention; and they tolerate the blandishments of the present life with molestation, because they are not ignorant that they are somehow delayed in their internal desire by these. For in this world honor occupies more than contempt, and the sublimity of prosperity burdens more than the adversity of necessity. For through the latter sometimes, when a man is pressed externally, he is more freely relaxed to concupiscent those things which are within. But through the former the mind, while it is compelled to obey many things, is restrained from the course of its desire. Whence it comes to pass that holy men fear the prosperity of this world more than its adversity. For they know that the mind, while it is pressed by bland occupation, is sometimes willingly derived to external things. They know that often a clandestine thought so deceives it, that it knows not how it is changed. Moreover, they weigh what are the eternal good things which they desire, and they know how nothing is all that which blandly smiles for a time; and their mind tolerates all the prosperity of this world the more with difficulty, by as much as it is wounded by the love of supernal felicity, and it is the more raised in the aspernality of present sweetness, by as much as it beholds this, because it blandly smiles on it furtively in the contempt of eternal glory. Whence blessed Job, when contemplating the supernal rest he said: The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master, immediately adds:

CHAPTER II

[New II].

VERSE 20. --- Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery?

2. That those contemplating eternal things flee earthly prosperity. --- In sacred Scripture prosperity is sometimes designated by the appellation of light, but the adversity of this world by the name of night. Whence also it is well said through the Psalmist: As is its darkness, so is its light (Psal. 139:12). For because holy men so tread under foot the prosperity of the world, despising it, as they also tolerate its adversity, treading it under foot, they say, subtruding both the adversity and prosperity of the world to themselves through great highness of mind: As is its darkness, so is its light. As if they should say more openly: As its sad things do not press the fortitude of our intention, so its bland things do not corrupt it. But because these things, as we have said, disturb the mind of the good even when they do not raise it, holy men, who know themselves to be miserable in the affliction of this exile, flee to shine bright in its prosperity. Whence it is well said now: Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery? For light is given to the miserable when they who, contemplating things sublime, acknowledge themselves to be miserable in this pilgrimage, receive the clarity of transitory prosperity. And when they greatly bewail because they return slowly to their country, they are compelled moreover to tolerate the burdens of honor. The love of eternal things wears them away, and glory from temporal things smiles on them. Who, while they think what those things are which hold them in the lowest, and what those things are which they do not see of the sublime; what those things are which support them on earth, and what they have lost of the celestial, are bitten by the grief of their prosperity; because although they see that they are in no wise fundamentally oppressed by it, they nevertheless weigh anxiously that their thought is divided in the love of the Lord and in the dispensation of it. Whence well when he says: Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery? he immediately adds:

[Old II, New III].

VERSE 20. --- And life to them that are in bitterness of soul.

3. That here both the elect and the reprobate are in bitterness; by what distinction. --- For all the elect are in bitterness of soul, because they either do not cease to punish by weeping those things which they have committed, or they affect themselves with heavy grief because, being cast far hither from the face of their Creator, they are not yet in the joys of their eternal country. Of whose heart it is well said through Solomon: The heart that knoweth the bitterness of its soul, in its joy a stranger shall not be mingled (Prov. 14:10). For the hearts of the reprobate are also in bitterness, because they are afflicted even by their own evil desires; but they know not that same bitterness, because, being blinded of their own accord, they cannot weigh that which they tolerate. But on the contrary, the heart of the good knows its bitterness, because it understands the affliction of exile in which, being cast out, it is lacerated; and it feels how tranquil are those things which it has lost, and how confused those in which it has fallen. But this embittered heart is at length brought back to its joy, and a stranger is not mingled in its joy; because he who now by the desires of the heart casts himself out from this grief, will remain excluded then from that inward solemnity of it.

4. Who is dead to the world, and to whom the world is dead. --- These therefore who are in bitterness of soul, desire fundamentally to die to the world; so that as they themselves seek nothing in the world, so now they may be held by no obligation from the world. And it often happens that a man now does not hold the world in his mind, but nevertheless the world binds the man with occupations: and he indeed is already dead to the world, but the world is not yet dead to him. For the world still beholds him as if living, while it contends to snatch him, intent on other things, into its acts. Whence well Paul, when he also perfectly despised the world, and saw himself made such as this world could in no wise concupiscent, says free, the bonds of this life being broken: The world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world (Gal. 6:14). For the world had been crucified to him, because he did not love it, being already dead to his heart. But he had also crucified himself to the world, because he studied to exhibit himself to it such that he could not be concupiscented by it as if dead. For if in one place there be a dead man and a living man; although the dead man does not see the living, yet the living sees the dead; but if both be dead, the one in no wise sees the other. So he who no longer loves the world, but nevertheless is loved by it, even if not willing, although he himself, as if dead, does not see the world, nevertheless the world, not yet dead, sees him. If indeed neither does he himself retain the world in love, nor again is he retained by the love of the world, they are mutually extinct to each other; because while the one does not seek the other, the dead, as if dead, does not attend. Because therefore Paul neither sought the glory of the world, nor was he himself sought by the glory of the world, he glories that both he was crucified to the world, and the world to him. Because many seek this, but nevertheless do not in every way rise to the summit of extinction, they rightly say, groaning: Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life to them that are in bitterness of soul? For life is given to the embittered when the glory of this world is bestowed on the sad and groaning. In which life, truly, they affect themselves with the punishment of a most powerful fear, because although they themselves do not hold the world, nevertheless they still fear themselves to be such as may be held by the world; because unless they lived to it in some small measure, it would doubtless not love them for its use. For the sea retains living bodies in itself; but dead ones it immediately expels outside itself. It follows:

[New IV].

VERSE 21. --- Who look for death, and it cometh not.

5. That those desiring to die to the world are often compelled to serve in human ministries. Not without gain to themselves and others. --- For they desire to mortify themselves fundamentally, and to be extinguished from all life of temporal glory; but by the occult judgments of God they are often compelled either to be set over in government, or to be occupied with enjoined honors, and amidst these they look for most full mortification without ceasing. But the expected death does not come, because their use lives to temporal glory even against their will, which nevertheless they tolerate for the fear of God. And within indeed they preserve the desire of piety, but without they fulfill the ministry of order; to the end that they may neither recede from perfection through intention, nor contradict the disposition of the Creator through pride. For it is done by the wonderful piety of the Divinity, when he who with a perfect heart tends to contemplation, is occupied with human ministries; that both his perfect mind may benefit many weaker ones, and whence he himself regards himself as imperfect, thence he may rise more perfect to the summit of humility. [Old III.] For sometimes holy men, from whence they tolerate the detriments of their desires, from thence they bring back greater gains, others being converted; because while it is not permitted to them to be vacant as they seek, it pleases them to snatch others with themselves, with whom they are mingled. It comes to pass therefore by a wonderful dispensation of piety that from whence they judge themselves to be more destroyed, from thence they rise more opulent to the construction of the celestial country.

6. That God often defers fulfilling pious desires, that they may grow. --- But sometimes for this reason they by no means arrive at conceived desires, that by that intervening slowness, they may be dilated in the same desires, the bosom of the mind being relaxed; and those things which perhaps being fulfilled could be extenuated, it is done by a great disposition that, being repelled, they may grow. For they so seek to be mortified, that they may now perfectly, if it were permitted, contemplate the face of their Creator. But their desire is deferred, that it may profit; and it is nourished by the bosom of its slowness, that it may grow. Whence the Bride, panting in the desire of her Bridegroom, well cries out: In my bed by night I sought him whom my soul loveth; I sought him, and I found him not (Cant. 3:1). The Bridegroom hides himself when he is sought, that not being found he may be sought more ardently; and the seeking Bride is deferred, lest she find, that being made more capable by her slowness, she may find more manifoldly in some time what she sought. Whence blessed Job, when he said: They look for death, and it cometh not, that he might subtly expound this very desire of those seeking, immediately adds:

CHAPTER [NEW V].

IBID. --- Like those digging for a treasure.

7. That they increase where the end is nearer. --- For all who seek a treasure by digging, when they have begun to dig deeper, they burn more instantly for the labor; because from whence they judge themselves to be even now approaching the hidden treasure, thence they labor more strenuously in the digging. Those therefore who fully desire their own mortification, seek it as those digging for a treasure; because by how much they become nearer to the end, by so much they exhibit themselves more ardent in the work. Therefore they do not fail by laboring, but rather they increase to the use of labor; because from whence they consider the rewards now nearer, thence they sweat more delectably in the work. Whence well Paul says to certain ones seeking the hidden treasure of the eternal country: Not deserting our collection, as is the custom of some, but consoling, and so much the more, as you shall see the day approaching (Heb. 10:25). For to console one laboring, is likewise to persist in labor, because the relief of labor is the vision of one laboring with him: just as when a companion is joined on a journey, the way indeed is not taken away, but nevertheless by the society of the companion the labor of the journey is lightened. While therefore Paul sought those consoling themselves in labors, he added saying: So much the more, as you shall see the day approaching. As if he should say: Let the labor increase from whence the rewards of labor themselves now approach, as if he clearly say: Do you seek a treasure? but you ought to dig more ardently from whence you have now arrived at the sought-for gold by digging.

8. Those dead to the world hide themselves within themselves from earthly things. --- Although this which is said: They look for death, and it cometh not, as those digging for a treasure, can be understood also in another way. For because we cannot perfectly die to the world, unless we be hidden from visible things within the invisible things of our mind, rightly those who desire their own mortification are compared to those digging for a treasure. For we die to the world through invisible wisdom, of which it is said by Solomon: If thou shalt seek her as money, and shalt dig her up as treasures (Prov. 2:4-5). For wisdom does not lie on the surface of things; because it lies hidden in invisible things. And then touching wisdom we apprehend our mortification, if having left visible things we be hidden in invisible things; if we so seek this, digging the heart, that the mind may cast out from itself, by the hand of holy discretion, everything that it thinks which is earthly, and may recognize the treasure of virtue, which was hiding itself. For it easily finds the treasure in itself, if it repels from itself that mass of earthly thought which had evilly pressed it down. But because he calls the sought death like a treasure, he rightly subjoins:

CHAPTER VI.

VERSE 22. --- And they rejoice vehemently, when they have found the sepulcher.

9. That divine contemplation is a sepulcher in which the mind dead to the world rests. --- For as a sepulcher is the place where the body is hidden, so divine contemplation is a certain sepulcher of the mind, where the soul is hidden. For we live as it were still to this world, when we wander abroad into it with the mind; but being dead we are hidden in the sepulcher, when being mortified outwardly, we are concealed in the secret of internal contemplation. Therefore holy men do not cease to mortify themselves with the sword of the sacred word from the importunity of temporal desires, from the tumult of useless cares, from the clamor of resounding perturbations, and they hide themselves within before the face of God in the bosom of the mind. Whence well it is said by the Psalmist: Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy face, from the disturbance of men (Ps. 31:20 [30:21 Vulg.]). Which although it be done perfectly hereafter, even now it is done in great part, when they are snatched into interior things by delight from the tumults of temporal desires; that their mind while it is wholly stretched into the love of God, may be lacerated by no useless perturbation. Hence it is that Paul had seen the disciples through contemplation dead and as it were hidden in a sepulcher, to whom he said: For you are dead, and your life is hidden with Christ in God (Col. 3:3). He therefore who seeks death, rejoices when he finds the sepulcher, because he who desires to mortify himself, greatly cheers up at the found rest of contemplation; that being extinguished to the world he may lie hid, and may hide himself within the bosom of intimate love from all perturbations of exterior things.

10. That the dead were formerly buried with riches. --- But if to this which is said that a treasure is dug up, the finding of a sepulcher also be subjoined, it is necessary that our intention should behold this, that the ancients used to bury the dead with riches. He therefore who seeks a treasure, rejoices when he shall have found a sepulcher, because seeking out wisdom, when we turn the pages of sacred Scripture, when we search out the examples of those going before, we take joy as it were from a sepulcher, because we find the riches of the mind among the dead: who because they are perfectly extinguished to this world, rest in secret with riches. By the sepulcher therefore he is made rich, who is raised up in the virtue of contemplation through the examples of the just. But when he seeking asks: Why is light given to the miserable? he intimates why he presumes to ask this very thing, saying:

[New VI].

VERSE 23. --- To a man whose way is hidden, and whom God hath surrounded with darkness.

11. That he who acts rightly is ignorant whether he shall persevere. --- For his way is hidden from a man, because although he considers in what quality of life he now is, yet he is ignorant to what end he tends. Although he now seeks heavenly things, although he asks for these with full desires, yet he knows not if he shall remain in the same desires. For leaving sins, we tend toward justice; and whence we came, we know; but whither we arrive, we are ignorant. What we were yesterday, we know; but what it may happen that we be tomorrow, we know not. Therefore his way is hidden from a man, because he so places the foot of work, that nevertheless he cannot foresee the exit of its consummation.

[Old IV.] 12. He is ignorant whether God does not condemn what he thinks is right. He is surrounded with darkness. --- But there is also another hiding of our way; because sometimes those very things which we believe ourselves to do rightly, we are ignorant whether they be right in the examination of the strict Judge. For often, as we also said far above, our work is a cause of condemnation, and it is thought to be a progress of virtue. Often from whence the Judge is believed to be placated, from thence the peaceful one is incited to be angry; Solomon attesting, who says: There is a way which seemeth right to a man; but its last ends lead to death (Prov. 14:12). Whence holy men, when they overcome evil things, dread even their own well-performed deeds, lest while they seek to do good things, they be deceived by the image of the action, lest a pestiferous rot of putrefaction lie hid under the appearance of good color. For they know that being still burdened with the weight of corruption, they know not how to judge good things subtly; and when they bring before their eyes the rule of the last examination, they fear sometimes these very things in themselves even which they approve. And indeed they desire internal things with all their mind, but yet trembling concerning the uncertainty of works, they are ignorant whither they step. Whence well after it was said: Why is light given to the miserable? it is added: To a man whose way is hidden. As if it were said: Why does he receive the success of this life, who knows not under what estimation of the Judge is the journey of his work? But well it is subjoined: And God hath surrounded him with darkness. For man is surrounded with darkness; because although he burns with celestial desire, he is ignorant what is disposed concerning himself within. And he greatly fears, lest anything should meet him in judgment, which now lies hid from him in the desire of good fervor. Man is surrounded with darkness, because he is pressed by the mist of his own ignorance. Or is he not surrounded with darkness, who for the most part remembers not past things, finds not future things, scarcely knows present things? A certain wise man had seen himself surrounded with darkness, when he said: The things that are in prospect, we find with labor; and the things that are in heaven, who shall search out? (Wisd. 9:16). With these darknesses the Prophet saw himself surrounded, when he could not penetrate the internal things of the intimate disposition, saying: He set darkness for His hiding place (Ps. 18:11 [17:12 Vulg.]). For our Author, because He took away the light of His vision from us cast down into this exile, hid Himself from our eyes as if in the hiding place of darkness.

13. Hence there is matter of weeping for the saints. --- Which darknesses of our blindness indeed when we studiously behold, we provoke the mind to lamentations. For it weeps for the blindness which it suffers without, if it humbly remembers that it is deprived of light in interior things. And when it regards the darknesses with which it is surrounded, it afflicts itself with an ardent desire for intimate splendor; and with every effort of intention it shakes itself, and being repulsed seeks the heavenly light, which being created it deserted. Whence it happens for the most part, that in those very pious weepings that clarity of internal joy breaks forth; and the mind, which before had lain blind in torpor, vegetated by sighs recovers for the inspection of intimate brightness. Whence well follows:

[New VII].

VERSE 24. --- Before I eat, I sigh.

14. That the joy of contemplation often follows tears. --- For to eat is for the soul to be fed by the contemplations of heavenly light. Therefore it sighs before it eats, because first it is affected by the groans of tribulation, and afterwards it is satiated by the refreshment of contemplation. For unless it sigh, it does not eat; because he who does not humble himself in this exile through the lamentations of celestial desires, does not taste the joys of the eternal country. For they are fasting from the food of truth, who rejoice in this poverty of pilgrimage. But he sighs who eats, because those whom the love of truth affects, the refreshment of contemplation also feeds. The Prophet sighing used to eat, when he said: My tears have been my bread (Ps. 42:3 [41:4 Vulg.]). For by its own mourning the soul is fed, when it is raised up to heavenly joys by weeping, and within indeed it tolerates the groans of its own pain; but from thence it perceives the food of refreshment, from whence the force of love flows forth through tears. Whence also blessed Job still follows the same force of tears, adding:

CHAPTER IX.

IBID. --- And as overflowing waters, so is my roaring.

15. What are the causes of mourning and trembling for the saints. --- Waters when they overflow, they come with impetus; and with multiple volumes increasing, they swell. But the elect while they set divine judgments before the eyes of their mind, while they tremble concerning the hidden sentence over themselves, while they trust that they can arrive at God, but nevertheless fear lest they should not arrive, while they recollect their past things, which they bewail, while they greatly fear those things which are still future to them, because they know them not; as it were certain volumes in the manner of waters are collected in them, which flow down into the roarings of sorrow as if into subject shores. Therefore the holy man saw, how great are the volumes of thoughts in the lamentations of penitence; and he called those very waves of sorrow overflowing waters, saying: And as overflowing waters, so is my roaring. [Old V.] But sometimes the just, as we also said a little above, placed even in good works tremble, and lest they should displease in them by some hidden error, they are vacant in continual lamentations. Whom when divine scourges suddenly seize, they suspect themselves to have offended the grace of their Author, because either hindered by infirmities, or pressed by bitternesses, they do not rise to bestow pious works on their neighbors. And the heart is turned into lamentation, because the body is retarded from the ministry of its devotion. And when they consider that they do not increase their reward, they dread also that their past works have displeased. Whence well blessed Job when he called his roaring as overflowing waters, immediately added:

CHAPTER X.

VERSE 25. --- For the fear which I feared hath come upon me, and that which I dreaded hath happened.

16. How much the judgments of God are to be feared. --- The just therefore bewail and fear, and torment themselves with great lamentations, because they dread to be deserted; and although they rejoice concerning their own correction, yet that very correction perturbs their trembling mind; lest the evil which they tolerate be not a pious percussion of discipline, but a just animad-version of vengeance. Which well the Psalmist considering says: Who hath known the power of Thy anger? (Ps. 90:11 [89:11 Vulg.]). For the power of divine anger cannot be comprehended by our mind, because its dispensation by obscure dispositions over us, often from whence it is estimated to desert, from thence it receives us; and from whence it is believed to receive us, from thence it relinquishes us; so that for the most part that becomes grace, which is called anger, and this sometimes is anger, which is thought to be grace. For scourges correct some, and lead some to the madness of impatience; and prosperity because it softens some, mitigates them from madness; others because it elevates them, it fundamentally eradicates from all hope of conversion. But vices drag all to the lowest things: but yet some return from these more easily, by how much they more deeply blush to have fallen in them. And virtues always raise up to heavenly things; but sometimes some while they conceive a tumor from virtue, fall by the very path of ascension. Because therefore the power of divine anger is by no means known, it is necessary that in all things it be feared without ceasing. It follows:

CHAPTER XI

[New VIII].

VERSE 26. --- Have I not dissembled? have I not been silent? have I not been quiet? and indignation is come upon me.

17. What things those set in power are wont to sin in thinking, speaking, and acting. --- Although placed in any place whatever, we sin in thinking, speaking, and acting, yet then the mind is snatched away more unbridledly through these three, when it is raised up by the prosperity of this world. For when it beholds itself preceding others in power, it feels thinking high things about itself elatedly. And when the authority of its voice is resisted by no one, the tongue is more licentiously unbridled through abrupt ways. And when it is permitted to do what it pleases, it justly estimates every thing to be permitted to itself which it pleases. But holy men when they are supported by the power of this world, reduce themselves under so much the greater discipline of mind, by how much they know that illicit things are as it were more licentiously suggested to them through the impatience of power. For they repress the heart from considering its own glory, they restrain the tongue from immoderate speech, they guard the work from the wandering of inquietude. [Old VI.] For often those who are in power, lose those things which they do rightly, because they think elatedly; and while they estimate themselves useful for all things, they condemn even the merit of bestowed utility to themselves. For that the deeds of anyone may be more worthy, it is necessary that they should always seem unworthy to him in his own eyes, lest that same good action should raise up the heart of the agent, and by raising it up should cast down the author more from elation, than it should help those very ones on whom it is perhaps bestowed. For hence it is that the king of Babylon, while with an elated mind he revolved silently within himself, saying: Is not this Babylon, which I have built? (Dan. 4:27), was immediately turned into an irrational animal. For he lost what he had been made, because he would not humbly dissemble what he did. And because he extolled himself above men by elation of thought, he lost that very sense of man which he had in common with men. But often those who are in power, break out everywhere to the contumelies of subjects; and this which they serve by being vigilant in government, they lose through the procacity of the tongue, weighing their words with smaller dread of the Judge, because he who shall have said to his brother without cause, Thou fool, makes himself liable to the fires of Gehenna (Matt. 5:22). Often those who are in power, while they know not how to restrain themselves from licit things, slide down to illicit and unquiet works. For he alone does not fall into illicit things, who sometimes cautiously restrains himself even from licit things. By which constriction indeed Paul insinuates himself to be well bound, saying: All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient (1 Cor. 6:12). And that he might show from that very binding in how great liberty of mind he was dilated, he immediately added: All things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any (Ibid.). For when the mind follows conceived desires, it is proved to serve the things by the love of which it is overcome. But Paul, to whom all things are lawful, reduces himself under the power of no one, because by restraining himself even from licit things, he transcends as despised those things which if delighted in would press him down.

18. How Job avoided these. --- Blessed Job therefore, that he may instruct us, lets it be known what kind of man he was in power, saying: Have I not dissembled? For power when it is possessed, is both to be thought of for utility, and to be dissembled on account of tumor; to the end that he who uses it, may both know himself to be able, so that he ought to benefit; and may not know himself to be able, so that he ought not to be extolled. But what kind of man he was in the mouth, let him add saying: Have I not been silent? What kind towards illicit works, let him yet subjoin: Have I not been quiet? But to be silent and to be quiet can be yet more subtly scrutinized. For to be silent is to restrain the mind from the voice of earthly desires. For the force of a great clamor is the tumult of the heart.

19. That those who are set over others ought to intermit temporal occupations, that they may be vacant for God. --- Those also who are well in power rest, when they postpone the noises of earthly actions by intermitting them for divine love; lest while they occupy the lowest things without ceasing, the heart should fundamentally fall from the highest. For they know that by no means is the mind raised up to heavenly things, if it is continually occupied in the lowest things by the tumults of cares. For what should she who is occupied obtain concerning God, who even being vacant labors to apprehend anything concerning Him? But well it is said by the Psalmist: Be vacant and see, that I am God (Ps. 46:10 [45:11 Vulg.]); because he who neglects to be vacant for God, hides the light of His vision from himself by his own judgment. Hence also it is said by Moses that the fishes which have not fins should not be eaten (Lev. 11:12-13). For the fishes which have fins are wont to give leaps above the waters. Only those therefore in the body of the elect pass as it were for food, who in that which they serve the lowest things, know at some time how to ascend to heavenly things by leaps of the mind, lest they should always lie hid in the depths of cares, and no breeze of the highest love should touch them as it were of free air. Those therefore who are occupied with temporal things, then well dispose exterior things, when they anxiously flee to interior things; when by no means they love the noises of perturbations without, but rest within at their own selves in the bosom of tranquility.

low these fugitive temporal things through the course of intention with continual steps of thoughts. But pious minds do not seek these even when they are wanting, and bear them heavily even when they are present, because they greatly fear to go out from themselves through the care of exterior things. Which is well signified by that life of the two brothers, concerning whom it is written: Esau became a man skilled in hunting, and a man of agriculture; but Jacob was a simple man dwelling in tabernacles (Gen. 25:27, according to LXX). Or as it is said in another translation, He dwelt at home. For what is figured by the hunting of Esau, but the life of those who, poured out in exterior pleasures, follow the flesh? Who is also described as being a farmer, because the lovers of this world so much the more cultivate exterior things, by how much they relinquish their interior things uncultivated. But Jacob, a simple man, is said to dwell in tabernacles or in a house, because doubtless all who flee to be scattered in exterior cares, consist simple in thought and in the habitation of their own conscience. For to dwell in tabernacles or in a house, is to restrain oneself within the secrets of the mind, and by no means to dissipate oneself outwardly through desires, lest while they gape after many things without, they should recede from themselves with alienated thoughts. Let therefore the proven man, and one exercised in prosperity, say: Have I not dissembled? have I not been silent? have I not been quiet? For as we said above, holy men, when transitory prosperity smiles upon them, dissemble the favor of the world as it were not knowing it, and with a strong step tread within upon this from whence they are raised up without. But they are silent, because they make no noise with any clamors of depraved action. For every iniquity has its voices before the secret judgments of God. Whence it is written: The cry of the Sodomites and Gomorrhaeans is multiplied (Gen. 18:20). But they are quiet, when not only are they snatched away by no turbulent appetite of temporal cupidity, but also they flee to be occupied more immoderately with the necessary cares of the present life.

21. Why the just assiduously suffer scourges. --- But doing these things, they still feel paternal scourges, that they may come so much the more perfect to the inheritance, as the discipline piously striking them daily purges them even from the smallest things. Therefore they do just things without ceasing, but assiduously suffer hard things, because often our justice itself, when brought to the examination of divine justice, is injustice, and that is filthy in the strictness of the Judge which shines in the estimation of the worker. Whence Paul when he said: I am conscious of nothing to myself, immediately added: But I am not in this justified (1 Cor. 4:4). Who soon insinuating the cause why he is not justified, says: But He that judgeth me is the Lord. As if he should say: Therefore in that I am conscious of nothing to myself I deny myself to be justified, because I know that I am examined more subtly by Him who judges me. [Old VIII.] Those things therefore are to be dissembled which favor without, those things are to be repressed which make noise within, those things are to be declined which involve as if necessary; and yet in all these the scourges of the strict examination are still to be feared, because even our perfection itself is not without fault, unless the severe Judge should mercifully weigh this in the subtle balance of examination.

[New IX.] 22. If the just suffer so many things, what punishments remain for the iniquitous? --- But well it is subjoined: And indignation is come upon me. For with great art of doctrine about to speak he preferred the stripes to well-done deeds; that from hence each one may consider what punishments should remain for those sinning afterwards, if so powerful scourges here chastise even the just. For hence it is that Peter says: It is time that judgment should begin from the house of God. And if the just man shall scarcely be saved, where shall the impious and the sinner appear? (1 Pet. 4:17-18). Hence Paul, when he had said many things in praise of the Thessalonians, immediately added: So that we ourselves also glory in you in the Churches of God for your patience and faith, in all your persecutions and tribulations, which you sustain for an example of the just judgment of God (2 Thess. 1:4). As if he should say: While you tolerate so many hard things, who act so rightly, what else do you give than examples of the just judgment of God? because from your punishment it is to be collected how He will strike those with whom He is angry, if He thus permits you to be afflicted, in whom He rejoices; or how He is about to strike those to whom He exhibits just judgment, if He thus torments even you, whom piously refuting He cherishes.

[Old IX, New X.] 23. That the intention of Job's friends was pious, but their speech incautious. What they ought to have done. --- Therefore the first speech of blessed Job being finished, in turn the friends, who had come to console, piously subject themselves to his increpation; and while they leap forward to words of contention, they lose that cause of piety for which they had come. Who indeed do this with no depraved intention; but although they exhibit affection to the struck one, yet they believed the struck one not except for iniquity; and while cautious speech by no means follows the good intention, the very proposition of piety is turned into the vice of transgression. For it ought to have been weighed to whom and when they spoke. For it was a just man to whom they had come, and surrounded by divine stripes. From his past life therefore they ought to have weighed those words of his which they were not able to understand; and from the present scourges not to refute him, but to fear concerning their own life; and to associate themselves with the flogged just man, not raising themselves as if by reasoning, but by weeping; that by no means their science should show itself through words, but the master sorrow should instruct the tongue of the consoling ones to speak rightly. Who even if they perhaps felt some different things, it was indeed worthy that they should say these things humbly, lest they should heap up wounds on the struck one through immoderate words.

24. That the sayings or deeds of the better often displease the worse. --- For often, because they are not able to be understood, either the deeds or the sayings of the better displease the worse: but they are not to be rashly reprehended by them for this reason, that they can by no means be truly apprehended. Often something is done dispensatively by the greater, which is thought an error by the smaller. Often many things are said by the strong, which the weak therefore judge, because they are ignorant. Which that Ark of the Testament, inclined by the kicking oxen, well signified, which because the Levite, believing it about to fall, wished to raise up, he soon received the sentence of death (2 Sam. 6:7). [Old X.] For what is the mind of the just, but the Ark of the Testament? Which being carried by the kicking oxen is inclined; because sometimes even he who well presides, while he is shaken by the confusion of the subject peoples, is moved to the condescension of dispensation from charity alone. But in this, which is done dispensatively, that very inclination of fortitude is thought a fall by the unskilled. Whence also some subjects send the hand of reprehension against this, but they immediately fail from life by that very rashness of theirs. The Levite therefore as if helping, stretched out his hand, but delinquet he lost his life, because while all the weak correct the deeds of the strong, they themselves are reprobated from the lot of the living. Sometimes also holy men say certain things condescending to the smallest, but certain things contemplating the highest they bring forth; and while they know not the force either of condescension or of altitude, fools boldly reprehend these things. And what is it to wish to correct the just man concerning his own condescension, but to raise up the inclined Ark with a proud hand of reprehension? What is it to reprehend the just man concerning an unknown locution, but to think the motion of his fortitude a slip of error? But he loses his life, who tumidly raises up the Ark of God, because by no means would anyone presume to correct the right things of the saints, unless he had first felt better things concerning himself. Whence also the same Levite is rightly called Uzzah, which indeed is interpreted the robust one of the Lord; because all presumptuous persons unless they believed themselves robust in the Lord with an audacious mind, by no means would they judge the deeds or sayings of the better as if weak. Therefore the friends of Job, while they leap forward against him as if in the defense of God, proudly exceed the rule of the divine precept.

25. If anything in these displeases, it is not to be kept silent, but to be brought forth with great humility. --- But when certain deeds of the better displease the worse, by no means is this which moves the mind to be kept silent, but to be brought forth with great humility; to the end that the intention of one piously feeling may truly preserve the form of rectitude in this, that it walks through the way of humility. And therefore those things which we feel are to be said freely, and those things which we say are to be brought forth very humbly, lest we should not make right even those things which we intend rightly, by bringing these forth elatedly. Paul had said many things humbly to his auditors; but concerning that very humble exhortation he was busy to placate them yet more humbly, saying: I beseech you, brethren, that you suffer the word of consolation; for I have written to you in very few words (Heb. 13:22). To the Ephesians also bidding farewell at Miletus, to the afflicted and groaning ones, he recalls his own humility to memory, saying: Watch, keeping in memory that for three years night and day I ceased not with tears warning every one of you (Acts 20:31). To the same again through the Epistle he says: I beseech you, brethren, I a prisoner in the Lord, that you walk worthily of the vocation in which you are called (Eph. 4:1). From hence therefore let a disciple collect, if ever he feels anything rightly, with how great humility he ought to speak to a master; if the master of the Gentiles himself in those things which he preaches with authority, so submissively asks the disciples. From hence let each one collect, to those from whom he has perceived the examples of living well, how humbly he should say this which he understands well; if Paul subjected himself with a humble voice to those whom he himself raised up to life.

26. He who knows not how to speak humbly is ignorant of the rule of consolation. Eliphaz, however, who is the first of the friends to speak, although he comes with piety to console, yet by abandoning humility of speech, he is ignorant of the rule of consolation. While he neglects the guard of speaking, he even goes so far as to offer insults to the afflicted man, saying: The tiger has perished because it had no prey. The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the lioness, and the teeth of the young lions are scattered (Job 4:11). Namely, marking the blessed Job by the name of a tiger, as if for the vice of variety; by the roaring of the lion, the terror of the same man; by the voice of the lioness, the loquacity of his wife; and by the scattered teeth of the young lions, the destroyed voracity of his sons. Wherefore also the divine sentence rightly reproves the sense of the friends, which raised itself up in swollen correction, saying: You have not spoken before me what is right, as my servant Job has (Job 42:7).

27. For what reason God reproves the sentences of Job's friends, and Paul commends them. But I see it must be asked why Paul uses their sentences with such great authority, if these sentences of theirs are made void by the Lord's reproof? For they are the words of Eliphaz which he brought to the Corinthians, saying, as it is written: I will catch the wise in their own craftiness (1 Cor. 3:19; Job 5:13). How then do we reject as perverse things which Paul asserts from authority? Or how shall we think those things right by the attestation of Paul, which the Lord himself defined as not right? But we know both these things to be not different sooner than that they are not so, if we more subtly weigh the words of the same Divine sentence; which surely, when it said: You have not spoken before me what is right, immediately added: As my servant Job has. It is clear, therefore, that some things in their sayings are right, but they are surpassed by comparison with what is better. For among other things which they say irrationally, they bring forth many strong sentences to the blessed Job, but compared to stronger words they lose the force of their strength. Moreover, many things which they say are wonderful, unless they were said against the adversity of the holy man. In themselves, therefore, they are great, but because they seek to transfix a just man, they lose the weight of that same greatness; because a javelin is thrown in vain, however strongly, to strike hard rocks; for it leaps back blunted all the further, the more strongly it came twisted. Therefore, although the sayings of Job's friends are very strong in certain things, yet when they strike the strong life of the holy man, they blunt all the edge of their sharpness. Because, therefore, they are great even in themselves, but ought by no means to have been assumed against the blessed Job; Paul both weighs these things from their virtue and brings them forth in authority; and the Judge, because they were brought forth incautiously, reproves them from the quality of the person.

28. Those things, as they have some things right and others perverse, are congruent with heretics. But because we said above that these same friends of blessed Job hold the likeness of heretics, let us now track down how their words are congruent with heretics. For they feel some things that are very right, yet among these they slide down to perverse things. For heretics have this as their own property, to mix good things with evil, so that they may easily mock the sense of the hearer. For if they always spoke perverse things, being more quickly recognized in their perversity, they would persuade of what they wished very little. Again, if they always felt right things, they surely would not have been heretics. But while by the art of deceiving they serve both, they both infect good things from evil, and hide evil things among good, so that they may be received; as he who offers a cup of poison touches the mouth of the cup with the sweetness of honey; and while that which is sweet is tasted at the first touch, even that which is deadly is swallowed without doubt. And so heretics mix right things with perverse, so that by showing good things, they may attract hearers to themselves; and by exhibiting evil things, they may corrupt them with a hidden pestilence. Sometimes, however, corrected by the preaching and exhortation of the holy Church, they are saved from this diversity of their sense. Wherefore also the friends of Job offer the sacrifice of their reconciliation by the hands of the same holy man, and being even condemned are recalled to the grace of the supreme Judge. Whom that cleansing of the ten lepers in the Gospel well designates (Luke 17:15).

For in leprosy, both a part of the skin is led into brightness, and a part is retained in a healthy color. Lepers, therefore, express heretics, because while they mix perverse things with right, they sprinkle the healthy color with spots. Wherefore also they rightly cry out that they may be saved, Jesus, Master. For because they signify that they have erred in his words, they humbly call him Master for the sake of being saved; and when they return to the knowledge of the Master, they soon run back to the form of health. But because in the sayings of the friends we have led the preface of the exposition a little further, let us now subtly weigh their words themselves. It follows:

CHAPTER XII

[Old XII, New XI].

JOB 4:1, 2.---But Eliphaz the Temanite responding, said: If we begin to speak to thee, perhaps thou wilt take it ill.

29. The words of heretics are smooth at first, then harsh.---What is expressed by these interpretations of names has already been said above. Because, therefore, we hasten to things undiscussed, we avoid repeating what has been brought forth. This, therefore, is to be skillfully looked into, that those who hold the likeness of heretics begin to speak softly, saying: If we begin to speak to thee, perhaps thou wilt take it ill. For heretics fear to exasperate their hearers in the beginning of their speech, lest they be heard vigilantly, and they very much avoid their sadness, that they may catch them in negligence. And almost always the things they propose are smooth; but those which they bring in by pursuing them are harsh. Whence also now the friends of Job begin from the reverence of a meek speech, but they break out even to the arrows of a most sharp invective; because also the roots of thorns are soft, but yet from that very softness of theirs they bring forth that with which they prick. It follows:

CHAPTER XIII.

VERSE 2.---But who can withhold the word conceived?

30. Some conceive and bring forth perverse words, others restrain them when conceived, others do not even conceive them.---There are three kinds of men, who differ by qualities drawn gradually from themselves. For there are some who both conceive perverse things for speaking, and are restrained from their speech by no gravity of silence. And there are others who, when they conceive perverse things, restrain themselves by a great vigor of silence. And there are some who, strengthened by the use of virtues, are carried forward even to that height, that they do not even conceive in their heart perverse things for speaking, which they would have to check by being silent. Therefore it is shown of what order Eliphaz is, who testifies that he cannot withhold the word conceived. In which matter this also became known, that he knew he would offend by speaking. For he would not wish to withhold words which he cannot, unless he foreknew that through these he would inflict wounds. For good men restrain the precipitation of the word by the bridle of counsel, and cautiously consider lest by relaxing the wantonness of the tongue they transfix the conscience of the hearers by an incautious speech. Whence it is well said through Solomon: He who lets out water is the head of quarrels (Prov. 17:14). For water is let out when the flow of the tongue is unbridled. But the sender forth of water is made the head of quarrels, because through the incontinence of the tongue, the origin of discord is offered. The perverse, therefore, as they are light in sense, so are they precipitate in speech, and they neglect to withhold by thoroughly treating what they speak. But what a light conscience conceives, a lighter tongue immediately brings forth. Whence now Eliphaz collects from his own experience what he feels desperately concerning all, saying: But who can withhold the word conceived? It follows:

CHAPTER XIV

[New XII].

VERSES 3, 4.---Behold, thou hast taught many, and thou hast strengthened the weary hands; thy words have confirmed the wavering, and thou hast comforted the trembling knees.

31. How great Job was, whose praises even he who tries to bring a charge cannot keep silent.--- If the text of the history itself is looked at, it is of great utility to the reader, that from the wrangling friends in blessed Job, instead of the laceration of vices, the proclamations of virtues are brought forth. For there is never so robust a testimony of life, as when he speaks things to be praised who tries to bring a charge. Let us weigh, however, of what height that man was, who, teaching the unlearned, strengthening the weary, and confirming the wavering, among the cares of the house, among the custody of manifold things, among the affection for his children, among the studies of so many labors, spent himself in instructing others. And indeed being occupied he practiced those things, but yet he served as a free man in the mastership of doctrine. He disposed of temporal things by ruling them; he announced eternal things by preaching them; he both showed the rectitude of life by acting to those seeing it, and instilled it by speaking to those hearing it. But whether heretics, or any perverse persons whatsoever, when they relate the good things of the just, they bend these into an argument for a charge. For from thence Eliphaz collects an occasion of objurgation against blessed Job, from whence he narrated things to be praised. For it follows:

CHAPTER XV.

VERSE 5.---But now the plague is come upon thee, and thou hast fainted; it hath touched thee, and thou art troubled.

32. The perverse attack the life of the good in two ways.---All perverse people attack the life of the good in two ways, because they either assert that they say perverse things, or that they do not keep the right things which they say. Whence also the blessed Job is reproved below by his friends concerning his speech; but now he is lacerated for having said right things, but not having kept them. Therefore, by the iniquitous, now the speech, now the action of the good is reproved, so that either the tongue, being reprehended, may be silent, or the life, being adjudged by the testimony of its own tongue, may succumb in crime. And it is to be noted that they first bring in praises of the tongue, and afterwards complain of the infirmity of life. For the iniquitous, lest they should publicly appear perverse, sometimes speak good things of the just, which they know are already known to others also. But as we have said before, they immediately draw these very things to the accumulation of guilt, and they show that they are to be believed in contrary things, from the fact that they also spoke prosperous things; and they insinuate evil things as if more truly, by as much as they also praised good things as if devotedly. They twist, therefore, the voices of favor into the use of a charge, while they afterwards more heavily wound the life of the just from thence, whence a little before they were defending it in appearance. But often they wonder at their good things which they before held in contempt, as if they were afterwards lost. Whence also Eliphaz, because he asserts the virtues of the holy man to be lost, adds them by enumerating them, saying:

[New XIII].

VERSE 6.---Where is thy fear, thy fortitude, and thy patience, and the perfection of thy ways?

33. Four degrees of virtues.---All these things, indeed, he substitutes for that sentence which he sent before, saying: But now the plague is come upon thee, and thou hast fainted; it hath touched thee, and thou art troubled. Therefore he asserts that all have perished together, in that he reproves the blessed Job for being troubled by the scourge. But it is very much to be looked into, that although he rebukes inconveniently, yet he narrates the orders of the virtues congruently. For he distinguished the life of the blessed Job by enumerating four degrees of virtues, while he joined fortitude to fear, and patience to fortitude, and perfection to patience. For in the way of God it is begun from fear, so that one may come to fortitude. For as in the way of the world audacity brings forth fortitude, so in the way of God audacity brings forth weakness; and as in the way of the world fear brings forth weakness, so in the way of God fear brings forth fortitude, Solomon attesting, who says: In the fear of the Lord is the confidence of fortitude (Prov. 14:26). For the confidence of fortitude is said to be in the fear of the Lord, because surely our mind by so much the more valiantly despises the terrors of temporal things, by as much as it more truly subjects itself to the Author of those same temporal things through dread. Which being constituted in the fear of the Lord, does not find outside what it should fear, because while it is joined to the Creator of all things by a right fear, it is raised up by a certain power above all things. But fortitude is not shown except in adversity, whence also immediately after fortitude patience is substituted. For by so much each one demonstrates more truly that he has profited unto fortitude, as he more robustly tolerates the evils of others. For he has less gathered strength in himself, whom the iniquity of another prostrates. Who lies pierced through by the sword of his own pusillanimity, in that he is not able to bear contrariety. Because truly perfection is born of patience, immediately after patience, the perfection of ways is brought in. [Old XIV.] For he is truly perfect, who is not impatient towards the imperfection of his neighbor. For he who, not being able to bear the imperfection of another, deserts him, is himself a witness to himself that he does not yet profit perfectly. Hence in the Gospel the Truth says: In your patience you shall possess your souls (Luke 21:19). For what is it to possess the souls, but to live perfectly in all things, to dominate all the motions of the mind from the citadel of virtue? He therefore who holds patience, possesses his soul; because he is made strong against all adverse things from thence, whence he also dominates himself by conquering. And in that he laudably breaks himself, he exerts himself strongly unbroken; because when he overcomes himself in his pleasures, he prepares himself invincible to contrary things. But because Eliphaz rebuked by inveighing, he now adds some things as if by exhorting, saying:

CHAPTER XVII

[New XIV].

VERSE 7.---Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or when were the upright destroyed?

34. Often the innocent perish here, and the upright are destroyed.---Whether heretics, in whose likeness we have said the friends of blessed Job are held, or any perverse persons whatsoever, as inordinately as they rebuke, so reprehensibly do they exhort. For he says: Who ever perished, being innocent, or when were the upright destroyed? For often here even the innocent perish, and the upright are utterly destroyed; but yet they are preserved for eternal glory by perishing. For if no innocent person perished, the Prophet would not say: The just perisheth, and there is no one who considereth it (Isai. 57:1). If God did not snatch away the upright by providing for them, Wisdom would by no means have said concerning the just: He was snatched away, lest malice should change his understanding (Wisd. 4:11). If no animadversion struck the just, Peter would very little have foretold, saying: It is time that judgment should begin at the house of God (1 Pet. 4:17). Those, therefore, are truly upright, who are prepared for all the adversities of the present life by the love of the supernal country. For they who fear to suffer evils here for eternal goods, are evidently not upright. But Eliphaz does not think either that the upright are destroyed or that the innocent perish here, because often those who serve God not for the hope of heavenly glory, but for earthly retribution, they themselves imagine for themselves what they seek; and presuming to teach, when they preach earthly security, they show by all their labors what they love. It follows:

CHAPTER XVIII

[Old and New XV].

VERSES 8, 9.---But rather I have seen those who work iniquity, and sow sorrows, and reap them, perish by the blast of God, and be consumed by the spirit of his wrath.

35. They sow and reap sorrows. Why God sometimes tolerates the evil, sometimes strikes them immediately.---To sow sorrows is to say fraudulent things; but to reap sorrows is to prevail in saying them. Or certainly they sow sorrows who do perverse things; they reap sorrows when they are punished for that same perversity. For the fruit of sorrow is the retribution of damnation. But when it is immediately added that those who sow and reap sorrows perish by the blast of God and are consumed by the spirit of his wrath, in this place the reaping of sorrow is shown not yet as punishment, but still as the perfection of iniquity, because from the spirit of divine wrath, the punishment of that same reaping is substituted. They sow, therefore, sorrows here and reap them, because the things they do are iniquitous, and they prosper in that same iniquity; as is said of the iniquitous through the Psalmist: His ways are polluted at all times; thy judgments are taken away from before his face, he shall dominate all his enemies (Psalm 10:5, Heb.). Concerning whom it is added a little after: Under his tongue is labor and sorrow (Ibid., 7). He sows sorrows, therefore, when he does perverse things; he reaps sorrows when he grows temporally from those same perversities. How then do they perish by the blast of God, who for the most part are permitted to subsist here for a long time, and more happily than the just? For hence it is said again concerning them through the Psalmist: In the labors of men they are not, and with men they shall not be scourged (Psalm 73:5). Hence Jeremiah says: Why doth the way of the impious prosper? (Jer. 12:1). For because, as it is written: The Lord is a patient rewarder (Ecclus. 5:4), he often tolerates for a long time those whom he damns forever; but sometimes he strikes quickly, he who runs together for the sake of comforting the pusillanimity of the innocent. Sometimes, therefore, almighty God suffers the iniquitous to prevail for a long time, so that the life of the just may be purged more purely. Sometimes, indeed, he slays the unjust quickly, and by their death he confirms the hearts of the innocent. For if he struck all who do evil now, for whom would he exhibit the last judgment? If, however, he struck none at all, who would have believed that God cares for human affairs? Sometimes, therefore, he strikes the iniquitous, so that he may show that he does not desert unavenged evils. Sometimes indeed he tolerates the iniquitous for a long time, so that he may insinuate to those considering, for what judgment he reserves them.

36. In what sense it is false, and in what sense true, that the iniquitous are destroyed.--- This sentence, therefore, of the destruction of the iniquitous, if it is not said generally concerning all with the end of the present world, is without doubt evacuated in great part by the virtue of truth. But then it will be true, when there shall no longer be a delay of iniquity. Which can perhaps be more rightly understood in this way, since neither does the innocent perish, nor is the upright destroyed; because even if he is worn down in the flesh here, he is repaired with true salvation in the sight of the eternal Judge. And those who sow sorrows and reap them, perish by the blast of God; because by as much as they here profit more highly by acting perversely, by so much more hardly are they struck by the subsequent damnation. But when it is set before the same sentence, Remember, it is evidently clear that a thing passed is brought back to the mind, but a thing future is not announced. Then, therefore, Eliphaz would have spoken more truly, if he had believed these things to happen generally concerning the iniquitous in the final animadversion.

37. God is aptly said to blast, when he retributes vengeance. Then he who is tranquil in himself, appears turbulent to those perishing.---

But this, that God is said to blast, urges that it be more subtly discerned. For we, when we blast, draw the air from the exterior parts inwards, and being drawn inwards we give this back outwards. Therefore God is said to blast in the retribution of vengeance, because from exterior causes he conceives the counsel of judgment inwards, and from internal counsel he emits the sentence outwards. As if by the blast of God, something is drawn from the exterior inwards, when he beholds our evils without, and disposes judgment within. And again, as if by the blast of God, the spirit is emitted from the interior outwards, when from the internal conception of counsel, the external judgment of damnation is brought in. Well, therefore, is it said that those who sow sorrows, perish by the blast of God; because from whence they do perverse things without, from thence they are rightly struck from the inmost parts. Or certainly since God is said to blast, because also the spirit of his wrath is immediately brought in, by the appellation of that blast his animadversion itself can be designated. For we, when we are angry, are inflamed by the blast of fury. So that the Lord may be demonstrated thinking upon vengeance, he is said to blast in being angry; not that he himself receives in his nature the vicissitude of mutability, but that after long patience, when he executes the vengeance of the sinner, he who is tranquil in himself, appears turbulent to those perishing. For the reprobate mind, because it beholds a judge adverse to its acts, is shown to itself as if moved, because in the sight of that one it is itself troubled by its own guilt. But after he has admonished as if gently, he openly joins words of increment, saying:

CHAPTER XIX.

VERSE 10.---The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the lioness, and the teeth of the young lions, are broken.

38. Harsh words of Eliphaz against Job.---For what does he call the roaring of the lion, unless, as we have premised a little before, the severity of the husband? what the voice of the lioness, unless the loquacity of the wife? what the teeth of the young lions, unless the edacity of the offspring? For because the sons feasting were extinguished, they are signified by the expression of the teeth. All which things while the rigid Eliphaz exults that they are broken, he denounces them as if justly damned. Whose hardness of reproof he still redoubles, when he adds:

CHAPTER XX.

VERSE 11.---The tiger has perished, because it had no prey, and the young of the lions are scattered.

39. The tiger, varied and rapacious, aptly signifies hypocrites.---For whom does he sign by the name of the tiger, but blessed Job with the mark of variety, or sprinkled with the spots of simulation? For every simulator, in that which he desires to appear upright, does not show himself clean through all things; because while he assumes certain virtues through hypocrisy, and secretly subjects himself to vices, certain latent vices suddenly break out in the face, and show the skin of the superinduced simulation, as if of a vision, varied from its admixture; so that it is often a wonder why a man, who is seen to prevail in such great virtues, is also defiled by such reprobate acts. But truly every hypocrite is a tiger, because while a clean color is drawn from simulation, it is varied by the interrupting blackness of vices. For often while he is extolled for the cleanness of chastity, he is fouled by the filth of avarice. Often while he is shown beautiful by the virtue of largess, he is defiled by the spots of luxury. Often while he is clothed with the decorum of chastity and largess, as if from zeal of justice, he is darkened by the atrocity of cruelty. Often he is clothed by largess, chastity, and piety from a beautiful vision, but is marked by the interfused obscurity of pride. And so it happens that with vices mixed in, while the hypocrite does not show a clean appearance in himself, he can by no means have, as it were, one color of the tiger. Which tiger, namely, seizes prey, because it usurps for itself the glory of human favor. For he who is extolled by seized praise, is satiated as if with prey. Well, moreover, is the praise of hypocrites called prey. For it is prey, when the things of others are violently taken away. But every hypocrite, because simulating the life of justice, he snatches for himself the praise of the just, it is certainly a thing of another that he takes. Eliphaz therefore, because he knew that blessed Job had done things to be praised in the time of his incolumity, by the subsequent percussion, believed that he had held these through hypocrisy, saying: The tiger has perished, because it had no prey. As if he should say openly: The variety of thy simulation is extinguished, because the flattery of praise is also taken away; and now thy hypocrisy has no prey, because struck by divinity, it lacks human favors.

40. The ant-lion adumbrates those who are timid against the stronger, bold against the small.---But in the translation of the Seventy interpreters, the tiger is by no means said, but, The ant-lion has perished, because it had no prey. For the ant-lion is a very small animal, adverse to ants, which hides itself under the dust, and kills ants carrying grain, and consumes them when killed. But it is called Myrmicoleon in Latin, either the lion of ants, or certainly more expressly ant and lion together. Rightly, however, is it named ant and lion, because either to flying things, or to any other minute animals it is an ant, but to the ants themselves a lion. For it devours these as if a lion, but is devoured by those as if an ant. When therefore Eliphaz says: The ant-lion has perished, what does he reprove in blessed Job under the name of the ant-lion, but fear and boldness? As if he should say to him openly: Not unjustly hast thou been struck, because thou wast timid against the erect, bold against the subjects. As if he should say openly: Against the astute fear pressed thee, against the simple temerity puffed thee up. But now the ant-lion has no prey, because thy timid elation while it is pressed by lashes, is prohibited from the injury of another. But because we have said that the friends of blessed Job hold the type of heretics, it necessarily urges, that we intimate how these same words of Eliphaz are also to be understood typically.

CHAPTER XXI.

VERSE 10.---The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the lioness, and the teeth of the young lions, are broken.

ALLEGORICAL SENSE.---41. Diverse things are figured by the same thing in the Scriptures.---Because the nature of each thing is composed of diversity, in the sacred eloquence diverse things are lawfully figured through any thing. For the lion has virtue, and it has cruelty. By virtue therefore it signifies the Lord, by cruelty the devil. For hence it is said of the Lord: The lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, has conquered (Rev. 5:5). Hence it is written of the devil: Your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, goes about, seeking whom he may devour (1 Pet. 5:8). But by the name of the lioness sometimes the holy Church, sometimes Babylonia is designated. For because she is bold against adversities, the Church is called a lioness; as is approved by the voices of the same blessed Job, who, indicating Judea forsaken by the Church, says: The sons of the merchants have not trodden it, nor has the lioness passed through it (Job 28:8). But sometimes by the name of the lioness the city of this world, that is, Babylonia, is expressed, which is made fierce against the life of the innocent by the immensity of cruelty, which being associated with the ancient enemy, as if with a most cruel lion, conceives the seeds of his perverse persuasion, and brings forth from herself reprobate sons to his similitude, as if cruel whelps. But the young of the lions are any reprobates, generated to an iniquitous life by the error of malignant spirits: who also all together make the universal city of the world, which we have said before, Babylonia, and yet the same individuals, the sons of Babylonia, are called as if not the lioness, but the whelps of the lioness. For as the whole of Zion together is called the Church, but the sons of Zion are remembered as each of the saints individually, so also the sons of Babylonia are each of the reprobates individually, and the same Babylonia all the reprobates together.

42. The saints fear temptations; heretics, secure in their own sanctity, contemn them.---But holy men, as long as they are in this life, keep themselves with solicitous circumspection, lest the lion going about should snatch them by lying in wait, that is, the ancient enemy should kill them under some image of virtue; lest the voice of the lioness should roar in their ears, that is, lest the glory of Babylonia should avert their sense from the love of the heavenly country; lest the teeth of the young lions should bite, that is, lest the persuasion of the reprobate should grow strong in the heart. But on the contrary, heretics are now as if secure in their sanctity, because they suspect that they have surpassed all things by the merits of their life. Whence it is also now said: The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the lioness, and the teeth of the young lions, are broken. As if it were said openly: We are therefore worn away by no scourges, because we tread under foot both the virtue of the ancient enemy, and the cupidity of earthly glory, and the persuasions of all the reprobate, by surpassing them by the merits of our life. Whence it is still added:

CHAPTER XXII.

VERSE 11.---The tiger has perished, because it had no prey, and the young of the lions are scattered.

43. Satan is rightly called both a lion, and a tiger, and an ant-lion. Heretics glory as if over a conquered Satan.---He repeats him with the word of the tiger whom he signified by the appellation of the lion. For Satan is called a lion because of his cruelty, and not incongruously is he called a tiger because of the variety of his multiform astuteness. For now he objects himself to human senses as he is, lost; now he shows himself as an angel of light. Now by flattering he persuades the minds of the foolish; now by terrifying he draws them to guilt. Now he strives openly to persuade to vices; now in his suggestions he is cloaked under the appearance of virtue. This beast, therefore, which is sprinkled with such great variety, is rightly called a tiger, which among the Seventy interpreters, as we have said before, is called an ant-lion (Myrmicoleon). Which animal, namely, hidden in the dust, kills ants, as we have said, carrying grain; because certainly the apostate angel, cast down from the heavens to the earth, besets the minds of the just, who prepare for themselves the refreshment of good works, in the very journey of action; and when he overcomes them through snares, he kills them unforeseen as if ants carrying grain. But rightly is it called an ant-lion, that is, lion and ant. For to ants, as we have said, it is a lion, but to flying things an ant; because certainly the ancient enemy, as he is strong against those consenting, so he is weak against those resisting. For if assent is offered to his suggestions, he can by no means be tolerated as a lion; but if he is resisted, he is worn away as an ant. To some therefore he is a lion, to others an ant; because carnal minds scarcely tolerate his cruelty, but spiritual minds tread upon his infirmity with the foot of virtue. Heretics therefore, because they are proud from the presumption of sanctity, say as if exulting: The ant-lion, or certainly the tiger, has perished, because it had no prey. As if they should say openly: The ancient adversary has no prey in us, because as to our studies he already lies conquered. But for this reason he is repeated by the appellation of the ant-lion or the tiger, who had already been designated by the broken roaring of the lion, because whatever is said through joy, is often replicated. For the mind redoubles its voices when it exults. Whence also with true gladness the Psalmist frequently repeats this, that he knew himself to have been heard, saying: The Lord has heard the voice of my weeping;

the Lord has heard my deprecation; the Lord has received my prayer (Psalm 6:9, 10).

44. The saints rejoice with fear over tamed vices. Hypocrites, if even one is overcome, think themselves perfect.---But holy men, when they become cheerful that they are snatched from certain vices, shake themselves with great fear even in that exultation; because although they are already snatched from the storm of any tempest, they know themselves to be yet in the doubtful waves of the uncertain sea: and thus they exult in hope, that they may tremble in fear; thus they tremble in fear, that they may exult in the confidence of hope. Whence it is said by the same Psalmist: Serve the Lord in fear, and exult unto him with trembling (Psalm 2:11). But on the contrary, those who swell from the appearance of sanctity, when they overcome any one vice, soon lift up their mind in pride, and glory as if over the perfection of their life; and because perhaps they have been once snatched from the danger of the tempest, they now forget that they are sailing in the sea: they estimate themselves great in all things, and think they have conquered the ancient adversary to the foundation; they look back upon all below themselves, because they judge themselves to transcend all through wisdom. Whence it is added:

CHAPTER XXIII.

VERSE 12.---Moreover a hidden word was spoken to me.

45. Heretics affect a new and occult doctrine, why.---Heretics simulate that they hear a hidden word, so that they may draw a certain reverence of their preaching over the minds of their hearers. Whence they also preach hiddenly, insofar as their preaching may seem as holy as it is occult. But they refuse to have common knowledge, lest they be estimated equal to others; and they always seek out certain new things, which while others know not, they glory among the minds of the unskilful concerning the singularity of their knowledge. Which, as we have said, they insinuate as occult, because namely so that they may be able to show it as wonderful, they confirm that they have perceived it hiddenly. Whence in Solomon a woman holding the type of heretics, says: Stolen waters are sweeter, and hidden bread is more pleasant (Prov. 9:17). Whence here also it is added: And as it were stealthily my ear received the veins of its whispering. They perceive the veins of whispering stealthily, because deserting the grace of social knowledge, they by no means enter to this through the door, the Lord attesting, who says: He who enters not through the door into the sheepfold, but climbs up another way, the same is a thief and a robber (John 10:1, 2). Therefore he receives the veins of the divine whispering stealthily, who, to perceive the notice of his virtue, having deserted the door of public preaching, seeks the rifts of depraved intelligence. But because he who enters from elsewhere is a thief and a robber, and loves darkness, and dreads the clarity of light, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIV.

VERSE 13.---In the horror of a night vision, when deep sleep is wont to occupy men.

46. That they may show the things they teach to be high, they declare themselves scarcely to grasp them. Now they are extolled for the singularity of wisdom.---Often heretics, while they endeavor to say higher things, are themselves witnesses to themselves that the things they proffer are not true. For in a night vision one discerns doubtfully. Therefore they assert that they have perceived the rifts of whispering in the fear of a night vision, because so that they may show to others the things they teach to be high, they denounce themselves as being scarcely able to grasp them. But from this it is to be gathered how they will be able to be certain to their hearers, which things they themselves have seen doubtfully. Therefore in a wonderful order, when flowing forth speaking high things, they are bound by the very voices of their height in the manifestation of their folly. But how much they are elevated concerning the singularity of wisdom, is shown when it is immediately added: When deep sleep is wont to occupy men. As if it were said openly by heretics: When men sleep below, we watch for perceiving supernal things, because those things are known to us, to the knowing of which, namely, the torpid hearts of other men do not rise. As if they should say more openly: In those things in which our intelligence erects itself, the sense of the rest of men sleeps. But sometimes when they behold this to be despised by the hearer, they simulate that they themselves fear what they say. Whence it is added:

CHAPTER XXV.

VERSE 14.---Dread held me and trembling, and all my bones were terrified.

47. Now they simulate themselves to be fearful.---For because they desire to appear wonderful concerning the height of their doctrine, they as it were greatly fear the things they feign; and since it is of less labor to hear than to speak, they are bold to proffer those things, which namely they construct because they themselves were scarcely able to hear them. Whence it is still added:

CHAPTER XXVI.

VERSES 15, 16.---And when a spirit passed by, I being present, the hairs of my flesh stood up; there stood one, whose face I did not acknowledge.

48. Now they feign to have known incomprehensible things in themselves.---That they may indicate themselves to have known incomprehensible things, they narrate that a spirit did not stand, but passed by before them; and they simulate that they have seen an unknown face, so that they may show themselves to be known to him who cannot be known by the human mind. Where it is still added:

CHAPTER XXVII.

VERSE 16.---An image before my eyes, and I heard a voice as of a gentle breeze.

49. They are unable to behold God spiritually, nor yet do they always err. They speak certain true and sublime things.---Often heretics imagine God to themselves imaginally whom they are unable to behold spiritually; and they pretend to hear his voice as of a gentle breeze, because they rejoice to be as it were more familiar than others for knowing his secrets. For they do not teach those things which God speaks publicly, but those which are as it were hiddenly inspired into their ear. These things, therefore, we have said, that we might more intimately intimate what is to be felt under the appearance of heretics in the sermons of Eliphaz. But since the friends of blessed Job would not be friends of so great a man, unless they had manifestly learned something from the truth, because although they err in sentences of correction, yet in the knowledge of the truth they do not altogether stumble: let us replicate these same words a little above, that we may more subtly discern how those things which are said concerning the perception of truth, can be truly proffered by those who feel rightly. For sometimes heretics speak certain true and sublime things, not that they themselves perceive these divinely, but that they have learned them from the contention of the holy Church; nor do they draw these to the profit of conscience, but to the ostentation of knowledge. Whence it happens mostly that they say high things by knowing, but they know not by living the things they say. Whether therefore from the appearance of heretics, namely of those holding not the life of knowledge but the words, or certainly from the person of the friends of blessed Job, who from the knowledge of truth could without doubt experience by perceiving what they studied to speak by teaching, let us discuss these same things which we have run through, spoken more subtly; that while the sermon of Eliphaz is solicitously discussed, it may be demonstrated of how great knowledge he was; although in the same knowledge he did not hold humility, who specially arrogated the common good to himself. For he says:

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VERSE 12.---Moreover a hidden word was spoken to me.

ALLEGORICAL SENSE.---50. The hidden word, the Son of God, or the locution of the Holy Spirit. This is perceived by few. It can be felt, not expressed.---For the invisible Son is called the hidden word, of whom John says: In the beginning was the Word. Which he also insinuates as hidden, when he subjoins: And the Word was with God, and the Word was God. But this hidden word is spoken to the minds of the elect, when the power of the only-begotten Son is manifested to believers. The allocution of internal aspiration can also be understood through the hidden word; of which John says: His unction teaches you concerning all things (1 John 2:27). Which aspiration namely by touching lifts up the human mind, and depressing temporal thoughts, inflames this with eternal desires, so that nothing already may please it, except those things which are supernal, and it may contemn all things which sound around from human corruption below. To hear the hidden word, therefore, is to conceive the locution of the Holy Spirit in the heart. Which certainly cannot be known, except by him by whom it can be had. Whence also by the voice of Truth it is said concerning this hidden locution: I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Paraclete, that he may remain with you forever, the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive (John 14:16). For as the same Paraclete after the ascension of the Mediator, another consoler of the human race, is invisible in himself; so he kindles every one, whom he shall have filled, to desiring invisible things. And because worldly hearts love only visible things, the world receives him not, because it does not rise to loving invisible things. For secular minds, by as much as they dilate themselves without through desires, by so much do they narrow the bosom of the heart to his reception. And because there are very few in the human race, who being purged from the filth of temporal desires, are dilated by this very purgation to the perception of the Holy Spirit, this is called a hidden word, because that is perceived in the heart by some without doubt, which is unknown by the greatest part of men. Or certainly this afflation of the Holy Spirit is the hidden word, because it can be felt, but it cannot be expressed by the noise of locution. When, therefore, divine aspiration without noise lifts up the mind, the hidden word is heard, because the speech of the Spirit sounds silently in the ear of the heart. Whence it is added:

CHAPTER XXIX

[Rec. XX].

IBID.---And my ear received, as if by stealth, the veins of his whispering.

51. He seeks a mind abstracted from visible things. In what various ways He speaks to it.--- The ear of the heart receives the veins of the heavenly whispering by stealth, because the mind, being breathed upon, knows the subtlety of the inward locution both rapidly and secretly. For unless it hides itself from outward desires, it does not penetrate the inward ones. And it is hidden that it may hear, and it hears that it may be hidden; because being withdrawn from visible things, it beholds invisible things, and being filled with invisible things, it perfectly contemns visible things. It is to be noted, however, that he does not say: "My ear received, as if by stealth, his whispering;" but "the veins of his whispering." For the whispering of the hidden word is this very locution of inward aspiration. But the veins of the whispering are called the origins of the causes by which this very aspiration is led to the mind. For God opens, as it were, the veins of His whispering when He secretly insinuates to us in what ways He comes to the ear of our intelligence. For sometimes He touches us with love, sometimes with terror; sometimes He shows how nothing present things are, and raises the desire to love eternal things; sometimes He first points out eternal things, that afterwards temporal things may become vile. Sometimes He opens to us our own evils, and extends us even to this, that we should grieve for the evils of others also. Sometimes He sets before our eyes the evils of others, and wonderfully corrects us, being touched with compunction, from our own depravity. To hear the veins of the divine whispering by stealth, therefore, is to recognize the hidden ways of divine aspiration thinly and secretly.

52. God whispers to us, because He does not make Himself fully manifest. Through created works, as if through certain chinks, He offers Himself to be admired.---Although we are able to understand either the whispering or the veins of the whispering in another way. For he who whispers speaks secretly, and does not express his voice, but imitates it. We, therefore, as long as we are pressed by the corruption of the flesh, in no way see the clarity of divine power, as it remains immutable in itself: because the edge of our weakness does not sustain that which shines intolerably upon us from the ray of His eternity. When, therefore, Almighty God indicates Himself to us through the chinks of contemplation, He by no means speaks to us, but whispers, because although He does not fully intimate Himself, He nevertheless manifests something of Himself to the human mind. But then He no longer whispers, but speaks, when His certain species is revealed to us. For hence it is that in the Gospel the Truth says: "I will announce to you plainly of the Father" (John 16:26). Hence John says: "We shall see Him as He is" (1 John 3:2). Hence Paul says: "Then shall I know, even as I am known" (1 Cor. 13:12). But now the divine whispering has as many veins coming to us as the divinity itself presides over created works. For while we behold all things that are created, we are lifted up in admiration of the Creator. For as water flowing gently is sought through the chinks in the veins, that it may be increased, and pours itself forth so much more vastly as it finds the veins more open; so we, while we studiously collect the knowledge of the divinity from the consideration of His creature, open, as it were, the veins of that whispering to us; because through that which we see made, we admire the power of the maker; and through those things which are in public, that emanates to us which is hidden in secret. For it breaks forth to us as if by a certain sound, while He shows us His works to be considered, in which He indicates Himself in some way, while He manifests how incomprehensible He is. Because, therefore, we cannot worthily consider Him, we do not hear His voice, but scarcely a whispering. For because we do not suffice to weigh fully even those things which are created, it is rightly said: "And my ear received, as if by stealth, the veins of his whispering." For being cast out from the joys of paradise, and punished with the penalty of blindness, we scarcely apprehend the veins of the whispering, because we also weigh His wonderful works rapidly and thinly. [Vet. XXI] But it must be known, that by as much as the mind, being lifted up, considers His power, by so much, being repressed, it dreads His rectitude. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXX

[Rec. XXI].

VERSE 13.---In the horror of a vision by night.

53. The mind trembles so much the more for its own deeds, by how much the higher it is raised to God. Hence it fears and loves God more.--- The horror of a vision by night is the dread of secret contemplation. For the human mind, by how much the higher it is raised to consider eternal things, by so much the more heavily does it dread, being shaken, for its temporal deeds; because it perceives itself more truly guilty, by as much as it beholds itself to have disagreed from that light which glitters above it; and so it comes to pass that, being illuminated, it fears more, because it beholds more through how great things it discordance from the rule of truth; and its own very progress shakes it with grave dread, which before saw nothing as if more securely. Although by however great virtue it may have progressed, it does not yet comprehend anything manifest of eternity, but still beholds under a certain mist of imagination. Whence also this same is called a vision by night. For in the night, as we have also said above, we see doubtfully; but in the day we see constantly. Because, therefore, to contemplate the ray of the inward sun, the cloud of our corruption interposes itself, nor does that immutable light break forth, as it is, to the weak eyes of our mind; we still behold God as if in a vision by night, while without doubt we are misty under an uncertain contemplation. But although the mind may have conceived some last thing concerning Him, nevertheless in the consideration of His magnitude it grows horrific, and fears more, because it feels itself unequal to those very footsteps of its contemplation, and having relapsed to itself, it loves Him more closely, whose wonderful sweetness being unable to bear, it has scarcely tasted this under an uncertain vision. But because the summit of this sublevation is by no means reached, unless first the crowd of carnal desires importunately making a noise be repressed, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXI

[Rec. XXII].

IBID.---When deep sleep is wont to occupy men.

54. Contemplation is not reached unless carnal desires are put to sleep. Sleep is taken in three ways.---Whoever desires to do those things which are of the world, wakes, as it were; but whoever, seeking inward quiet, flees the noise of this world, falls asleep, as it were. But first it must be known that sleep, being figuratively placed in Sacred Scripture, is taken in three ways. For sometimes by sleep the death of the flesh is expressed, sometimes the torpor of negligence, but sometimes, earthly desires being trodden under foot, the rest of life. For by the name of sleep or sleeping the death of the flesh is intimated, as Paul says: "I would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning them that are asleep." And a little after: "Even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him" (1 Thess. 4:13, 14). Again, by sleep the torpor of negligence is designated, as is said by the same Paul: "It is now the hour for us to rise from sleep" (Rom. 13:11). And again: "Awake, ye just, and sin not" (1 Cor. 15:34). By sleep also, carnal desires being trodden under foot, the rest of life is figured, as is said by the voice of the bride in the Song of Songs: "I sleep, and my heart waketh" (Cant. 5:2); because, namely, the holy mind, by how much the more it restrains itself from the noise of temporal concupiscence, by so much the more truly does it know inward things; and it wakes so much the more alertly to inward things, by how much the more it hides itself from outward disquietude. Which is well figured by Jacob sleeping on his journey (Gen. 28:11), who placed a stone at his head, and fell asleep: he saw a ladder reaching from the earth to heaven, the Lord leaning upon the ladder, and also angels ascending and descending. To sleep on the journey, indeed, is to rest in this transit of the present life from the love of temporal things. To sleep on the journey is to close the eyes of the mind from the appetite of visible things in the course of the passing days: which eyes the seducer opened to the first men, who said: "For God knows that in whatever day you shall eat thereof, your eyes shall be opened" (Gen. 3:5). Whence also a little after it is added: "She took of the fruit thereof, and did eat; and gave to her husband, who did eat, and the eyes of both were opened." For guilt opened the eyes of concupiscence, which innocence kept closed. But to behold angels ascending and descending is to contemplate the citizens of the heavenly country, either with how great love they cohere to their Author above themselves, or with how great compassion of charity they condescend to our infirmities.

55. To rest from the actions of the world is not sufficient for contemplation, unless virtues also be exercised.---And it is greatly to be noted that he who sleeps beholds the angels, who places his head upon a stone; because doubtless he himself, ceasing from outward works, penetrates inward things, who with a careful mind, which is the principal part [Greek, to hegemonikon] of man, observes the imitation of his Redeemer. For to place the head upon a stone is to cohere with the mind to Christ. For those who are removed from the action of the present life, but are snatched to heavenly things by no love, can sleep, but they cannot see the angels; because they contemn holding the head upon the stone.

[Vet. XXII.] For there are some who indeed flee the actions of the world, but are exercised by no virtues. These, namely, sleep by torpor, not by study; and therefore they do not behold inward things, because they have placed the head not on the stone but on the earth. To whom it for the most part happens that, by how much more securely they cease from external actions, by so much more widely do they collect within themselves the noise of unclean thought through leisure. Whence under the species of Judea, the soul torpid with leisure is bewailed by the Prophet, when it is said: "The enemies saw her, and did mock at her Sabbaths" (Lam. 1:7). For by the precept of the law, one ceases from outward work on the Sabbath. The enemies, therefore, seeing the Sabbaths, mock, when malignant spirits draw these very leisures of vacation to illicit thoughts; so that each soul, by how much it is believed to serve God being removed from external actions, by so much the more does it serve their tyranny by thinking illicit things. But holy men, who are put to sleep from the works of the world not by torpor but by virtue, sleep more laboriously than they were able to wake, because in that which they overcome by deserting the actions of this world, they fight daily by a robust conflict against themselves, lest the mind grow torpid through negligence, lest being subjected to leisure it grow cold to unclean desires, lest it be more fervent than is just in those very good desires, lest under the species of discretion by sparing itself, it languish from perfection. It does these things, and withdraws itself inwardly from the unquiet concupiscence of this world, and deserts the noise of earthly actions, and being intent on virtues through the study of quiet, it sleeps waking. For it is not led to contemplate inward things, unless it be studiously withdrawn from those things which implicate externally. For hence it is that the Truth says through itself: "No man can serve two masters" (Matt. 6:24). Hence Paul says: "No man warring for God entangleth himself with secular businesses, that he may please him to whom he hath approved himself" (2 Tim. 2:4). Hence through the Prophet the Lord, admonishing, says: "Be vacant, and see, that I am God" (Ps. 46:11). Because, therefore, inward knowledge is by no means beheld unless one ceases from external implication, the time of the hidden word and the divine whispering is now rightly expressed, when it is said: "In the horror of a vision by night, when deep sleep is wont to occupy men," because namely our mind is in no way snatched to the power of inward contemplation, unless it be first studiously put to sleep from the tumult of earthly desires. But the human mind, being raised up by a certain machine of its contemplation, by how much the higher things it beholds above itself, by so much the more terribly does it tremble within itself. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXII

VERSE 14.---Fear seized me, and trembling, and all my bones were terrified.

56. By how much the higher we contemplate the rectitude of God, by so much the more do we fear for our own.---What is signified by the bones, but strong deeds? Of which also it is said by the Prophet: "The Lord keepeth all their bones" (Ps. 34:20). And often men estimate those things which they do to be of some moment, because they are ignorant of how subtle is the judgment of inward strictness. But when, being snatched through contemplation, they behold heavenly things, they melt away in some manner from that very security of their presumption; and they tremble so much the more in the divine sight, by how much they weigh even their good deeds as not worthy of His examination, whom they behold. For hence it is that he who had progressed by working strong things, being raised up by the spirit, cried out: "All my bones shall say: Lord, who is like unto Thee" (Ps. 35:10)? As if he were to say: My flesh has no words, because my weak things are profoundly silent before Thee; but my bones speak the praise of Thy magnitude, because even those things which I believed to be strong in me, tremble at the consideration of Thee. Hence it is that Manoah, fearing at the sight of the angel, says: "We shall surely die, because we have seen the Lord" (Judg. 13:22). Whom his wife immediately consoles, saying: "If the Lord were pleased to kill us, He would not have received a burnt offering and a meat offering at our hands" (Ibid., 23). But what is it that at the vision of an angel the man becomes timid, and the woman bold, unless that as often as heavenly things are shown to us, the spirit indeed shakes itself with fear, but nevertheless hope presumes? For thence hope raises itself to daring greater things, whence the spirit is troubled, because it sees first those things which are heavenly. [Vet. XXIII.] Because, therefore, when the mind, being raised up, beholds the higher things of heavenly secrets, all the solidity of human strength trembles, it is now rightly said: "Fear seized me, and trembling, and all my bones were terrified." As if it were openly said: Perceiving the secrets of inward subtlety, whence I believed myself strong within myself, thence I staggered before the sight of the judge. For contemplating the strictness of divine justice, we rightly fear even for those very works which we thought we had done strongly. For our rectitude, being led to the inward rule, if it finds a strict judgment, impinges upon inward rectitude with many windings of its own crookedness. Whence Paul, well, when he perceived himself both to have the bones of virtues, and yet under strict examination these same bones of his trembled, said: "With me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's day." Yea, I judge not mine own self. For I know nothing by myself (1 Cor. 4:3). But because, having heard the veins of the divine whispering, these same bones of his trembled, he immediately added: "Yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord." As if he were to say: I remember that I have done upright things, and yet I do not presume on my merits, because our life is led to His examination, under which even the bones of our fortitude are troubled.

57. The grace of contemplation is not lasting.---But when the mind is suspended in contemplation, when overcoming the narrowness of the flesh, it searches into something of the liberty of inward security through the force of speculation, it cannot stand long above itself; because although the spirit carries it up to the highest things, yet the flesh still presses it downwards by the very weight of its own corruption. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXIII.

VERSE 15.---And when a spirit passed before me, the hair of my flesh stood up.

58. We indeed know invisible things, but rapidly.---The spirit passes before us, when we know invisible things, and yet we see these not solidly, but rapidly. For the mind is not fixed long in the sweetness of inward contemplation, because it is recalled to itself, being reverberated by the very immensity of the light. And when it tastes inward sweetness, it glows with love, it strives to go above itself, but broken, it relapses to the darkness of its own weakness; and progressing by great virtue, it sees that it cannot see that which it ardently loves, nor yet would it ardently love, unless it saw it in some degree. The spirit, therefore, does not stand, but passes, because our contemplation both opens the heavenly light to us when we gape for it, and soon hides it when we grow weak. And because in this life by however great virtue one may have progressed, he yet still feels the sting of his own corruption: "For the corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth upon many things" (Wisd. 9:15), it is rightly subjoined: "The hair of my flesh stood up."

[Rec. XXIV.] 59. No one here is so perfect, to whom there is not always born what should be cut off.---For the hairs of the flesh are any superfluities of human corruption. The hairs of the flesh are the thoughts of the old life, which we so cut off from the mind, that we are fatigued by no grief for the loss of them. But it is well said through Moses: "Let the Levites shave all the hair of their flesh" (Num. 8:7). For a Levite is called "one taken up." It behoves the Levites, therefore, to shave all the hair of their flesh, because he who is taken up into divine obsequies ought to appear clean before the eyes of God from all thoughts of the flesh, lest the mind bring forth illicit thoughts, and render the beautiful species of the soul deformed as if by sprouting hairs. But by however great virtue of holy conversation one may have been raised up, as we have said, there yet still is born to him from the oldness of life what must be tolerated. Whence also the very hairs of the Levites are commanded to be shaved, not plucked out. For the hairs being shaved, the roots remain in the flesh, and grow again to be cut back, because indeed superfluous thoughts are to be amputated with great study, but yet they can by no means be amputated fundamentally. For the flesh always generates superfluities which the spirit must always cut back with the iron of solicitude. But yet we behold these things in us more subtly then, when we penetrate the heights of speculation. Whence it is now rightly said: "When a spirit passed before me, the hair of my flesh stood up."

[Vet. XXIV.] 60. The mind devoted to contemplation cuts these off more solicitously, and so almost fixes the Spirit, yet does not hold Him long.---For the human mind, being raised up in the citadel of contemplation, tortures itself so much the more harshly for superfluities, by how much it beholds that which it loves to be exceedingly subtle; and when it gazes upon the beautiful thing which it desires above itself, it strictly judges whatever weak thing in itself it previously tolerated tranquilly. The hairs, therefore, dread while the spirit is passing, because superfluous thoughts flee before the force of compunction, so that nothing fluid, nothing now remiss may please, because the severity of inward visitation inflames the breathed-upon mind even against itself. And when that which is born illicitly in the heart is cut back by continual strictness, it for the most part happens that the quickened mind adheres a little more broadly to the ray of its speculation, and almost fixes the spirit which was passing. Nor yet does this very delay of contemplation fully open the power of the Divinity, because His immensity transcends human strengths, even when increased and raised up. Whence also it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXIV

VERSE 16.---There stood one, whose face I did not acknowledge.

61. Man having become entirely carnal through sin, does not think without images of bodies. Who without these may perceive his own soul, and then God.---For we do not say "a certain one" (quidam), except of him whom we either will not, or are not able to express. But with what mind "a certain one" is said in this place, is namely explained, when it is immediately subjoined: "Whose face I did not acknowledge." For the human soul, being expelled from the joys of paradise by the vice of the first men, lost the light of invisible things, and poured itself out entirely into the love of visible things; and it was blinded from inward speculation by as much as it was deformedly scattered without; whence it comes to pass that it knows none but those things which it knows by groping, so to speak, with corporal eyes. For man, who if he had willed to keep the precept, was to be spiritual even in the flesh, by sinning was made carnal even in mind, so that he thinks only those things which he draws to his soul through images of bodies. For the body is of heaven, of earth, of waters, of animals, and of all visible things, which he gazes upon incessantly, into which while the delighted mind throws itself entirely, it becomes gross from the subtlety of inward intelligence; and because it is no longer able to raise itself to the highest things, it lies willingly weak in these. But when it strives with wonderful efforts to rise from these, it is a very great thing if the soul, the corporal species being repressed, be led to the knowledge of itself; so that it may think of itself without a corporal image, and by thinking of itself, may prepare for itself a way even to considering the substance of eternity.

[Vet. XXV.] 62. How much the human soul differs from the divine substance. If it does not yet perceive what God is, it certainly perceives what He is not.---In this way, therefore, it exhibits itself to itself as a kind of ladder, by which, ascending from external things, it may pass into itself, and from itself tend towards its Author. For when it deserts corporal images, the mind, coming into itself, ascends not a little. But although the soul is incorporeal, because it nevertheless adheres to the body, it is recognized from its own quality, which is retained in the place of the flesh. Which, while it forgets things known, knows things unknown, remembers things given to oblivion, grows cheerful after sad things, is dejected after joyful things: by its own very diversity it indicates how much it differs from the substance of eternal immutability, which is always, as it is, the same: everywhere present, everywhere invisible, everywhere whole, everywhere incomprehensible, it is discerned by the gasping mind without sight, heard without doubt, received without motion, touched without a body, retained without a place. When the mind, accustomed to corporal things, thinks upon this substance, it sustains the phantasms of diverse images. Which while it drives away from the eyes of its intention by the hand of discretion, postponing all things to it, it already in some degree beholds this. Which if it has not yet apprehended what it is, it has certainly recognized what it is not. Because, therefore, the mind is snatched to unaccustomed things when it searches into the essence of the divinity, it is now rightly said: "There stood one, whose face I did not acknowledge."

63. Standing belongs to God alone.---But it was well said, "there stood." For every creature, because it was made out of nothing, and of itself tends to nothing, has not to stand, but to flow away. But a rational creature, by that very thing that it was created after the image of its Author, is fixed, lest it pass into nothing; but an irrational one is by no means fixed, but is delayed in passing, until it fulfills the species of the universe by the ministry of its vision. For although heaven and earth afterwards remain for eternity, yet of themselves they now hasten to nothing, but they persevere to be changed into better for the use of those whom they serve. Standing, therefore, belongs to the Creator alone, through whom all things pass Him who passes not, and in whom some things are retained, lest they pass. Whence also our Redeemer, because the state of His divinity could not be taken by the human mind, showed this to us coming to us, created, born, dead, buried, rising again, and returning to heavenly things, as if by passing. Which He well intimated through the Gospel to the enlightened blind man, to whom passing He gave hearing, but standing He restored his eyes (Matt. 9:27; 20:30; Mark 8:22; Luke 18:35; John 9:1). For through the dispensation of His humanity He had to pass; but through the power of His divinity, because He is everywhere present, He has to stand. The Lord, therefore, is said to hear the voices of our blindness passing, because being made man He has compassion on human misery. But standing He restores light, because He illustrates the darkness of our infirmity from the power of His divinity. Well, therefore, after it was said: "And when a spirit passed before me," it is subjoined: "There stood one, whose face I did not acknowledge." As if it were openly said: Him whom I felt by passing, I found not to pass. It is He Himself, therefore, who passes, He Himself who stands. For He passes, because being known He cannot be held; but He stands, because in as much as He is known, He appears immutable. Because, therefore, He who is always the same is discerned rapidly, God is seen simultaneously passing and standing. Or certainly His standing is to be varied by no mutation, as is said to Moses: "I am who I am" (Exod. 3:14). And as James insinuates Him, saying: "With whom there is no transmutation, nor shadow of change" (Jas. 1:17). But because whoever now apprehends anything of the contemplation of eternity, beholds this through His co-eternal species, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXV.

IBID.---An image before my eyes.

64. Whatever we perceive of the Father, we see through the Son.---For the Image of the Father is the Son, as Moses insinuates concerning the creation of man, saying: "God created man, in the image of God created He him" (Gen. 1:27). And as a certain wise man says through the expression of Wisdom concerning the same Son: "For He is the brightness of the everlasting light" (Wisd. 7:26). And as Paul says: "Who being the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His substance" (Heb. 1:3). When, therefore, His eternity is discerned, as the possibility of our infirmity admits, His image is set before the eyes of our mind; because when we truly intend upon the Father, we see Him, so much as we receive, through His own Image, that is, through the Son; and through that species, which was born of Him without beginning, we endeavor in some way to discern Him, who neither begins nor ends. Whence also this same Truth says in the Gospel: "No man cometh to the Father, but by Me" (John 14:6). But it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVI

[Rec. XXVI].

IBID.---And I heard a voice as of a gentle breeze.

65. The voice of the Holy Spirit is both a gentle breeze and a vehement spirit.---For what is designated by the voice of a gentle breeze, but the knowledge of the Holy Spirit, who proceeding from the Father, and receiving of that which is the Son's, is infused thinly into the knowledge of our infirmity? Who nevertheless coming upon the Apostles, is demonstrated through an external sound as if through a vehement spirit, when it is said: "And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind" (Acts 2:2). For the Holy Spirit, when He insinuates Himself to the knowledge of human infirmity, is expressed both by the sound of a vehement spirit, and by the voice of a gentle breeze; because namely coming, He is both vehement and gentle: gentle, because He tempers His knowledge to our senses, so far as it may be known in some way; vehement, because however much He tempers this, nevertheless by His advent He perturbs the blindness of our infirmity by illuminating it. For by His illustration He touches us gently, but He shakes our poverty immensely.

66. A gentle breeze because He reveals Himself here but a little to the saints. In contemplation, whatever the mind is able perfectly to behold is not God. ---The voice of God, therefore, is heard as of a gentle breeze, because to His contemplators still placed in this life, the Divinity by no means insinuates Himself as He is, but demonstrates His brightness thinly to the blear-eyed eyes of our mind. Which is well signified by the very acceptance of the law, when it is said, that Moses went up, and the Lord came down upon the mount (Exod. 24:1). [Vet. XXVI.] The mount, indeed, is our contemplation itself, into which we ascend, that we may be raised up to see those things which are beyond our infirmity. But into this the Lord descends, because to us who make much progress He opens some small part of Himself to our senses; if indeed anything can be called either small or a part in Him, who always remaining one and the same, cannot be understood partially, and yet is said to be participated by His faithful, since in His substance a part is by no means admitted. But because we cannot express Him in perfect speech, we resound Him to some extent by babbling, according to the measure of our humanity, as if hindered by the weakness of infancy. But because even when raised up in great contemplation, we reach something subtle of the knowledge of eternity, it is shown by the words of sacred history, when the noble prophet Elijah is instructed concerning the knowledge of God. To whom, when the Lord promised that He would pass before him, saying: "Behold, the Lord passeth by, a great and strong wind, overturning the mountains and breaking the rocks in pieces before the Lord"; He immediately added: "The Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake, the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire, the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a whistling of a gentle breeze" (1 Kings 19:11, 12). For the wind before the Lord overturns the mountains, and breaks the rocks in pieces; because the fear which rushes in from His advent both casts down the height of our heart and liquefies its hardness. But the Lord is said not to be in the wind of commotion and the fire, but it is not denied that He is in the whistling of a gentle breeze; because, forsooth, when the mind is suspended in the sublimity of contemplation, whatever it prevails perfectly to behold is not God: but when it beholds something subtle, this is what it hears of the incomprehensible substance of eternity. For we perceive, as it were, a whistling of a gentle breeze, when we subtly taste the savor of uncircumscribed Truth by a sudden contemplation. Then, therefore, is that which we know of God true, when we feel that we cannot fully know anything of Him. Whence it is well subjoined there: "Which when Elijah had heard, he covered his face with his mantle, and went out and stood in the door of the cave" (Ibid.). After the whistling of the thin breeze, the prophet covers his face with his mantle, because in that most subtle contemplation of Truth, he recognizes by how great ignorance man is covered. For to draw the mantle over the face is to veil the mind from the consideration of its own infirmity, lest it should dare to seek higher things; so that it may by no means opening the eyes of understanding precipitately beyond itself, but reverently close them to that which it is not able to apprehend. Who, doing these things, is described to have stood in the door of the cave. For what is our cave, but this habitation of corruption, in which we are still retained from of old? But when we begin to perceive something of the knowledge of Divinity, we stand, as it were, already in the door of our cave. For because we cannot perfectly go forth, yet gasping for the knowledge of Truth, we already catch something of the breeze of liberty. To stand, therefore, in the entrance of the cave, is, the obstacle of our corruption being repressed, to begin to go out to the knowledge of Truth. Whence also the Israelites, beholding from afar the cloud descending into the tabernacle, are remembered to have stood in the doors of their tents (Exod. 33:9); because they who in any way behold the advent of Divinity, as it were, already proceed from the habitation of the flesh. Because, therefore, the human mind, with whatever virtue it may stretch itself, scarcely knows the outermost parts of the innermost things, it is rightly said now: "And I heard a voice as of a gentle breeze." But because since Divine knowledge exhibits to us at least a little of itself, it perfectly teaches the ignorance of our infirmity, let him who heard the voice of a gentle breeze say what things he has learned from this very hearing. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVII

[Rec. XXVII].

VERS. 17.---Shall man be justified in comparison of God, or shall a man be more pure than his Maker? 67. Human justice compared to divine is injustice. Those who must repress complaints concerning God's scourges.---Human justice compared to divine justice is injustice: because even a lamp is seen to shine in the dark, but placed in the ray of the sun it is darkened. What, then, did Eliphaz, rapt in contemplation, know, but that man cannot be justified in comparison of God? For we believe those things to be right which we work outwardly, but when we least know internal things, as if placed in the sun's ray, we are in darkness. But when we perceive those things in some way, we do not judge these in any way, because each one judges the more subtly concerning the darkness, by how much more truly the brightness of the light is established for him. For he who sees the light, knows what to think of the darkness. For he who is ignorant of the brightness of light, even approves obscure things as if they were bright. But it is well subjoined: Or shall a man be more pure than his Maker? Whosoever murmurs concerning a percussion, what else does he do but accuse the justice of the one who strikes? A man, therefore, thinks himself more pure than his Maker, if he prepares a complaint against the scourge; and he undoubtedly postpones Him to himself, whose judgment concerning his own affliction he redargues. That, therefore, man may not dare to reprehend the judge of fault, let him humbly think upon the Author of nature, because He who wonderfully made man out of nothing, does not impiously afflict him when made. Which Eliphaz then learned, when he heard a voice as of a gentle breeze. For in the consideration of the divine magnitude, it is learned how humbly He is to be feared in His animadversion. And he who tastes supernal things, tolerates inferior things with equanimity, because he fully beholds within, of how much value he should estimate that which he does without. For he badly thinks himself upright, who is ignorant of the rule of supreme rectitude; and often a piece of wood is believed to be straight, if it be not brought to the rule; but when it is joined to the rule, it is found by how great a crookedness it swells, because, forsooth, rectitude in cutting reproves what the deceived eye approved. Eliphaz, therefore, because he beheld supernal things, exerts a strict judgment concerning inferior things; and although he does not rightly redargue the blessed Job, nevertheless, in comparison of the Creator of all, he rightly describes the measure of the creature, saying:

[CHAPTER XXXVIII [Vet. XXVII, Rec. XXVIII]. VERS. 18, 19. Behold, they that serve Him are not stable, and in His angels He found wickedness: how much more shall they that dwell in houses of clay, who have a foundation of earth, be consumed as by a moth?

68. Why the angelic nature is mutable, and whence it becomes immutable. The fall of angels admonishes men to distrust their own infirmity. The moth, concupiscence.---The angelic nature, even if by adhering to the contemplation of the Creator it remains immutably in its state, nevertheless by the very fact that it is a creature, it has in itself a changeableness of mutability. But to be changed, is to go from one thing to another, and not to be stable in oneself. For each thing tends toward something else by as many steps, as it were, as it is subject to the motions of its own mutability. But the incomprehensible nature alone knows not how to be moved from its state, which, from that which is always the same, knows not how to be changed. For if the substance of the angels had been alien from the motion of mutability, though well created by the Author, it would by no means have fallen from the height of its blessedness in the reprobate spirits. But wonderfully did the Almighty God create the nature of the highest spirits good, but mutable, so that both they who would not remain might fall, and they who would persist in their condition might do so the more worthily, by how much they stood even by their own choice; and might become of greater merit with God, by how much they had fixed the motion of their mutability by the station of their will. Because, therefore, the angelic nature also is in itself mutable, which mutability, namely, it overcame through this, that it is bound by the chains of love to Him who is always the same, it is rightly said now: Behold, they that serve Him are not stable. And the document of the same mutability is immediately subjoined, when it is added concerning the apostate spirits: And in His angels He found wickedness. From whose fall he well gathers a consideration of human infirmity, when he immediately subjoins: How much more shall they that dwell in houses of clay, who have a foundation of earth, be consumed as by a moth? For we dwell in houses of clay, because we subsist in earthly bodies. Which Paul, carefully considering, says: We have this treasure in earthen vessels (2 Cor. 4:7). And again: We know that if our earthly house of this habitation be dissolved, that we have a building of God, a house not made with hands (2 Cor. 5:1). The earthly foundation also is the substance of the flesh.

Which the Psalmist had carefully beheld in himself, when he said: My bone was not hidden from Thee, which Thou hast made in secret, and my substance in the lower parts of the earth (Psalm 139:15). But the moth is born from a garment, and by being born it corrupts that same garment from which it arises. The flesh is, as it were, a certain garment of the soul; but this garment, forsooth, has its own moth, because from the flesh itself arises carnal temptation, by which it is rent. For our garment is consumed, as it were, by a certain moth of its own, when the corruptible flesh engenders temptation, and through this arrives at destruction. As by a moth is man consumed, when from himself arises that by which he may be crushed. As if he should say openly: If those spirits cannot be immutable of themselves, who are depressed by no infirmity of the flesh; by what temerity do men think that they constantly remain in good, whom, in that which the intellect raises to the highest things, the carnal infirmity aggravating hinders, so that through the vice of corruption they have in themselves that whence they may grow old from their inward novelty?

[Vet. XXVIII.] 69. Angels are teachers, who however holy, are not without fault. The moth, doing damage without sound, exhibits the wicked not attending to their own losses.---Holy teachers can also be understood by angels, as it is said by the prophet: The priest's lips keep knowledge, and they seek the law at his mouth, for he is the angel of the Lord of hosts (Mal. 2:7). Who with whatever virtue they may shine, cannot be altogether without fault, when they walk the journey of the present life, because their steps, forsooth, are touched either by the mud of an illicit work, or by the dust of thought. But they dwell in houses of clay, who exult in this seductive life of the flesh. Paul had contemned to dwell in this house of clay, when he said: But our conversation is in heaven (Philip. 3:20, 21). Let him say, therefore: Behold, they that serve Him are not stable, and in His angels He found wickedness; how much more they that dwell in houses of clay, who have a foundation of earth, shall be consumed as by a moth? As if he should say openly: If they who, announcing eternal things, accoutre themselves against temporal things, cannot pass the way of the present life without contagion, what detriments do they sustain who rejoice that they are in the pleasures of carnal habitation? For they who serve Him are not stable, because when the mind strives after high things, it is dissipated by the thought of its own flesh; so that often the mind while it gasps for inward things, while it beholds celestial things alone, struck by a sudden carnal delight, lies rent from itself, and he who was rejoicing that he had overcome the troubles of his infirmity, groans prostrate by a sudden wound. Wickedness, therefore, is found even in the angels, while a subreption of a deceptive life sometimes weighs down even those very ones who announce the truth. If, therefore, even these are struck by the iniquity of this world, whom a holy intention raises against it, by what blows are they penetrated, whom the very delight of their own infirmity prostrates before its darts? Who are well described as being consumed as by a moth. For a moth does damage, and makes no sound; so the minds of the wicked, because they neglect to consider their own losses, lose integrity as if unknowingly. For they lose innocence from the heart, truth from the mouth, continence from the flesh, and by the access of time, life from their age. But they by no means behold that they are incessantly losing these things, while they are occupied with all desire in temporal cares. As if, therefore, they are consumed by a moth, because without sound they tolerate the bite of fault, while they are ignorant how great detriments of life and innocence they suffer. Whence also it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXIX.

VERS. 20.---From morning until evening they shall be cut down. 70. The reprobate do not change their perverse mind even at the last time.---From morning until evening the sinner is cut down, while from the beginning of his life until the end, he is wounded by the perpetration of iniquity. For at all times the reprobate, through the increase of malice, redouble the blows against themselves, by which, being cut down, they fall into the deep. Concerning whom it is well said by the Psalmist: Bloody and deceitful men shall not halve their days (Psalm 55:23). To halve one's days, indeed, is to divide the time of life badly spent in pleasures for the lamentations of penitence, and to repair this by partitioning it for good use. But the wicked by no means halve their days, because they do not change their perverse mind even at the last time. Against which Paul well admonishes, saying: Redeeming the time, because the days are evil (Ephes. 5:16). We redeem the time, indeed, when we repair by weeping the past life, which we lost in wantonness. It follows:

CHAPTER XL.

IBID.---And because none understandeth, they shall perish for ever. 71. They neglect to know what punishments await them, and what rewards await the just.---None, namely, of those who from morning until evening are cut down. None understandeth either of those who perish, or of those who imitate the lost morals of the perishing. Whence elsewhere it is written: The just perisheth, and there is no one who thinketh in his heart, and men of mercy are gathered, because there is no one who understandeth (Isa. 57:1). The wicked, therefore, while they seek temporal things alone, and contemn to know what good things remain for the elect in eternity; while they behold the affliction of the just, but do not recognize what is the retribution of the affliction, stretch out the foot of their action into the deep, because they of their own accord close their eyes to the light of understanding. For deceived by foolish pleasures, while they love temporally those things which they see, alienated from themselves they do not see where they rush into eternity. Morning can also designate prosperity, and evening the adversity of this world. From morning, therefore, until evening the reprobate are cut down, because they both perish by wantonness through prosperity, and through adversity they rise up to madness by being impatient. Whom from morning until evening fault would by no means cut down, if they either believed prosperity to be a fomentation, or estimated adversity to be the cutting of their wound.

[Vet. XXIX.] 72. Who use prosperity or adversity well.---But because by no means is the multitude of the human race so deserted, that all things are permitted to tend to destruction, there are some who despise the delight of the present life, and even when they are present, consider them to be transitory, and tread them down out of love for eternity. And when they place their step in this first grade of judgment, being more vigorous they arrive at higher things, so that they despise all temporal things not only because they are to be lost more quickly, but they do not desire to adhere to these, even if they could have been eternal; and they withdraw their love from things beautifully created, because they tend with the steps of their heart toward the Author of beauty Himself. And there are some who love the goods of the present life, but yet by no means attain these: who gasp after temporal things with all their desires, seek the glory of the world, but can by no means obtain it. These, so to speak, the heart draws toward the world, the world repels toward the heart. For it often happens that, broken by their own adversities, they return to their mind, and having returned into themselves they consider how vain those things were which they sought, and immediately turn themselves to lamentation for so foolish a desire; and they desire eternal things the more strongly, by how much they grieve that they have labored more foolishly for temporal things. Whence well, the reprobate having been described, it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XLI

[Rec. XXIX].

Vers. 21.---But they that shall be left shall be taken away from them. 73. Whom the world despises, God chooses.---Whom else do we accept as the left, but the despised of this world? Whom while the present age chooses for the use of no glory, it leaves behind as the least and unworthy. But the Lord is said to take away the left of the world, because He deigns to choose the despised of this age, as Paul attests, who says: Not many wise according to the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble; but the foolish things of the world hath God chosen, that He may confound the wise; and the weak things of the world hath God chosen, that He may confound the strong (1 Cor. 1:26, 27). Which is well signified in the books of Kings by the Egyptian boy fainting on the way, whom the Amalekite, being sick, deserts on the journey, but David finds, refreshes with food, makes him the guide of his journey; he pursues the Amalekite, finds him feasting, and utterly extinguishes him (1 Sam. 30:13). For what is it that the Egyptian boy of the Amalekite is fainted on the journey, but that the lover of the present age, covered with the blackness of his sin, is often left behind infirm and despised by the same age, so that he cannot by any means run with it, but, broken by adversity, becomes torpid? But David finds him, because our Redeemer, truly strong of hand, sometimes converts to His love those whom He finds despised by the glory of the world. He feeds him with food, because He refreshes him with the knowledge of the word. He chooses him as the guide of the journey, because He makes him also His preacher. And he who was not able to follow the Amalekite is made the guide of David, because he whom the world deserted as unworthy, being converted, not only receives the Lord in his mind, but by preaching brings Him even to the hearts of others. With whom as guide, namely, David finds the Amalekite feasting and extinguishes him, because through those very ones preaching, Christ destroys the joy of the world, whom the world despised to have as companions. Because, therefore, for the most part, whom the world leaves, the Lord chooses, it is rightly said now: They that shall be left shall be taken away from them. It follows:

CHAPTER XLII.

IBID.---They shall die, and not in wisdom. 74. The custom of Scripture, that where it interposes something foreign, it soon returns to the treated argument.---What is it that he above brought forth the destruction of the reprobate, saying:

Because none understandeth, they shall perish for ever; and immediately added concerning the elect of God: But they that shall be left shall be taken away from them; and subjoins this immediately, which would not agree with the same elect, saying: They shall die, and not in wisdom? For if they are taken away divinely from the reprobate, in what way are they said to die not in wisdom? But forsooth it is the custom of sacred Scripture, that when it narrates something, a sentence of another cause having been interposed, it immediately returns to the previous things. For after it said: And because there is no one who understandeth, they shall perish for ever, it soon brought in the lot of the elect, saying: But they that shall be left shall be taken away from them. And again, sending the eye of its sentence to that destruction of the reprobate which it had foretold, it suddenly added: They shall die, and not in wisdom. As if he should say: These of whom I said that not understanding they shall perish for ever, will undoubtedly die not in wisdom. But that this is sometimes the manner of sacred eloquence we shall better show, if we bring forth some similitude of this thing from it. For the Apostle Paul, when he was admonishing his beloved disciple concerning the instituting of the offices of the Church, lest he should perhaps inordinately promote some to sacred orders, said: Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins, keep thyself pure (1 Tim. 5:22). Who immediately converting his words to the infirmity of his body says: Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities (Ibid., 23). And immediately he subjoins, saying: Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment, and some men they follow after (Ibid., 24). What, therefore, does that pertain to, that he prohibited water from being drunk by the infirm one, this which he subjoined concerning the hidden and manifest sins of certain men, but that a sentence concerning his infirmity having been interposed, he returned in the end to that which he said above: Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins? For that he might show with how great care those same sins were to be sought out, an admonition of discretion against the trouble of infirmity having been interposed, he immediately brought in that in some they were open, in others they were hidden, saying: Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment, and some men they follow after. As, therefore, through this sentence Paul does not agree with the same words with which he subjoined it speaking of Timothy's infirmity; but returned to that which he narrated above by intermitting; so in this place Eliphaz when he said concerning the elect: But they that shall be left shall be taken away from them, immediately adding: They shall die, and not in wisdom, immediately recurs to that which he brought forth above concerning the reprobate, saying: And because none understandeth, they shall perish for ever.

[Vet. XXX.] 75. The reprobate and the elect die, these in wisdom, those in insipience.---For this reason, moreover, the reprobate despise the elect, because they tend toward the invisible life through visible death. Concerning whom it is well said now: They shall die, and not in wisdom. As if it were openly said: They fly death and wisdom together; but they utterly desert wisdom, but do not escape the snares of death. And because they who were some time to die could have lived by dying, while they fear the death which will undoubtedly come, they lose life and wisdom together. But on the contrary the just die in wisdom, because the death which they cannot altogether avoid, when it imminently threatens for the truth, they contemn to defer; and while they bear it with equanimity, they turn the punishment of the propagation into an instrument of virtue, so that from thence life ought to be received, whence through the merit of the first fault it is forced to be finished. But because Eliphaz brought forth these things truly against the wicked, estimating the blessed Job to be reprehensible, he inflated himself with the pride of wisdom. Whence also after the predicaments of such great rectitude, he subjoins words of derision, saying:

[Rec. XXX].

CAP. V. VERS. 1.---Call now, if there be any that will answer thee. 76. What it is to call God, what for God to answer.---For the Almighty God often deserts the prayer of him in perturbation, who contemns His precepts in tranquility. Whence it is written: He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, his prayer shall be an abomination (Prov. 28:9). But our calling is to implore God with humble prayer; but God's answering is to afford the effect to the prayers. He says, therefore: Call, if there be any that will answer thee. As if he should say openly: However much afflicted thou mayest cry, thou hast not God answering, because the voice in tribulation does not find Him, whom the mind in tranquility contemned. Where still deriding he subjoins:

CHAPTER XLIV.

IBID.---And to which of the saints wilt thou turn? 77. As if he should say despisingly: Thou art not able to find even the saints as helpers in thy affliction, whom thou wouldst not have as companions in thy hilarity. Who after the derision immediately subjoins a sentence, saying:

CHAPTER XLV.

VERS. 2.---Anger killeth the foolish man, and envy slayeth the little one.

78. Eliphaz speaks truth, but not truly against Job. How great the fault of anger, how many the evils. ---Which sentence would indeed be true, if it had not been brought against the patience of so great a man. But let us consider what is said, even if it is repelled by the virtue of its hearer, that we may show how right is that which is brought forth, if it were not unjustly deserved against the blessed Job; since it is written: But Thou, O Lord, judgest with tranquillity (Wisd. XII, 18); we must greatly know that as often as we restrain the turbulent motions of the mind under the virtue of meekness, we endeavor to return to the likeness of our Creator. For when anger lashes the tranquillity of the mind, it disturbs it, being in a manner torn and rent, so that it does not agree with itself, and loses the force of its inward likeness. We should consider, therefore, how great is the fault of anger, through which, while meekness is lost, the likeness of the heavenly image is corrupted. Through anger wisdom is lost, so that it is not known at all what is to be done or in what order, as it is written: Anger resteth in the bosom of a fool (Eccles. VII, 10); because indeed it withdraws the light of understanding when it confounds the mind by moving it. Through anger life is lost, even if wisdom should seem to be held, as it is written: Anger destroyeth even the prudent (Prov. XV, 1, according to LXX); because, namely, the confounded mind by no means fulfills even if it is able to understand anything prudently. Through anger justice is forsaken, as it is written: The anger of man worketh not the justice of God (Jas. I, 20); because while the disturbed mind exasperates the judgment of its own reason, it thinks everything that fury suggests to be right. Through anger the grace of social life is lost, as it is written: Be not a constant companion with an angry man, lest thou learn his paths, and take a scandal to thy soul (Prov. XXII, 24, 25). And the same: Who shall be able to dwell with a man whose spirit is easy to be angry? (Prov. XVIII, 14.) Because he who does not temper himself from human reason, must of necessity live alone like a beast. Through anger concord is broken, as it is written: A passionate man stirreth up strifes. And an angry man diggeth up sins (Prov. XV, 18). For the angry man diggeth up sins, because he makes even the evil, whom he incautiously provokes to discord, worse. Through anger the light of truth is lost, as it is written: Let not the sun go down upon your anger (Eph. IV, 26); because when anger strikes the darkness of confusion upon the mind, God hides from it the ray of His knowledge. Through anger the splendor of the Holy Spirit is excluded; on the contrary, according to the old translation, it is written: Upon whom shall my spirit rest, but upon him that is humble and quiet and trembleth at my words? (Isa. LXVI, 2.) For when He said humble, He immediately added quiet. If therefore anger withdraws the quiet of the mind, it closes its habitation to the Holy Spirit, by whose departure the mind, being empty, is soon led to open madness, and is dissipated from the inward foundation of thoughts even to the surface.

79. The image of the angry man is expressed in the best colors. ---For the heart inflamed by the stings of its own anger palpitates, the body trembles, the tongue becomes impeded, the face catches fire, the eyes are exasperated, and acquaintances are by no means recognized.

With the mouth indeed he forms a cry, but the sense ignores what he speaks. In what, then, is he far from those who are possessed, who is not conscious of his own action? Whence it happens for the most part that anger leaps even to the hands, and as reason recedes further, it rises more boldly; and the mind is not able to restrain itself, because it has become of another's power; and fury exercises the limbs abroad in blows, where within it holds captive the mind itself, the mistress of the limbs. Sometimes, however, it does not put forth the hands, but turns the tongue into a dart of malediction. For he demands the destruction of a brother by prayers, and seeks to have God perpetrate that which he himself, perverse man, either fears or is ashamed to do. And it happens that he performs homicide by wish and voice, even when he ceases from the injury of a neighbor with his hands. Sometimes anger, when the mind is disturbed, as if from judgment indicates silence; and the more it does not express itself abroad through the tongue, it catches fire within more grievously, so that every angry man withdraws his speech from his neighbor, and by saying nothing, says how much he is turned away. And sometimes this severity of silence is carried on through the dispensation of discipline, if only the form of discretion is carefully held in the inner parts. Sometimes indeed, while the inflamed mind is restrained from accustomed speech, by the approach of time it is separated entirely from the love of the neighbor, and sharper stings come to the mind, and causes which more heavily exasperate arise; and in the eye of the angry man a mote is turned into a beam, while anger is changed into hatred. For the most part anger closed within the mind through silence seethes more vehemently, and silent it forms loud voices; it objects words to itself by which it may be exasperated, and as if placed in the examination of a cause, it responds more harshly exasperated; which Solomon briefly intimates, saying: The expectation of the wicked is fury (Prov. XI, 23). And so it happens that the disturbed mind feels the greater noise of its own silence, and the flame of closed anger consumes it more heavily. Whence well before us a certain wise man said: The thoughts of the angry man are viperous generations, they eat the mind their mother.

80. Four degrees by which we are affected by anger. ---But it is to be known that anger inflames some more quickly, and leaves them more easily. But some it moves slowly indeed, but holds them longer. For some, like ignited reeds, while they make a noise with voices, give forth as it were certain sounds of their own ignition; they indeed make a flame more quickly, but immediately cool into ashes. But others, not unlike heavier and harder wood, receive ignition slowly, but nevertheless once ignited are extinguished with more difficulty; and because they more slowly excite themselves into harshness, they keep the fire of their fury longer. But others, which is more wicked, both receive the flames of anger more quickly and lay them down more slowly. But some both receive them slowly and lose them more quickly. In which four ways, indeed, the reader clearly recognizes that the last approaches more to the good of tranquillity than the first, and the third surpasses the second in evil. But what does it profit that we say how anger holds the mind, if we do not also express how it ought to be restrained?

81. Two modes of restraining anger. ---For in two ways anger, being broken, becomes unaccustomed to possess the mind. The first indeed is, that the mind should be solicitous before it begins to do anything, and propose to itself all the contumelies which it can suffer, that meditating on the reproaches of its Redeemer, it may prepare itself for adversities. Which indeed coming, it receives the more strongly, as it has armed itself more cautiously by foreknowledge. For he who is caught unprovided by adversity, is found as it were sleeping by the enemy; and the enemy kills him more quickly, because he pierces one who does not resist. For he who prenotes imminent evils through solicitude, expects hostile incursions as if watching in ambush; and thence he is valiantly girded for victory, whence he was thought to be caught unknowing. Solicitously, therefore, the mind before the beginnings of its action ought to meditate on all adversities; that always thinking on these, always protected against these by the breastplate of patience, it may both providently overcome whatever shall happen, and whatever shall not happen it may count as gain. But the second mode of preserving meekness is, that when we behold the excesses of others, we should think on our own sins, in which we have exceeded in other things. For the consideration of our own infirmity excuses to us the evils of others. For he patiently bears an injury brought upon him, who piously remembers that perhaps he still has that in which he himself ought to be tolerated. And as if fire is extinguished by water, when fury rises in the mind, his own fault is recalled to the mind of each one, because he is ashamed not to spare sins, who remembers that he has often committed sins to be spared either by God or his neighbor.

82. One anger is from impatience, another from zeal. The first blinds the eye, the other so disturbs it as to dispose it to seeing more clearly. ---But among these it is to be wisely known that one is the anger which impatience excites, another which zeal forms. The former is generated from vice, the latter from virtue. For if no anger arose from virtue, Phinehas would not have appeased the impetus of divine animadversion by the sword. Because Eli did not have this anger, he excited the motion of heavenly vengeance implacablemente against himself. For in as much as he was lukewarm against the vices of his subjects, so much did the strictness of the eternal Rector burn against him. Of this it is said by the Psalmist: Be angry, and sin not (Psal. IV, 5). Which indeed they do not rightly understand, who wish us to be angry only with ourselves, and not also with our neighbors when they delinquent. For if we are commanded to love our neighbors as ourselves, it remains that we should be angry at their errors as at our own vices. Of this it is said by Solomon: Anger is better than laughter, because by the sadness of the countenance the mind of the delinquent is corrected (Eccles. VII, 4). Of this again the Psalmist says: My eye is disturbed through anger (Psal. VI, 8). For anger through vice blinds the eye of the mind, but anger through zeal disturbs it; because by that at least by which it is shaken by the emulation of what is right, that contemplation which cannot be perceived except by a tranquil heart is dissipated. For the very zeal of rectitude, because it agitates the mind with disquietude, soon obscures its sight, so that it does not see in commotion the higher things which it saw almost before when tranquil. But thence it is more subtly led back to high things, whence for a time, lest it should see, it is beaten back. For that emulation of eternal right opens more largely in tranquility after a little while those things which it meanwhile closes through commotion; and whence the mind is disturbed lest it see, thence it profits so that it may be clarified for seeing more truly: as when eye-salve is put into a sick eye, light is entirely denied; but thence it truly receives it after a little while, whence it salubriously loses it for a time. But never is contemplation joined to commotion, nor is the perturbed mind able to behold that which the tranquil mind is scarcely able to gape after, because neither is the ray of the sun seen when the moved clouds of heaven cover its face, nor does the disturbed fountain return the image of the beholder, which the tranquil one properly shows, because in as much as its wave palpitates, so much does it obscure the species of likeness in itself.

83. Caution must be taken lest anger, when moved from zeal, should dominate the mind. --- But when the mind is moved through zeal, it is to be taken care of above all things that this same anger, which is assumed as an instrument of virtue, should not dominate the mind, nor precede it as if a mistress, but as a handmaid ready for service, should never recede from the back of reason. For then it is more robustly raised against vices, when subject to reason it serves as a handmaid. For however much anger may arise from the zeal of rectitude, if immoderate it overcomes the mind, it immediately contemns to serve reason; and it dilates itself more impudently, the more it thinks the vice of impatience to be a virtue. Whence it is necessary that he who is moved by the zeal of rectitude should attend to this before all things, lest anger should pass outside the dominion of the mind, but in the vengeance of sin considering time and mode, he should restrain the rising perturbation of the soul by more subtle retractation, repress animosity, and dispose fervid motions under equity; so that he may become a more just avenger of another, by how much he first stood as his own victor, that he may so correct the faults of delinquents, as he who corrects may first grow through patience, and judge his own fervor by transcending it, lest being intemperately excited by the very zeal of rectitude, he should wander far from rectitude. Because indeed, as we have said, even the laudable emulation of a good mind disturbs the eye, it is now rightly said: Anger killeth the foolish man. As if it were openly said: Anger through zeal disturbs the wise, but anger through vice slays the foolish, because the former is restrained under reason, but the latter irrationally dominates the conquered mind. But well it is subjoined.

CHAPTER XLVI.

IBID.---And envy slayeth the little one.

84. The envious man by the very fact of his envying testifies that he is less than him whom he envies. ---For we are not able to envy except those whom we think in some way better than ourselves. He therefore is a little one who is slain by envy, because he gives testimony to himself that he is less than him by whose envy he is tortured. Hence it is that the crafty enemy stole upon the first man by envying him, because having lost beatitude, he recognized himself to be less than his immortality. Hence it is that Cain fell into the commission of fratricide (Gen. IV, 5-7); because his sacrifice being despised, he fretted that one was preferred to him whose host God accepted: and whom he abhorred to be better than himself, he cut off, lest he should be at all. Hence Esau burned to the persecution of his brother (Gen. XXV, 34; XXVII, 41), because having lost the blessing of the first-born, which nevertheless he himself had sold for a meal of lentils, he groaned that he was less than him whom he preceded in being born. Hence his brothers sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites passing by (Gen. XXXVII, 27, 28), because having known the mystery of revelation, lest he should become better than they, they endeavored to oppose his advancements. Hence Saul pursued David, his subject, by hurlnig a spear (I Sam. XVIII, 11), because he feared that he whom he felt to be increased daily with great successes of virtues, would grow beyond him. He therefore is a little one who is slain by envy, because unless he were himself inferior, he would not grieve at the good of another.

85. In envy the ancient serpent shakes and vomits all his poison. Description of the envious man. ---But among these things it is to be known that although through every vice which is perpetrated, the poison of the ancient enemy is infused into the human heart, yet in this wickedness the serpent shakes all his bowels, and vomits the pest of malice to be imprinted. Of which indeed it is written: By the envy of the devil death entered into the world (Wisd. II, 24). For when the rottenness of envy has corrupted the conquered heart, even the exterior parts indicate how heavily madness instigates the mind. For the color is affected with pallor, the eyes are depressed, the mind is inflamed, and the limbs freeze, there is madness in the thought, gnashing in the teeth; and when the growing hatred is hidden in the retreats of the heart, the enclosed wound pierces the conscience with blind pain. Nothing of his own pleases as joyful, because his own punishment wounds the wasting mind, which the felicity of another tortures; and by how much the fabric of another's work is led on high, by so much the foundation of the envious mind is dug deeper; so that where others hasten to better things, there he himself may fall more miserably; by which ruin indeed even that is destroyed which was thought to have risen as a perfect work in other acts. For envy when it has wasted the mind, consumes all the well-done things which it shall find. Whence it is well said by Solomon: Soundness of heart is the life of the flesh; but envy is the rottenness of the bones (Prov. XIV, 30). For what are signified by the flesh except certain weak and tender things; and what by the bones, except strong acts? And it for the most part happens that some with true innocence of heart seem weak in some of their acts; but some now exercise some robust things before human eyes, but nevertheless waste within by the pestilence of envy towards the goods of others. Well therefore is it said: Soundness of heart is the life of the flesh, because if the innocence of the mind is guarded, even if some things are weak without, they are sometimes strengthened. And rightly is it subjoined: Envy is the rottenness of the bones, because through the vice of envy even strong acts of virtues perish before the eyes of God. For the bones to rot through envy, is for certain robust things to perish.

86. The diminution and death of envy, is the beginning or perfect love of eternity. But why do we say these things about envy, if we do not also intimate how it may be rooted out? For it is difficult for a man not to envy another in that which the other desires to obtain; because whatever temporal thing is received, it becomes so much the less to each, as it is divided among many; and therefore envy tortures the mind of the desirer, because that which he reaches after, another either by receiving it entirely takes it away, or by its quantity restricts it. He, therefore, who desires to be fully free from the plague of envy, let him love that inheritance which the number of co-heirs does not straiten; which is both one to all, and whole to each; which is shown to be so much the more large, as the multitude of those who receive it is expanded. The diminution of envy, therefore, is the rising affection of internal sweetness; and the full death of it is the perfect love of eternity. For when the mind is withdrawn from the desire of that thing which is partitioned by the number of those who receive it, so much the more it loves its neighbor, as it less fears its own losses from his advancement. Which, if it is perfectly rapt in the love of the heavenly country, is also fully solidified in the love of its neighbor without any envy; because when it desires no earthly things, there is nothing that contradicts its charity toward its neighbor. Which charity, what else is it but the eye of the mind; which if it is touched by the dust of earthly love, is soon beaten back and hurt from the intuition of the internal light? Because, however, he is a little one who loves earthly things, and great who covets eternal things, it may also be thus not inconveniently understood: Envy slayeth the silly one, since no one dies by the languor of this plague, except him who is yet weak in his desires.

SECOND PART, CONTAINING FIVE BOOKS.

BOOK SIX.

The whole of the fifth chapter, beginning from the third verse, is explained in a spiritual sense, some few things allegorically, but the greater part morally.

CHAPTER I.

181. Job represents Christ and the Church, his friends represent heretics. I have proposed to discuss the words of blessed Job and his friends, preserving the truth of the history, by a mystical interpretation; because it is clear to all who know the truth that holy Scripture takes care to promise the Redeemer of the world in all its allegations, and studied to signify him through all the elect, as if through his members. Whence also the same blessed Job is called in the Latin eloquence 'grieving,' so that through both his name and his wounds, the passion of our Redeemer might be designated, of whom the prophet says: Surely he hath borne our infirmities, and carried our sorrows (Isa. 53:4). From whom the tempter, having taken away all things, slew both servants and sons; because he struck with the weapon of perfidy in the time of his passion not only the Jewish people serving out of fear, but also the apostles themselves regenerated in his love. The body of blessed Job is worn away by a wound, because our Redeemer did not disdain to be fixed with nails on the gibbet of the cross. But from the sole of the foot even to the crown of the head he received wounds, because the raging tempter afflicts the holy Church, which is his body, with persecution not only through the extreme and last, but even to the highest members. Whence also Paul said: I fill up those things which are wanting of the sufferings of Christ in my flesh (Col. 1:24). Whom his wife strives to persuade to curse, because all the carnal within the holy Church exist as crafty helpers of the tempter. For she who provokes him to curse, designates the life of the carnal; because, as we have already said above (Book III, c. 20, n. 36, 37), those placed within the holy Church with uncorrected morals, by as much as they are near to the good through faith, by so much the more hardly do they press them through their life. For because they cannot be avoided as if faithful, they are tolerated by the faithful so much the worse, as they are the more internal. But his friends, who come as if to console, but exceed in words of harsh invective, hold the type of heretics, who when they strive to defend God against the good, offend.

2. The spiritual senses which Gregory brings forth, proceed from the root of history. The words of Job's friends are by no means to be reprobated in all things. These things therefore spoken more largely above, I have now studied to gird up briefly from a mystical designation, so that my reader might remember from this very replication that in this work I serve the spiritual understanding. And yet when the use of utility demands, I also study to discuss the words of the history subtly. But when it is necessary, I embrace both at once, so that allegory may germinate spiritual fruits, which nevertheless the truth of history produces from the root. But the friends of blessed Job, whom we said held the type of heretics, we by no means reprobate in all things in their sayings, because while it is said against them through the supernal sentence: Ye have not spoken before me the thing that is right, and immediately it is subjoined, as my servant Job (Job 42:7), it is certainly clear that that is not entirely despised which is reprobated by comparison with the better. For they incautiously slide into his reprehension; but nevertheless because they are friends of so great a man, they learned many mystical things from his familiarity. Whence as we also said above (Book V, n. 27), Paul also uses their words, and assuming these in aid of his assertion, testifies that they were brought forth from the truth. Which truth nevertheless rightly reproves them, because however strong a sentence ought not to have been brought forth against a holy man. Mystically therefore the words of Eliphaz may be weighed, with which he speaks to blessed Job, saying:

CHAPTER II.

VERS. 3.---I saw the fool with a firm root, and I cursed his beauty immediately.

ALLEGORICAL SENSE. 3. The Jews are fools, even obnoxious to the malediction of heretics on account of the rejection of Christ. For the Jewish people stood as a foolish one, because it despised the very presence of eternal Wisdom in the flesh. Which as if with a firm root gained strength, because it overcame by extinguishing temporally the life of the elect. But Eliphaz despises this one by cursing, because surely all heretics, of whom we said the friends of blessed Job held the type, when they glory in the name of Christ, reprove the perfidy of the Jews by authority. Of which fool it is immediately subjoined:

CHAPTER III.

VERS. 4.---Let his children be far from safety, and let them be crushed in the gate, and there shall be none to deliver them.

4. All the perfidious are children of these. They are crushed in Christ, who is the gate. The children of this fool are all who are generated by the preaching of that perfidy. Who surely are far from safety, because even if they receive temporal life without affliction, they are struck more heavily with eternal vengeance, as the Lord says of these same children of his: Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves (Matt. 23:15). It follows: And let them be crushed in the gate, and there shall be none to deliver them. Who else ought to be understood by the name of 'gate,' but the Mediator of God and men, who says: I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved (John 10:9)? The children of this fool, therefore, advance outside the gate, and are crushed in the gate, because the depraved offspring of the Jews flourished in the observation of the Law before the advent of the Mediator; but in the very presence of our Redeemer they fell, repulsed from the service of the Divinity by the merits of their perfidy. Whom surely there is no one to deliver, because surely while they tried to extinguish the Redeemer himself by persecuting him, they cut off the remedies of deliverance offered to them; of which it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER IV.

VERS. 5.---Whose harvest the hungry shall eat, and the armed man shall seize him.

5. The Gentiles eat their harvest, that is, the sacred oracles, and seize their riches. For the harvest of this fool had been the crop of sacred speech. For certain grains of the ears are the words of the prophets, which the fool had, but did not eat, because the Jewish people held the Law indeed as far as the word, but through the fastidiousness of foolishness they fasted from its understanding. But the hungry man eats the harvest of this fool, because surely the Gentile people eats by understanding the words of the Law, at which the Jewish people labored without understanding. The Lord foresaw these hungry ones of the faith, when he said through the Evangelist: Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled (Matt. 5:6). Of these hungry ones it is said by Anna prophesying: They that were full before have hired out themselves for bread; and the hungry were satisfied (1 Sam. 2:5). But because he lost the harvest, it is rightly subjoined how the fool himself also perishes, when it is said: And the armed man shall seize him. Which surely Truth forewarns the disciples, saying: The hour cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service (John 16:2). It follows: The ancient enemy seized the Jewish people armed, because in it he extinguished the life of faith by the darts of fraudulent suggestion, so that from whence it believed itself to adhere to God, from thence it resisted his ordination.

CHAPTER V.

IBID.---And the thirsty shall drink up his riches.

6. The oracles of God are both a harvest and riches. In what way they are said both to be eaten and to be drunk. The thirsty drink up the riches of this fool, because the converted minds of the Gentiles are irrigated by the streams of sacred speech, which the Jewish people had possessed in the ostentation of pride. Whence also it is said to the same through the prophet: Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; and he that hath no money, come ye (Isa. 55:1). Because indeed by the name of 'money' the divine oracles are signified, the Psalmist testifies, saying: The words of the Lord are pure words: as silver tried in a furnace of earth (Ps. 12:6). They, therefore, who have no money, are called to the waters, because surely the Gentile world, which had not received the precepts of holy Scripture, is satiated by the inundation of sacred speech, which it now drinks so much the more greedily, as it had long thirsted for this dry. The same divine oracles, therefore, are called both harvests and riches: harvests, because they refresh the fasting mind; riches, because they compose us with great beauty of morals. The same are said both to be eaten and to be drunk, because surely while some things in them are obscure, which we do not understand except interpreted, these we swallow as if by chewing; while some things truly easy to be understood we take as we find them, these we drink as if not chewed, because we swallow them whole. We run through these things under a mystical understanding in a brief speech, lest by chance we should seem to have passed over anything. But because the friends of blessed Job could not be his friends, unless they also shone in certain things with great honesty of morals, it remains that we should inquire morally into the virtue of their senses in their words, that while the weight of their speech is discussed, of what doctrine they were, might be shown.

CHAPTER VI.

VERS. 3.---I saw the fool with a firm root, and I cursed his beauty immediately.

MORAL SENSE. 7. Those following earthly things seem in prosperity with a firm root. A fool is fixed in the earth as if with a firm root, because he is solidified in earthly love with all his desires. Whence also Cain is described as the first to have built a city in the earth (Gen. 4:17), so that it might be openly shown that he placed a foundation in the earth, who was an alien from the solidity of the heavenly country. A fool is lifted up as if with a firm root, when he is supported here with temporal prosperity; so that he may attain all that he desires, sustain no adversities, prevail without resistance against the weak, contradict those acting well with authority, and arrive at greater advantages always from a worse action, so that from whence he deserts the way of life, from thence for a time he may live more happy. But when the weak behold the wicked to flourish, they tremble; and being troubled in themselves by the prosperity of sinners, they waver within in the steps of the mind. Of whom surely the Psalmist took the person when he said: But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well-nigh slipped; for I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked (Ps. 73:2, 3).

8. The prudent despise their glory. Nor do they delay to condemn. But when the strong behold their glory, they immediately attend to what punishment follows after glory; and with a deep internal thought they despise that which the proud swell with without, with the pride of empty inflation. Well therefore is it said: I saw the fool with a firm root, and I cursed his beauty immediately. For to curse the beauty of a fool, is to judge his glory from considered damnation, because he is overwhelmed so much more atrociously in torments, as he is lifted up higher in sins; because that passes away which is extolled, that remains which is punished; because he who is honored in the way, will be condemned in the arrival; and he reaches as if through pleasant meadows to a prison, who through the prosperity of the present life tends to destruction. It is to be noted, however, that when he said he had cursed the beauty of the fool, he immediately added, 'immediately.' For it is the custom of the human and weak mind, that it is varied with the quality of those things which it looks upon. For often its judgment is led with the very appearance of the present thing, and according to that which it beholds, its intention and sense are formed. For very many, while they discern the glory of certain ones, are delighted with the sights of the same glory, and think it something great, and wish that they might deserve such things. But when they behold any glorious ones, either suddenly cast down, or perhaps even dying, because human glory in every way is nothing, they confess with a groan, so that they immediately say: Behold how nothing is man. Who surely would say this more rightly, if when they saw a man in glory, then thinking of his destruction, they had felt that passing power was nothing. For then human elation is to be weighed how nothing it is, when it lifts itself up above others by successes. Then it is to be considered with what course felicity flies away, when it prevails before human eyes as if permanent. For any weak ones are able to weigh in death itself that the glory of one about to die is nothing. For then even those detract from it, who follow and love this even unto death. Well therefore is it said: I saw the fool with a firm root, and I cursed his beauty immediately. As if he said openly: Against the beauty of a fool, I had no delay in cursing, because when I saw this, I also saw at once the following punishment. For I would not have cursed immediately, if any delight in that glory had held me; but I cursed without slowness, because beholding the punishments about to remain, I reprobated his power without hesitation. But because all the iniquitous the more they advance in this world, the more they draw with them to destruction, it is rightly subjoined: Let his children be far from safety. For the children of a fool are they who are born in the ambition of this world from his imitation; who surely become so much further from safety, as they are struck with no infirmity in the perpetration of iniquity. Of whom it is well added:

CHAPTER VII.

VERS. 4.---And let them be crushed in the gate, and there shall be none to deliver them.

9. The day of judgment is the gate of the kingdom. Then he who refused to be corrected here cannot be delivered. For as the approach to a city is called a gate; so is the day of judgment the gate of the kingdom, because through it an entrance is made by all the elect to the glory of the heavenly country. Whence also when Solomon beheld this day approaching to the retribution of holy Church, he said: Her husband is noble in the gates, when he sitteth among the senators of the land (Prov. 31:23). For the husband of the Church is the Redeemer of the human race, who shows himself noble in the gates, who before existed despised in contumelies, but will appear sublime in the entrance of the kingdom. Who resides with the senators of the land, because he will decree the sentence of judgment with the saints, the preachers of the same Church, as he himself says in the Gospel: Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his majesty, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. 19:28). Which Isaiah also foretelling long before says: The Lord will come to judgment with the ancients of his people (Isa. 3:14). Of these gates Solomon says again: Give her of the fruit of her hands; and let her own works praise her in the gates (Prov. 31:31). For then holy Church receives of the fruit of her hands, when the retribution of her labor lifts her up to perceive heavenly things. Then her works praise her in the gates, when it is said to her members in the very approach of the kingdom: I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: naked, and ye clothed me (Matt. 25:35), and the rest. The children of this fool, therefore, were lifted up before the gate, but they shall be crushed in the gate, because the lovers of this world are proud in the present life, but in the very approach of the kingdom they are struck with eternal animadversion. But it is well subjoined: And there shall be none to deliver them. For Truth delivers those from eternal adversity, whom he presses by discipline in temporal prosperities. He, therefore, who now refuses to be pressed, then cannot be delivered, because the iniquitous do not find him a deliverer by aid in the time of their affliction, whom they neglect to have as a father through discipline. It follows:

CHAPTER VIII.

VERS. 5.---Whose harvest the hungry shall eat.

10. The wicked man, understanding and saying right things, has a harvest which others may eat. The fool also has a harvest, when any iniquitous person receives the gift of right understanding: he is taught by the sentences of Holy Scripture, he speaks good things, but yet in no way does he work that which he says: he brings forth the words of God, yet does not love them; by praising he exaggerates them, by living he tramples them. Because therefore this fool both understands and says right things, but yet does not love them by working, he fasts while having a harvest. Which indeed the hungry man eats, because he who pants after God with holy desires, learns what he hears, and does what he has learned; and while he is refreshed by the right preaching of a wicked teacher, what else is it than that he is satisfied with the fruit of a fool? Did not Truth admonish his hungry ones, that they should eat the harvest of the fool, when to those burning with holy desires, he commanded concerning the Pharisees, saying: All things whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works (Matt. 23:3). As if he openly said: They cultivate the harvest of the word by speaking, but this they by no means touch by living ill. Let this harvest therefore refresh your hunger, because they keep this for you through the loathing of their own fatuity. But it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER IX.

IBID.---And the armed man shall seize him.

11. The devil often permits knowledge, that he may corrupt life. For the ancient enemy is overcome as if unarmed, when, openly suggesting evil things to the human mind, he endeavors to destroy all good things at once. But he comes armed, when, leaving some good things untouched, he secretly corrupts others. For often he does not tempt some in the understanding, and does not oppose them in the meditation of holy eloquence; but yet he supplants their life in operation, who, while they are praised for the virtue of knowledge, by no means regard the losses of their own works; and when the mind is led into the delight of favor, it does not heal the wounds of its own life. The armed enemy therefore has seized him, whom, covered with fraud, leaving him in some things, he has overcome in another part. It follows:

CHAPTER X.

IBID.---And the thirsty shall drink up his riches.

12. Often the dull person understands by studying in the erudition of the divine law, that which the ingenious one knows not through negligence. Often the fool has a fountain of internal liquor, but he does not drink, because he indeed receives the genius of understanding, but yet he contemns knowing the sentences of truth by reading; he knows that he might prevail in understanding by studying, but being fastidious he ceases from all study of doctrine. The riches of the mind also are the words of sacred locution; but the fool beholds these riches with his eyes, and by no means takes them for the use of his ornament, because hearing the words of the law, he considers them indeed to be great, but he labors with no study of love to comprehend them. But on the contrary, another has thirst, but has not genius; love draws him to meditate, but the dullness of his sense contradicts him; and often he understands that in the erudition of the divine law by studying at some time, which the ingenious person knows not through negligence. The thirsty, therefore, drink the riches of this fool, while the dull who love attain the precepts of God, which the fastidious ingenious know not. In these indeed the eye of love enlightens the darkness of dullness; for thirst opens that to the slower, which fastidiousness closes to the swifter. Who also therefore arrive at the heights of understanding, because they contemn none of the things which they have understood, even the least; and while they help their sense with their hands, they raise themselves beyond the height of the ingenious. Whence it is well said by Solomon: The stellio (lizard) stays itself with its hands, and dwelleth in kings' houses (Prov. 30:28). For for the most part birds, which their feather raises to flight, reside in briars; and the stellio, which has not feathers for flight, leaning on its hands, holds the edifice of the kingdom, because indeed often those who are ingenious, while they are torpid through negligence, remain in wicked acts, and the simple, whom the feather of genius does not help, the virtue of operation raises to obtain the walls of the eternal kingdom. The stellio therefore, while it stays itself with its hands, dwelleth in the king's houses, because the simple person arrives thither through the intention of right work, whither the ingenious person by no means ascends. But having heard these things, a question arises in our heart, why either the gift of understanding is bestowed on the negligent, or any studious person is hindered by the slowness of his own sense? To which it is more quickly answered, while it is immediately subjoined:

CHAPTER XI.

VERS. 6.---Nothing on earth is without cause.

13. Why genius is bestowed slow to study, but sharp to the negligent. For therefore often even the slothful receives genius, that he may be more justly punished for negligence, because he contemns knowing what he could have attained without labor. And therefore sometimes the studious person is pressed by slowness of understanding, that he may find so much greater rewards of retribution, by how much more he labors in the study of discovery. Nothing therefore is on earth without cause, when both slowness profits the studious for a reward, and quickness increases for the slothful unto punishment. But for understanding those things which are right, we are sometimes instructed by the study of labor, but sometimes by the pain of percussion (scourging). Whence when it had been said, Nothing on earth is without cause; it is aptly immediately added:

CHAPTER XII.

IBID.---And sorrow shall not spring out of the ground.

14. Through the secret merits of minds, open scourges of punishments go forth. For sorrow goes forth as if from the ground, when man, created in the image of God, is scourged by insensitive things. But because through the secret merits of minds, open scourges of punishments go forth, sorrow does not spring from the ground, because the malice of our sense requires that it be struck by insensitive things. For behold, we see that for our correction the expected rain is withheld from the parched earth, and the misty air is dried up by the burning sun; the sea rages with swelling storms, and intercepts some who have been taken up to pass over, and opposes the desired journey to others by the wave raised up into a heap; the earth not only diminishes the germs of fecundity, but even consumes the seeds received. In all which indeed is plainly beheld that which a certain wise man testifies concerning the Lord, saying: And the whole world shall fight with him against the unwise (Wisd. 5:21). For the world of the earth fights with the Lord against the unwise, when the adversity of the elements also militates in the punishment of the delinquent. But yet sorrow does not spring from the ground, because any insensitive thing whatsoever is excited to our affliction by the stimulus of our action. Sorrow does not spring from the ground, because by no means does punishment arise from that creature which strikes, but without doubt from that which by sinning extorted the force of the percussion. But we must take great care that when we are affected with the weight of sorrow in exterior things, we may tend by hope to the things above; so that the mind may arrive thither at the heights, whither the exterior punishment chastens us. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XIII.

VERS. 7.---Man is born to labor, and the bird to flight.

15. As much as the flesh is affected by scourges, the mind is raised to higher things. For man is born to labor because indeed he who is endowed with received reason, considers that it is very impossible for him to escape these times of his pilgrimage (peregrinatio) without a groan. Whence well Paul, when he enumerated his tribulations to his disciples, added: For yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto (1 Thess. 3:3). But in that the flesh is affected by scourges, the mind is raised to desire higher things; Paul again testifying, who says: For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day (2 Cor. 4:16). Man, therefore, is born to labor, and the bird to flight, because the mind flies away to the highest things from thence, whence the flesh labors more hardly in the lowest things.

16. The heavy labor of the carnal, none of the spiritual. The life of the carnal can also be signified by the appellation of man. Whence also Paul says: For whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal? (1 Cor. 3:3.) To whom a little after he subjoined, saying: Are ye not men? (Ibid., 4.) In this life, therefore, man is born to labor, because every carnal person, when he desires transitory things, afflicts himself with the weight of his own desires. For it is a heavy labor, to seek this very glory of the present life, to perceive it at some time when sought, and when perceived to guard it with circumspection (circumspectio). It is a heavy labor, to apprehend that with great fatigue, which he who shall apprehend it knows cannot stand long. But holy men, because they do not love transitory things, not only tolerate no weights of temporal desires; but even if any adverse things arise, they do not labor in those very pressures and languors of theirs. For what is harder than scourges? and yet concerning the scourged apostles it is written: They departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for the name of Jesus (Acts 5:41). What labor, therefore, is there to their minds, to whom even the punishment of stripes is not labor? Man, therefore, is born to labor, because he truly feels the evils of this world, who gapingly desires its goods. For whose mind is suspended to high things, whatever is moved against it from without is beneath it. Well therefore is subjoined, And the bird to flight. Because by so much the mind subtends itself from the affliction of labor, by how much it raises itself through hope to the highest things. Had not Paul been born, as it were a bird, to flight, who sustaining so many adverse things said: Our conversation (conduct) is in heaven (Phil. 3:20)? And again: For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (2 Cor. 5:1). As a bird, therefore, he had transcended the lowest things, whom, while yet lingering in the body on earth, the feather of hope already raised to the heights. But because no one by his own strength is able to raise himself to the heights, so that when he is afflicted with visible things, he may be raised to invisible things, it is rightly soon subjoined:

CHAPTER XIV.

VERS. 8.---Wherefore I will pray to the Lord, and to God I will set my speech.

17. This is the gift of God. As if he plainly said: I entreat Him, by whom I know these things are bestowed. For if he believed that he had this of himself, he would not need to pray to God. It follows:

CHAPTER XV.

VERS. 9.---Who doeth great things and unsearchable and wonderful things without number.

18. The wonderful works of God have become cheap to human eyes by usage. Who may suffice to search out the wonderful things of Almighty God, that He created all things from nothing, that the very fabric of the world was disposed by the wonderful power of His strength, and the heaven is suspended above the air, and the earth is balanced above the abyss; that all this universe exists from invisible and visible things, that He made man, as I might so say, gathering in brief another world, but a rational one; that constituting him of soul and flesh, by an unsearchable disposition of power He mingled spirit and clay (lutum)? Of these things, therefore, some we know, and some we are; but yet we neglect to wonder, because those things which are wonderful by incomprehensible investigation, have become cheap to human eyes by usage. Whence it comes to pass that if a dead man be raised, all leap out into admiration, and daily man who was not is born, and no one wonders, when without doubt it is clear to all that it is more to be created what was not, than to be repaired what was. Because the dry rod of Aaron flourished, all wondered; daily a tree is produced from the parched earth, and the virtue of dust is turned into wood, and no one wonders. Because five thousand men were satisfied with five loaves, all wondered that the foods increased in their teeth; daily the scattered grains of seeds are multiplied in the fullness of ears, and no one wonders. Beholding water once changed into wine all wondered; daily the moisture of the earth attracted into the root of the vine, is turned into wine through the cluster, and no one wonders. Wonderful therefore are all things which men neglect to wonder at, because, as we said before, they are torpid for considering them by usage. But well when he said: Who doeth great things, he immediately added: And unsearchable. For it had been less to do great things, if yet those things which were done could have been searched out. But it is rightly subjoined: And wonderful things without number, because it would be of less magnitude, if those unsearchable things which He created had been few.

19. The miracles of God are to be considered by study, not discussed by the intellect. Where faith wavers, how it is to be strengthened. Whence the resurrection becomes credible. But among these things it is to be known that divine miracles ought both always to be considered by study, and never to be discussed by the intellect. For often the human sense, while seeking the reason of certain things and not finding it, plunges itself into the whirlpool of doubt. Whence it comes to pass that some men consider the bodies of the dead reduced to dust; and while they cannot collect the force of the resurrection from reason, they despair that these can return to their former state. Wonderful things, therefore, are to be believed from faith, they are not to be searched out through reason; because if reason expanded these to our eyes, they would not be wonderful. But when perhaps the mind wavers in these things, it is necessary that it should bring back to memory those things which it knows by usage, and yet does not collect by reason; so that by the argument of a similar thing it may strengthen the faith which it finds to be shaken by its own sagacity. For having considered the dust of human flesh, the shaken mind of some despairs, as to when dust may return to flesh, and compose the revived body through the lineaments of the members; when that aridity of the earth may grow green through living members, and distinguish itself through their species and forms. This indeed cannot be comprehended by reason, but yet it can easily be believed by an example. For who would believe that an immense tree should rise from one grain of seed, unless he held this certain by experiment? For in such great smallness of one grain and almost no dissimilarity of itself, where lies hid the hardness of the wood, and the pith softer or harder than the wood, the roughness of the bark, the greenness of the root, the savor of the fruits, the sweetness of the odors, the diversity of colors, the softness of the leaves? And yet because we know this by experiment, we do not doubt that all things proceed from one grain of seed. What therefore is difficult, that dust should return to members, while we daily behold the power of the Creator, who both wonderfully creates woods from a grain, and yet more wonderfully fruits from woods? Let him say therefore: Who doeth great things and unsearchable, and wonderful things without number, because the magnitude of divine works can neither be discussed from quality, nor numbered from quantity. Whence also it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER XVI.

VERS. 10, 11.---Who giveth rain upon the face of the earth, and watereth all things with waters. Who setteth up on high those that be low, and lifteth up those that mourn with safety.

MYSTIC SENSE.---20. God waters all things with the waters of grace. Man is signified by the name of the universe. Because we believe the friends of blessed Job to have been instructed by his society, it is necessary that we discuss these words of Eliphaz mystically. For Almighty God bestows rain on the earth, when He pours the grace of heavenly preaching into the parched hearts of the Gentiles. And He waters all things with waters, because He forms the sterility of lost man to fruitfulness by the filling of the Spirit, as Truth says by Himself: But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst (John 4:13). But man is signified by the name of the universe, because in him is shown the true species and great communion of the universe. For everything that is, either is and does not live; or is and lives, but by no means feels; or is and lives and feels, but does not understand nor discern; or is and lives and feels and understands and discerns. For there are stones, yet they do not live. There are shrubs, they live indeed, yet they do not feel. For the life of herbs and trees is called greenness, as it is said by Paul concerning seeds: Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die (1 Cor. 15:36). There are brute animals, they live and feel, yet they do not understand. There are angels, and they live and feel, and discern by understanding. Man therefore, because he has it in common to be with stones, to live with trees, to feel with animals, to discern with angels, is rightly expressed by the name of the universe, in whom according to something the universe itself is held. Whence also Truth says to the disciples: Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature (Mark 16:15). Namely, He willed man alone to be understood as every creature, to whom He created something common with all things.

21. God waters all things, when He calls from every kind of men to His knowledge. Although in this place "all things" can be understood otherwise also. For the grace of the Holy Spirit, when it subjects the rich to itself, does not repel the poor; when it humbles the strong, it does not refuse the weak to come to it; when it collects the noble, it at the same time apprehends the ignoble; when it receives the wise, it does not contemn the foolishness of the unskilful. God therefore waters all things with waters, who by the gift of the Holy Spirit calls from every kind of men to His knowledge.

22. God waters all things, because He forms the force of His word in individuals according to the diversity of characters. But the very dissimilarities of characters can be designated by the name of "all things". For one is lifted up by elation, another is inclined by the weight of fear, another boils with lust, another pants with avarice, another casts himself down by remissness, another boils with anger. But through the doctrine of holy eloquence, while humility is bestowed on the proud, confidence is provided to the fearful, the luxurious is cleansed from uncleanness by the study of chastity, the avaricious is tempered from the heat of ambition by continence, the remiss is raised up by the rectitude of zeal (zelus), the wrathful is restrained from the excitement of his precipitation, God waters all things with waters; because He forms the force of His word in individuals according to the diversity of characters, so that everyone may find that in His eloquence, through which he may bear the germ of necessary virtue. Whence it is said by a certain wise man concerning the sweetness of manna: Thou didst provide them bread from heaven prepared without labor, having in itself all delight, and the sweetness of every taste (Wisd. 16:20). For the manna had in itself all delight and the sweetness of every taste, in that namely in the mouth of the spiritual, it gave a taste according to the will of those eating, because the divine word both congruous to all, and not discrepant from itself, condescends to the quality of the hearers; which while every elect person profitably understands according to his own measure, he as it were turns the received manna into a voluntary taste. And because the glory of retribution follows the labor of a good work, after the watering of the waters it is rightly subjoined: Who setteth up on high those that be low, and lifteth up those that mourn with safety.

[Vet. VIII, Rec. X.] 23. Glory and joy will receive the servants of God, now despised and afflicted.--- The humble are set up on high, because those who are now despised for the love of God, then come as judges with God, just as that which we have already said a little before, Truth promises to the same humble ones, saying: You who have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the seat of his majesty, you also shall sit upon twelve seats, judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. 19:28). Then the Lord lifts up those that mourn with safety (sospitate), because those who, kindled by His desires, flee prosperity, suffer adversity, tolerate the tortures of persecutors, and chastise themselves through lamentations, receive then a safety so much the more sublime, as they now devoutly die to all the joys of the world. For hence it is that it is said by Solomon: The heart that knoweth the bitterness of its own soul, in its joy a stranger shall not intermeddle (Prov. 14:10). For the human mind knows the bitterness of its soul when, kindled by desires for the eternal country, it acknowledges the penalty of its pilgrimage by weeping; but in its joy a stranger shall not intermeddle, because he who is now a stranger to the sorrow of compunction, is not then a partaker in the gladness of consolation. Hence it is that in the Gospel Truth says: Amen, amen, I say to you, that you shall lament and weep, but the world shall rejoice; and you shall be made sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy (John 16:20). And again: You now therefore have sorrow, but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man shall take from you (Ibid. 22). Therefore the Lord is said to lift up those that mourn with safety, because He consoles with true salvation those afflicted temporally for His sake. Which, however, nothing prevents from being understood concerning the elect of God even in this life.

24. The humble are already set up on high from this life.--- The humble are indeed set up on high, because when they submit themselves out of humility, by the judgment of a high mind they pass beyond all temporal things; and when they estimate themselves as unworthy in all things, by the examination of right thought they transcend and tread upon the glory of this world. Let us see the humble Paul. Behold, he says to the disciples:

For we preach not ourselves, but Jesus Christ our Lord; and ourselves your servants through Christ (2 Cor. 4:5). Let us see this humble man already set up on high. He says: Know you not that we shall judge angels (1 Cor. 6:3)? And again: He hath raised us up together, and hath made us sit together in the heavenly places (Eph. 2:6). Perhaps a chain then bound him outwardly, yet in mind he had been set in high places, who already through the certitude of his hope sat in the heavenly places. Holy men therefore are despised outwardly, and tolerate all things as if unworthy; but trusting themselves to be worthy of the heavenly seats, they expect the glory of eternity with certitude; and while they labor outwardly in the adversity of persecution, they fly within to the fortified citadel of the mind; and from thence they look down upon all things passing under them, among which they also discern themselves passing away bodily; they fear not threats, because by suffering they contemn even torments. For hence it is said by Solomon: The just shall be as a confident lion without terror (Prov. 28:1). Hence it is written by him again: Whatsoever shall befall the just, it shall not make him sorrowful (Prov. 12:21). For because all the upright are situated on the high peak of their intention, while they do not feel death by dying, in a wonderful way the darts of the reprobate both strike them and do not touch them. The humble therefore are set up on high, because from whence they despise themselves in all things, from thence they become more secure against all things.

[Vet. IX, Rec. XI.] The mind, ceasing to long for the things that are above itself, falls incessantly beneath itself.--- On the contrary, it is rightly said to the reprobate mind under the figure of Babylon through the prophet: Come down, sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon, sit on the ground; there is no throne for the daughter of the Chaldeans (Isai. 47:1). For in this place the human mind is called a virgin, not as being incorrupt, as I suppose, but as being unfruitful. And because Babylon is interpreted "confusion", an unfruitful mind is rightly called the daughter of Babylon, which, in that it by no means brings forth good works, while it is composed by no order of right life, is as it were generated by confusion as its mother. But if she is called a virgin not as being unfruitful, but as being incorrupt, she is called what she was to the increase of her confusion after she has lost the state of salvation. To whom it is aptly said by way of rebuke by the divine voice: Come down. For the human mind stands on high when it longs for heavenly retributions; but it comes down from this state when, basely conquered, it subjects itself to the flowing desires of the world. To which is well added immediately: Sit in the dust. For descending, it resides in the dust, because deserting heavenly things, sprinkled with earthly thoughts it becomes vile in weak things. Where still by doubling it is subjoined: Sit on the ground. As if He should say openly by way of reproach: Because thou wouldst not lift up thyself in heavenly conversation, being prostrate beneath thyself be humbled in earthly acts. Whence also it is necessarily added immediately: There is no throne for the daughter of the Chaldeans. For "Chaldeans" is interpreted "ferocious". But they are exceedingly ferocious who, following their own wills, know not how to spare even their own deaths. Ferocious are earthly desires which, not only against the precepts of the Creator, but often even against the strokes of scourgings, render the mind hard and insensible. But the daughter of the ferocious has no throne, because the mind which is born for the love of the world from depraved desires, and is hardened by the same desires, in that it subjects itself to earthly concupiscences, loses the seat of judgment; and it presides over no throne within itself, because it lacks the examination of discretion, and is as it were repelled from the session of its own judgment, because it wanders through outward concupiscences. For it is clear that the mind which has lost the seat of counsel within, scatters itself abroad through innumerable desires. And because it dissembles to act upon things understood, it is rightly blinded, so that it even knows not what it does; and often by a just judgment it is left in its own very will, and is relaxed under those laborious ministries of the world which it anxiously seeks.

[Vet. X.] Whence it is aptly subjoined there: Because thou shalt no more be called soft and tender; take the millstone and grind flour (Ibid. 2). It is certainly certain that parents spare their tender daughter, nor do they afflict her with hard and servile works. Therefore Almighty God calls it as it were a tender daughter when He recalls the beloved soul of everyone from the laborious services of this world; lest while it is affected by outward acts, it should be hardened from inward desires. But the daughter of the Chaldeans is not called soft and tender; because the mind given up to depraved desires, in that which it anxiously seeks is left to the labor of this world, so that it may serve the world as a handmaid without, which within by no means loves God as a daughter. Whence also she is commanded to take the millstone and grind flour. The millstone is turned in a circle, and flour is brought forth. But every action of this world is a millstone, which while it heaps up many cares, turns human minds as it were in a circle; and from itself it throws out as it were flour, because with a seduced heart, it always begets the smallest thoughts.

[Vet. XI.] But sometimes he who is believed to be of some merit while quiet, being placed in any action is stripped; whence it is subjoined there immediately: Uncover thy nakedness, discover thy shoulder, reveal thy legs, pass over the rivers (Ibid. 2). For in the administration of work turpitude is uncovered, while a vile and abject mind is known in the ostentation of action, which before when quiet was thought to be great. The mind discovers its shoulder when it shows its work which was unknown. It reveals its legs because it manifests with what steps of desires it longs for the gains of the world. It also passes over the rivers, because it incessantly seeks the actions of this world, which daily flow down to an end; and while it leaves some, it follows others, as if it always tended from river to river. These things we have said in a few words by way of digression, that we might show where the mind lies when shaken from the throne of holy intention; because if it shall cease to long for the things that are above itself, it falls incessantly even beneath itself. But it is fixed on high if, deserting the love of temporal things, it is bound to the hope of immutable eternity.

26. The joy of the servants of God is true; the joy of the iniquitous is from insanity, not from safety.--- Well therefore is it said: Who setteth up on high those that be low. And aptly is subjoined: And lifteth up those that mourn with safety. Often in this world even any joyful persons are lifted up, while they swell with the very glory of their prosperity. But the Lord lifts up those that mourn with safety, because He raises up His afflicted ones to the glory of true joy with solidity. For they are lifted up with safety, not with insanity, who being placed in good acts, rejoice with a firm hope in God. For some, as we have said, both perpetrate iniquities, and cease not to rejoice; concerning whom it is said by Solomon: Who are glad when they have done evil, and rejoice in most wicked things (Prov. 2:14). And again: There are wicked men, who are so secure as if they had the deeds of the just (Eccles. 8:14). These certainly are not lifted up with safety, but with insanity, who are proud when they ought to have been afflicted; and from thence the miserable ones flow down in exultation, from whence they are wept for by the good. Being namely similar to the senses of phrenetics, they think the insanity in which they prevail to be virtue; who know not that this which they can do more than the healthy is from disease; and they estimate that they have as it were increased in strength, while they approach the end of life through the increases of languor. Who because they have not the sense of reason, are wept for, and they laugh; and they so much expand themselves in great exultation, as they being insensible are ignorant of the evil which they suffer. Therefore the Lord lifts up those that mourn with safety, because the mind of the elect does not become cheerful from the insanity of the present life, but from the certitude of eternal salvation. Whence aptly is soon subjoined concerning this very destruction of the wicked:

CHAPTER XVII.

VERSE 12.---Who dissipateth the thoughts of the malignant, so that their hands cannot accomplish what they had begun.

27. The thoughts of the wicked are often vain, but their conscience is no less guilty.--- The minds of the reprobate always keep watch over perverse thoughts, but for the most part heavenly dispensation meets them; and although they do not correct the depravity of their counsel even when broken by adversities, yet He restrains their strength, lest they should prevail against the good. Against whom it is acted by a wonderful judgment, so that they lack indeed the effect of the evil work, and yet He adjudges them guilty of conscience to the just sentence of the Judge. In that therefore they think evil things, they show what they themselves would do; but in that they cannot fulfill the evil things, those against whom they had thought them are defended. Whence also it is still well subjoined:

CHAPTER XVIII.

VERSE 13.---Who catcheth the wise in their own craftiness, and dissipateth the counsels of the wicked.

28. Those resisting the counsels of God serve them against their will. It is shown by the examples of the brothers of Joseph, of Saul, of Jonah, and of the Jews.--- For often some, puffed up with human wisdom, when they see the divine judgments contrary to their desires, try to resist them with crafty machinations; and that they may twist the force of heavenly dispensation to their own wish, they persist in cunning thoughts and seek out more subtle counsels; but from thence they fulfill the will of God, from whence they strive to change it; and they obey the counsel of Almighty God while they strive to resist it, because often even that which resulteth frivolously against Him through human zeal, aptly militates for His disposition. Therefore the Lord catcheth the wise in their very craftiness, when human deeds congruously serve His counsels even then when they resist. Which we show better if we bring forward a few examples of things done.

[Vet. XII.] 29. Joseph had seen a dream, that the sheaves of his brothers bowed down to his sheaf (Gen. 37:7); he had seen a dream, that the sun and moon with the rest of the stars adored him. Because he related these things purely to his brothers, envy and fear of his future dominion immediately struck their hearts. And when they saw him coming to them, with raging malice they said: Behold, that dreamer cometh; come, let us kill him, and let us see what his dreams will profit him (Ibid. 20). And when they feared to be subjected to his dominion, they put the dreamer down into a pit, and sold him to the passing Ishmaelites: who, being led into Egypt, subjected to servitude, condemned on an accusation of luxury, aided by the merit of chastity, and raised up by the judgment of prophecy, was set over all Egypt; and being provident through heavenly wisdom, he collected corn and met the future danger of necessity. And when famine rushed upon the world, Jacob, anxious about the preparation of food, sent his sons into Egypt: who unknowingly find Joseph set over the dispensation of the corn, and that they might deserve to receive food, they were compelled to adore their dispenser with necks prone to the earth. Let us consider therefore the order of the thing done, let us consider how the divine power catcheth the wise in their own craftiness. For this reason Joseph had been sold by them, lest he should be adored; but for this reason he was adored, because he was sold. For they dared to do something craftily, that the counsel of God might be changed; but they served by resisting the divine judgment which they tried to decline. For from thence they were compelled to fulfill the will of God, from whence they labored craftily to change it. Thus the divine counsel is fulfilled while it is avoided; thus human wisdom is caught while it struggles. The brothers feared lest Joseph should grow up over them; but by taking precautions it was brought about that that should happen which had been divinely disposed. Human wisdom therefore was caught in itself, which from whence it resisted the will of God through intention, from thence it militated for its fulfillment.

[Vet. XIII.] 30. Thus Saul, when he saw David his subject increasing by a daily success of virtues, promised him his daughter in marriage, and asked for her dowry that a hundred foreskins of the Philistines should be given by him, so that when the challenged soldier sought to increase beyond himself, he might end his life being delivered to the swords of his enemies, as it is written: The king hath no need of any dowry, but only a hundred foreskins of the Philistines, that he may be avenged of the king's enemies (1 Sam. 18:25). Moreover Saul thought to deliver David into the hands of the Philistines; but David, strengthened by the favor of the inward disposition, offered to give a hundred, and brought back two hundred foreskins. By the proof of which work Saul being certainly overcome, was caught by heavenly providence in the counsel of his own wisdom; because from whence he believed that he should

31. But because sometimes even the elect strive to be wise craftily, it is pleasing to bring forward another wise man, and to demonstrate how the craftiness of mortals is caught in inward counsels. For Jonah indeed wished to be prudently wise, when, being sent to preach repentance to the Ninevites, because he feared Judea would be deserted if the Gentiles were elected, he refused to fulfill the office of preaching (Jonah 1:2, 3, etc.). He sought a ship and chose to flee to Tarshish; but immediately a storm arises, the lot is cast, so that namely it might be known by whose fault the sea was troubled. Jonah is discovered in fault, he is plunged into the deep, swallowed by a devouring whale, and he arrives there, carried by the beast, where he spontaneously contemned to go. Behold, the storm finds the fugitive of God, the lot binds him, the sea receives him, the beast encloses him, and because he struggles against obeying his Author, he is carried, a guilty prisoner, in his own prison to the place to which he had been sent. At the command of God the man would not minister the prophecy; at the inspiration of God the beast vomits the prophet. Therefore the Lord catcheth the wise in their own craftiness, when He reduces even that to the use of His own will, through which the human will contradicts Him.

32. Let us still scrutinize the wisdom of the Hebrews, that we may see what it prohibited by providing, and what it provoked by prohibiting.

Certainly when a crowd of believers flocked to the miracles of our Redeemer, when the priests of the people, kindled with the torches of envy, proclaimed that the world went after Him, saying: Do you see that we prevail nothing? behold, the whole world is gone after him (John 12:19); that they might cut off from Him the force of such a great concourse, they tried to end His power by death, saying: It is expedient for us that one man should die, and that the whole nation perish not (John 11:50). But the death of the Redeemer availed for the joining of His body, that is, the Church, not for its separation. Whence also through the law it is commanded that the throat of a turtledove or a pigeon, in the figure of our sacrifice, be cut and not entirely severed, so that even after death the head remains attached to the body (Lev. 1:15); because namely the Mediator of God and men (1 Tim. 2:5), that is, the Head of us all, and the victim of true cleansing, from whence He suffered death for us, from thence He more truly adhered to us. After the cutting, therefore, the head of the turtledove remains attached to its body, because not even intervening death divides Christ from the Church. The persecutors therefore accomplished that which they perniciously labored at; they brought death, that they might cut off from Him the devotion of the faithful; but from thence faith increased, from whence the cruelty of the infidels believed that they extinguished it. And while they estimate that they cut off His miracles by persecuting, they were certainly compelled, unknowingly, to dilate them. Therefore the Lord catcheth the wise in their own craftiness, when He reduces even that to the obedience of His piety, which human cruelty kindled against Him.

33. God grants some things propitiously, others He permits in anger.--- For the Just and Merciful One, disposing the acts of mortals, grants some things propitiously, others He permits in anger; and those things which He permits, He so tolerates that He turns them to the use of His own counsel. [Vet. XIV.] Whence in a wonderful way it comes to pass that even what is done without the will of God, is not contrary to the will of God, because while evil deeds are turned to a good use, even those things which repugn His counsel militate for His counsel. For hence it is said by the Psalmist: The works of the Lord are great, sought out according to all His wills (Psal. 110:2). For so His works are great, that through everything which is done by men, His will is sought out. For often from thence it is perfected, from whence it was thought to be repelled. Hence again it is said: All things whatsoever the Lord willed, He did in heaven and in earth (Psal. 134:6). Hence Solomon says: There is no wisdom, there is no prudence, there is no counsel against the Lord (Prov. 21:30). It remains, therefore, that in all things which we do, we should inquire for the force of the heavenly will, to which namely, when known, our action ought devoutly to serve, and to follow it as the leader of its journey, lest it should serve Him even unwillingly, if being proud it declines it. For the force of the heavenly counsel can by no means be avoided; but he tempers it to himself with great virtue, who restrains himself under His nods; and he lightens its weights to himself, who carries it willingly on the subjected shoulder of the heart. But because we made mention of persecutors above, let us show how even those things which are subjoined agree with their blindness. It follows:

CHAPTER XIX.

VERSE 14.---They shall meet with darkness in the day time, and grope in the noon day as in the night.

34. The persecutors of Christ suffered darkness in the day. And as if blind they groped in the noon day.--- They met with darkness in the day time, because in the very presence of Truth they were blinded by the error of perfidy. For clearly it is seen through the day, but through the night our sight is obscured. Therefore the persecutors of our Redeemer, while they discerned the miracles of divine power, and yet doubted concerning His divinity, suffered darkness in the day, because they lost their sight in the light. Hence it is that Light itself admonishes them, saying: Walk while you have the light, lest darkness come upon you (John 12:35). Hence it is that it is said of Judea: Her sun is gone down while it was yet day (Jer. 15:9). Hence it is that the prophet again took upon himself the voice of the penitent, saying: We have stumbled at noon day as in darkness; in dark places as dead men (Isai. 59:10). Hence again he says: Watchman, what of the night? watchman, what of the night? The watchman said: The morning cometh, and also the night (Isai. 21:11, 12). For from the night the watchman came, because the Protector of the human race appeared and was manifest in the flesh, and yet Judea, oppressed by the darkness of its own perfidy, by no means acknowledged Him. Where it is well added from the voice of the watchman: The morning cometh, and also the night, because through His presence both a new light shone upon the world, and yet in the heart of the infidels the ancient blindness remained. [Vet. XV.] But it is well said: Groping in the noon day as in the night. For we seek that by groping, which we do not see with our eyes. But the Jews had seen His open miracles, and they still sought Him as it were by groping, when they said: How long dost thou hold our soul in suspense? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly (John 10:24). Behold, the light of miracles was present before their eyes, and yet stumbling in the darkness of their own heart, they still groped by inquiring. Whose blindness certainly kindled into cruelty, and their cruelty even unto open works of persecution. But the Redeemer of the human race could not long be held by the hands of His persecutors. Whence also it is immediately subjoined:

CHAPTER XX.

VERSE 15.---But he shall save the needy from the sword of their mouth, and the poor from the hand of the violent.

Christ overcame the tongues of the Jews and the sword of the Gentiles by rising again.--- For he himself is that poor man, of whom it is said by Paul: For our sakes he became needy, when he was rich. And because the Jews delivered up the Lord by accusing Him, whom when delivered the Gentiles killed, the tongue of the accusing Hebrews can be signified by the sword of the mouth, of whom it is said by the Psalmist: The sons of men, whose teeth are weapons and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword (Psal. 56:5); because the Gospel also being witness they cried out: Crucify him, crucify him (Luke 23:21). But by the hand of the violent, the crucifying Gentility itself can be expressed, which in the death of the Redeemer fulfilled the voices of the Hebrews by work. God therefore saved this poor man both from the hand of the violent, and from the sword of the mouth; because namely our Redeemer both bore the strength of the Gentiles and the tongues of the Jews by dying out of His humanity, but overcame them by rising again out of the power of His divinity. By which resurrection what else is done, but that our weakness should be strengthened to the hope of the life following? Whence also it is well subjoined soon:

CHAPTER XXI.

VERSE 16.---And there shall be hope for the needy.

36. He solidified the hope of His own.--- The poor man being snatched away indeed, the needy is restored to hope, because the humble people of the faithful is shaken with fear when the Redeemer dies, but is solidified when He rises again. For his death, being seen, struck those first poor ones of this people, namely the elect preachers, but his resurrection, being shown, repaired them. The poor man being saved, therefore, the needy receives hope, because when the Lord rises again in the flesh, every faithful one recovers strength to the confidence of eternal life. But behold, already Truth has come in manifest showing, already he has borne the death of the flesh and destroyed it by rising again, already he has honored the resurrection with the glory of the ascension; and yet the tongue of the Hebrews does not yet cease to provoke him with contumelies, whom he certainly tolerates with equanimity, so that by tolerating he may convert some, and eventually strike more strictly others by no means converted. For then the tongue of the infidels shall be silent from the unbridledness of its own loquacity, when it shall see him coming as a just judge, whom now it has judged unjustly. Whence also it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XXII.

IBID.---But iniquity shall stop her mouth.

37. The Jews shall cease from contumelies against Christ.--- For even now iniquity still dilates its mouth, because the tongue of the infidels by no means ceases to provoke the Redeemer of the human race with contumelies. But then it shall contract its mouth, when it shall close by punishment that which it does not wish to close by study. Which, however, can also be well understood concerning converted persecutors. For the poor man (pauper) being saved, while the needy (egenus) returns to hope, iniquity is silenced with a contracted mouth, because as the miracle of His resurrection becomes clear, while a copious multitude of infidels believes, it has ceased from the injuries and contumelies of its Redeemer. For its mouth, which it opened by deriding God, it has now contracted by fearing Him.

MORAL SENSE.--- 38. The darkness of the envious and their anxious malice.--- It is pleasing to run through these things morally, the significance of the Jews being set aside, and to investigate from the wicked in general how they are acted upon. For the minds of iniquitous men, when they behold certain things well done by their neighbors, are tortured on the extended rack of their own envy (livor), and sustain a heavy penalty for their own malice, when they see good things in others while they themselves are wasting away. Rightly, therefore, is it said: They shall meet with darkness in the day-time, because their mind, when it is afflicted by the improvement of another, is obscured from the ray of light; because often in their neighbors, while they consider open good things, they investigate if any evil things lie hidden, and labor with solicitous inquiries, if by chance they may find anything which they can accuse. Indeed they behold sound members: but with the eyes of the heart closed, they seek by feeling for a wound. Whence also it is well subjoined: And they shall grope in the noon-day as in the night. The day of a good work shines outwardly in one's neighbor; but they grope as if in the night, because they tolerate within the darkness of their own envy. They busy themselves to arrive at some things which they may reprehend, they seek an entrance for detraction; but because they are not able to find this, being blind they go about outwardly. Which is well expressed when the Sodomites, the angels protecting him, did not find the door in the house of Lot, as it is written: They pressed very sore upon Lot, and it was already near that they should break the doors, and the men put forth their hand, and pulled Lot into the house to them, and shut to the door, and they smote the men that were at the door of the house with blindness, both small and great, so that they could not find the door (Gen. 19:9-11). What is it that, while the wicked are opposing, Lot is led back within the house and fortified, except that every just man, while he sustains the snares of the wicked, returns to his mind and remains undaunted? But the men of Sodom are unable to find the door in the house of Lot, because the corrupters of minds find no entrance of accusation against the life of the just man. For being struck with blindness they go about as if around the house, who being envious scrutinize deeds and words. But because a strong and laudable action meets them on every side from the life of the just man, wandering they feel nothing else than the wall. Well therefore is it said: And they shall grope in the noon-day as in the night, because while they are unable to accuse the good which they see, being blinded by malice, they seek the evil which they do not see for accusation.

39. Delight or terror draws us to fault; neither avails against the humble.--- Where also it is rightly subjoined: But he shall save the poor from the sword of their mouth, and from the hand of the violent. For he is poor (pauper), whosoever is not elated within himself. Whence also through the Gospel Truth says: Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 5:3). Moreover, each one is drawn to fault in two ways. For either he is led by delight, or he is overcome by terror. For the sword of the mouth is the iniquity of persuasion, but the hand of the violent is the adversity of power. But because the truly humble, who in this place is called poor, in that he desires no prosperous things of this world, by so much he even boldly contemns adverse things, it is rightly said: He shall save the poor from the sword of their mouth and from the hand of the violent. As if it were openly said: God so solidifies the minds of the humble in Himself, that neither the blandishments of persuasions draw them to the perpetration of iniquity, nor the pains of punishments break them. For hope into eternity raises the mind, and therefore it feels no evils which it tolerates outwardly. Whence also it is subjoined: And there shall be hope for the needy. To the fruit of which hope, namely, when the poor man shall have arrived, every elated one is silenced. Whence also it is still subjoined: But iniquity shall stop her mouth. For now the wicked man detracts from the good, and does not cease to tear by slandering those right things which he neglects to do in others. But then iniquity stops its mouth, when it recognizes how great glory of retribution is supplied to the just. For then it is not free for it to speak against the good, because torments bind the tongue for the worthy retribution of its own evils. Whence well, Anna prophesying, it is said: He will keep the feet of his saints, and the wicked shall be silent in darkness (1 Sam. 2:9). But that every elect one may escape eternal punishments, and the poor man may ascend to perennial glory, he ought to be worn down here by assiduous scourges (flagella), so that he may be able to be found purged in the judgment. For by the very weight of our infirmity we are led downwards daily, unless we are raised up by the wonderful hand of the Artificer through subvening scourges. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIII.

VERS. 17.---Blessed is the man whom God correcteth.

40. Every elect one ought to be worn down here by assiduous scourges (flagella).--- The first virtue is to avoid sins, lest they ought to be perpetrated; the second, however, at least to correct those perpetrated. But for the most part we not only by no means avoid imminent faults, but indeed we do not even recognize those committed. And the mind of the sinner becomes dark so much the more deeply, as it does not even understand the loss of its own blindness. Whence it happens for the most part by the largess of the divine gift, that punishment follows fault, and scourges open the eyes of the delinquent, which security was blinding among vices. For the torpid soul is touched by a stroke, that it may be excited; so that he who, being secure, lost the state of his rectitude, being afflicted may consider where he lies. Hence, therefore, the very asperity of correction becomes the origin of light. Whence also through Paul it is said: All things that are reproved are made manifest by the light (Eph. 5:13), for the proof of salvation is the force of pain. Hence it is, forsooth, that Solomon says: Medicine shall cause the greatest sins to cease (Eccl. 10:4). Hence again he says: For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth (Heb. 12:6). As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten (Rev. 3:19). Hence Paul says: Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby (Heb. 12:11). Although therefore pain and blessedness cannot agree together at once, yet it is rightly said now, Blessed is the man whom God correcteth; because by this, that the sinner is pressed by the pain of correction, he is eventually instructed unto blessedness, which is without the intervention of pain. It follows:

VERS. 17, 18.---Therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Lord; for he maketh sore, and bindeth up; he woundeth, and his hands make whole.

41. Here also from hope he returns to fear.--- Holy Scripture speaks to our minds as to a certain sick man; to whom the medicines of physicians cannot be, unless they have been tempered from contraries. For cold things temper a hot sick man, and again hot things help a cold one. So holy eloquence, that it may oppose the vices of sinners, proposes now hope, now fear; so that it may raise this one by hope, and depress that one by fear; and through each contrary it may temper one cup of salvation for the mind, so that it may neither fall into presumption by the confidence of hope, nor turn into despair by the weight of fear. Hence it is, forsooth, that as was said a little before, Blessed is the man whom God correcteth; by which the minds of those fearing are raised; so immediately it is subjoined, Therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Lord. For because he is blessed who is corrected, it is greatly to be feared lest any one should depart from that very blessedness of correction. Whence also it is well added: For he maketh sore, and bindeth up; he woundeth, and his hands make whole. Because if the stroke did not cut off the fault, surely it would not prepare a remedy for the mind. He strikes therefore that he may heal, he wounds that he may bind up; because one goes to spiritual health through the pains of the flesh; and while scourges rage without, the remedies of medicines grow strong within.

VERS. 19.---He shall deliver thee in six troubles; yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee.

42. He delivers in six scourges, who keeps from faults; in the seventh evil does not touch, because one returns no further to fault.--- What is expressed by the number six except the course of the present life? which namely is terminated through six ages, that is, infancy, childhood, adolescence, youth, gravity (middle age), and old age, as if through the spaces of six days. In which six troubles truly we are delivered by the Lord, if we are kept by divine grace from the single sins with which each age is instructed. For infancy is rude and simple, but still obnoxious to the vices of the flesh; childhood is light and unstable; adolescence is fervid and precipitate; youth is grave and proud; gravity is elated and rigid; old age is tremulous and querulous. In all these, forsooth, as if in six troubles, we are delivered by the Lord, if in each age, divine grace helping us, he presents us clean from iniquity. But in the seventh evil does not touch us; because when after this course of six days we shall have come to that seventh rest, in which namely we also rest from our labors, as God rests from His works, no adversity then hangs over us there, no temptation touches us, no iniquity defiles us, but being blessed in eternal purity, we are secure from the scourge and from fault. In the seventh therefore evil does not touch us, because in eternal rest we do not feel the sword of correction, who further have no spot of sins. It follows:

VERS. 20.---In famine he shall redeem thee from death; and in war from the power of the sword.

43. From the death of famine, he who delivers from the lack of good work; from the hand of the sword in war, he who delivers from the ferocity of temptation.--- What is designated in this place by the name of famine, except the lack of good works? What indeed by the word of war, except temptation itself? Therefore from death by famine we are delivered, when we are snatched from that very lack of works, lest we die for ever. But in war from the hand of the sword we are saved, when in the very fight of temptation, divine grace protecting us, we are kept lest we be wounded by the wickedness of sin. Death by famine, and the hand of the sword by war, can also be designated otherwise. For we die of famine when we lack the food of the word of God. Whence also it is said through the prophet: I will send a famine in the land; not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the word of the Lord (Amos 8:11). He therefore who by no means understands the word of God, truly he dies of famine. But in famine we are redeemed from death, if we are called by grace to the food of divine eloquence for our quickening. But in war we are saved from the hand of the sword; because while this world rages against us through temptations, we are not drawn away by the ferocity of the temptation itself. For by the hand of the sword the power of temptation is expressed. In war therefore we are delivered from the hand of the sword, if in the very contest of temptation we are snatched from the snares of the adversary. It follows:

VERS. 21.---Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue; neither shalt thou be afraid of calamity when it cometh.

44. He is hid from the scourge of the tongue, who is delivered from the elation of pride.--- The scourge of the tongue is the very asperity of contumely and detraction. Which by no means strikes us, if the shield of our humility receives it within. For whosoever is elated, is quickly struck by the scourge of the tongue, because he believes that to be true, which is said of him by the angry or the malevolent. But he who is fortified by the virtue of humility, is hid from the scourge of the tongue; because since he casts himself down below all things, he does not believe what is said; since he is not ignorant that he is inwardly this very thing, which is said by detractors. For the proud man, who believes good things of himself, does not receive evil things of himself; but the humble man, who believes evil things of himself, does not receive good things of himself; because from this he truly beholds himself, which he sees in himself, not from that which another speaks in him by detracting or by flattering. From the scourge of the tongue therefore he is hid, who is truly humbled within. It follows:

VERS. 22.---At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh; neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth.

45. He shall laugh at the destruction of the world and famine, who rejoices in the hope of his own retribution.--- What is expressed by destruction (vastitas), except the ruin of this world; what by the name of famine, except that very lack of good work which we predicted before? He therefore shall laugh at destruction and famine, who rejoices in the hope of his own retribution; because when the world perishes, he arrives at that fatherland towards which he tends through love. And when sinners fail through the lack of good works, he congratulates himself on his own abundance, because he here brought forth fruit through good works, which he may be able to reap there without end. Whence also it is said: Neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth. What do we understand by the beasts of the earth, except the unclean spirits, who for the ferocity of their wickedness and the voracity of their malice are rightly designated by the name of beasts? Who are called beasts of the earth, because for the merit of their sin, they have been cast down into this darkness of the world as if into the lowest parts of the earth. He therefore does not fear the beasts of the earth, who sighs for the love of the heavenly fatherland; because the unclean spirits by no means draw him to wickedness, whom no earthly desires ensnare. For he who covets nothing earthly, has nothing at all whereby the unclean spirit may occupy him. It follows:

VERS. 23.---For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field; and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee.

46. Each elect one is a stone of the region.--- Who are designated by the name of stones, except all the elect? Concerning whom it is said by Peter: Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house (1 Pet. 2:5). But what are the regions, except the diverse virtues? In which regions namely all the elect are stones, who then are not extraneous one to another, but each one is a native of the other's region, when he wonders at that virtue in him as in his own region, with which he himself does not shine, but the other is distinguished. A stone therefore has a league with the stones of the regions, because through each virtue every elect one venerates in another that which he loves. And the beasts of the earth become peaceful to him; because when the malignant spirits by no means draw him to wickedness, they make him peaceful in himself, as if by not impugning him. Or certainly the beasts of the earth become peaceful to him; because while the flesh no longer fights against the spirit, then the very ferocity of its irrational motion becomes tame for him. It follows:

VERS. 24.---And thou shalt know that thy tabernacle shall be in peace; and thou shalt visit thy beauty (species), and shalt not sin.

47. He has peace in his tabernacle, who does not disagree within himself.--- He enjoys peace in his tabernacle, who is divided within himself by no contradiction of mind and flesh. For our body is a tabernacle; as also it is said by Paul: For we know that if our earthly house of this habitation be dissolved, we have a building of God (2 Cor. 5:1). And again: For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened (Ibid., 4). Peace therefore the tabernacle enjoys, when the flesh agrees with the spirit, when it does not agitate worldly appetites, when it does not rebel against its own reason by any perturbation of illicit desire. Whence also it is rightly subjoined: And visiting thy beauty, thou shalt not sin. For who is he, who does not corrupt his own beauty by sinning, except he who fortifies himself by visiting himself daily? For we visit our beauty, when we see ourselves within through consideration. And when visiting ourselves, we behold what we are within, we run back to the state of rectitude of the mind through penitence; so that we may not defile by sinning in anything that beauty, which God created in us after His own image. For we keep our beauty by not sinning, if we cleanse it by assidueously visiting it. For he who neglects himself, degenerates from that beauty which he received after the image of God; because while he desires carnal goods, he stains it with the pollution of foul pleasure. But as that which is seen is called beauty (species), so the very intention of the heart is called the beauty of the mind, through which it is seen internally by our Creator. We visit therefore our beauty, when we vigilantly behold our intention. Which beauty we then visiting do not sin, if we recall it to that cleanness, through which it is discerned by the supernal Judge. Rightly therefore it is said: And visiting thy beauty, thou shalt not sin. Because he who, always visiting, despises himself, he cleanses himself through penitence after the image of his Creator. And as he who sees his face in a mirror, is wont to wipe away the filths in it, if he has detected any; so he who visits the beauty of his mind, then endeavors to extinguish the filths of iniquity, lest he defile it by sinning. It follows:

VERS. 25.---Thou shalt know also that thy seed shall be manifold, and thine offspring as the grass of the earth.

48. Manifold seed, multiplied good works.---Seed in sacred Scripture is taken now as the word of preaching, now as the fruit of pious operation, now as carnal offspring. For the word of preaching is called seed; as in the Gospel Truth says: A sower went out to sow his seed (Luke 8:5). Moreover, the operation of pious largess is called seed; as Paul says: He that ministereth seed to the sower both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed (2 Cor. 9:10). But carnal offspring is called seed; as it is written in the Law: If a brother shall die without children, let his brother take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother (Deut. 25:5; Matt. 22:24). But in this place for the seed to be multiplied, is to abound in good works. But the offspring is called as the grass of the earth, when spiritual thought is produced from our body as grass from the earth. And then seed is held manifold, and offspring grows as the grass of the earth, when from the good seed of action, the grass of spiritual thought buds forth. It follows:

VERS. 26.---Thou shalt come to thy grave in abundance, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season.

49. Grave, eternal rest; shock of corn, the assembly of the saints.--- By the name of the grave, in this place, not the pit of a ditch, but eternal rest is designated. Moreover, to enter the grave in abundance, is to arrive at that rest after good works. But the shock of corn is the assembly itself of the saints, which is gathered from this floor of the world to the rest of the heavenly barn. Which is said to be brought in in its season, because each elect one, when he is led to rest after this life, is gathered in his own season, that is, when it is congruous for him. For not all come to eternal rest at one time, but each one when he makes an end to this life, then in his own season is carried as a shock of corn into the barn. But it is to be noted, what is said: Like as a shock of corn cometh in. For on the floor the corn is threshed, that it may be cleansed from the chaff; and so it is carried into the barn as if purged. So also all the elect, in this present life as if on a floor, are threshed by the strokes of scourges, that they may be cleansed here from the chaff of their sins; so that they may be led there to that rest as if already clean. It follows:

IBID.---And the beasts of the earth shall be at peace with thee.

51. The sharper the snares of the enemy, the more they compel us to ask for the aid of grace. ---It is first to be noted that he does not say "quieted" (pacatae), but "peace-making" (pacificae), namely, not because they have peace, but because they make peace. For cunning enemies, while they lie in wait, cause affliction; but the afflicted mind loves the return to its eternal country all the more, the more laboriously it lives in this miserable exile; and it humbles itself more truly to the grace of its Helper when it weighs the sharper snares of the enemies against itself. Therefore, the beasts of the earth become peace-making to the elect, because the evil spirits, when in their opposition they depress the hearts of the good, impel them, though unwillingly, to the love of the Lord. Hence, therefore, a stronger peace with God arises from the source whence a harder battle is generated for us by our adversaries.

[Old Edition XXII.] 52. The motions of the flesh roar in tempting, but they do not reach as far as the bite. On the contrary, they procure peace for us with God. ---The motions of the flesh (motus carnis) can also be understood by the beasts of the earth, which, while they harass our mind by suggesting irrational things, rise up against us like beasts. But when the heart is brought low under the divine law, the incentives of the flesh also subside; so that even if they murmur in tempting, they by no means rise up as far as the effect of works, as if to the madness of an open bite. For who, still subsisting in this corruptible flesh, fully tames these beasts of the earth, when that eminent preacher, caught up to the third heaven, says: I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members (Rom. 7:23)? But it is one thing to see these beasts raging in the field of work, another to hold them roaring within the cave of the heart. For when reduced within the barriers of continence (claustra continentiae), even if they still roar in tempting, they do not, as we have said, exceed as far as the bite of an unlawful action. The beasts of the earth are therefore peace-making, because although the motions of the flesh throb through desires, they nevertheless do not assail us with the open contradiction of work. Although, by the very fact that they are called peace-making, even that which we said concerning the evil spirits is not inappropriately received. For the motions of the flesh make peace for us with God when they contradict us by tempting. For the mind of the just man, in that it is directed toward heavenly things, is fatigued by a heavy war from the corruptible body. If this mind is at any time delayed from heavenly desires by any delight of this world, however small, it is impelled by the very war of its temptation to love that with its whole heart which no contradiction disturbs. Whence it happens that it recalls inward rest (quietis intimae) to memory, and fleeing the allurements of its flesh, sighs for that rest with full love. For everyone is compelled to consider by temptation whence and whither he fell, who, after he deserted the peace of God, feels a strife arise against himself from within himself, and then more truly sees what he lost from the secure love of God, who, having slipped down into himself, finds his own reproach in himself. The beasts of the earth therefore make peace for us, because the motions of the flesh, while they harass us by tempting, impel us to the love of inward rest. But it is well added:

[Old Edition XXIII.]

VERS. 24.---And thou shalt know that thy tabernacle is in peace.

205 53. In the Scriptures, full peace and commenced peace. ---In Holy Scripture, "full peace" (pax plena) is spoken of in one way, and "commenced peace" (pax inchoata) in another. For Truth had given commenced peace to the disciples when He said: Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you (John 14:27); and Simeon had desired full peace when he prayed, saying: Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word (Luke 2:29). For our peace is commenced from the desire for the Creator, but it is perfected from the manifest vision. For it will then be full, when our mind is neither blinded by ignorance nor shaken by the assault of its own flesh. But because we touch upon its beginnings when we subjugate either the mind to God or the flesh to the mind, the tabernacle of the just man is said to have peace, because, namely, his body, which the mind inhabits, is restrained from the perverse motions of desires under the disposition of justice. But what does it profit to restrain the flesh through continence, if the mind knows not how to expand itself through compassion in the love of the neighbor? For there is no chastity of the flesh which the sweetness of the mind (suavitas mentis) does not commend. Whence, after the peace of the tabernacle, it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXV

IBID.---And visiting thy likeness, thou shalt not sin.

54. Let each one think of and love himself in another. Paul made all things to all men by condescending, not by falling. --- For the likeness (species) of a man is another man. For our neighbor is rightly called our likeness, because in him we discern what we ourselves are. For by a bodily visitation we go to our neighbor by the approach of steps; but by a spiritual one, we are led not by a step, but by affection. He therefore visits his own likeness, whosoever tends by the paces of love toward him whom he beholds similar to himself by nature; so that considering his own things in another, he may gather from himself how he should condescend to another who is weak. He visits his own likeness, who, that he may refresh another in himself, weighs himself in another. For hence Truth, when describing things done through Moses, signified things to be done, saying: The earth brought forth the green herb and yielding seed after its kind, and the tree yielding fruit, and having each one seed according to its likeness (Gen. 1:12). For the tree produces seed according to its likeness, when our mind gathers consideration from itself into another, and brings forth the germ of a right work. Hence a certain wise man says: What thou wouldst not have done to thyself, do not thou to another (Tob. 4:16). Hence in the Gospel the Lord says: Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them (Matt. 7:12). As if He said openly: Visit your own likeness in another, and know from yourselves what you ought to exhibit to others. Hence Paul says: I became to the Jews as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; and to them that are under the law, as if I were under the law, when I myself was not under the law, that I might gain them that were under the law; and to them that are without the law, as if I were without the law, when I was not without the law of God, but was in the law of Christ (1 Cor. 9:20, 21). And a little after: I am made all things to all men, that I might save all (Ibid. v. 22). For neither did the eminent preacher, that he might become as it were a Jew, break out into perfidy; nor that he might be as it were under the law, did he return to fleshly sacrifice; nor that he might become all things to all men, did he change the simplicity of his mind into a variety of error; but by condescending he approached the unfaithful, not by falling; that namely, taking up individuals in himself, and transfiguring himself into individuals, he might gather by compassion, if he himself were so as they were, what he would have rightly wished to be bestowed upon himself by others; and he might run to meet each one erring so much the more truly, as he had learned the manner of his salvation from his own consideration. Well therefore is it said: And visiting thy likeness thou shalt not sin, because then sin is fully conquered, when each one weighs from his own similarity how he may be expanded in the love of his neighbor. But when the flesh is restrained from vices, and the mind is exercised in virtues, it remains that each one should teach by speaking the life which he keeps in his conduct. [Old Edition XXIV.] For he gathers abundant fruits of preaching, who sends before the seeds of good operation. Whence, after the peace of the tabernacle, and the visitation of our likeness, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVI

VERS. 25.---And thou shalt know that thy seed shall be manifold, and thy offspring as the grass of the earth.

55. The seed of the just is manifold. ---For after the peace of the tabernacle, after the visitation of our likeness, the manifold seed of the just man arises, because surely after the maceration of the members and the greatness of conduct, the word of preaching is bestowed upon him so much the more fruitfully as this is preceded in his breast by the furrowing of a perfect work. For he receives the eloquence of speaking well who extends the bosom of his heart through the studies of living rightly. Nor does conscience hinder the speaker when life precedes the tongue. Hence it is that the Egyptians, subjected to public service under the stewardship of Joseph (Gen. 47:20 sqq.), when they humble themselves by handing themselves over to the law of the king, also carry back grain for seed. For we receive grain for eating even as free men, when we are fed by the sacred eloquence and yet wander after certain things which we desire in this world in our pleasures. But having been made servants, we receive grain also for seed, because while we are fully subjected to God, we are also filled with the word of preaching. And since a great offspring of the faithful follows when holy preaching is dispensed, after the multiplicity of the seed it is rightly subjoined: And thy offspring as the grass of the earth. The offspring of the just man is compared to the grass of the earth, because he who is born from his imitation, while he deserts the withered glory of the present life, grows green in hope for eternal things. Or certainly, the offspring of the just man arises like grass, because while he shows by living what he asserts by preaching, an innumerable multitude of followers rises up. But whosoever now despises earthly desires, whosoever extends himself through the works of the active life, it is by no means sufficient for him to do great things outwardly, unless he is also able to penetrate internal things through contemplation. Whence also it is aptly subjoined immediately:

[Recent Edition XVII.]

VERS. 26.---Thou shalt enter into the sepulchre in abundance, like as a shock of corn cometh in in its season.

56. He who has subdued the flesh ought to be free for contemplation. And he who gives labor to preaching. ---For what is signified by the name of "sepulchre" but the contemplative life, which buries us as if dead to this world, while it hides those it has received from earthly desires in the inmost parts? For they had been dead to the outward life and also buried through contemplation to whom Paul said: For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God (Col. 3:3). [Old Edition XXV.] The active life also is a sepulchre, because it covers us when dead to evil works; but the contemplative life buries us more perfectly, because it separates us fundamentally from all the actions of the world. Whosoever therefore has now subdued the reproaches of the flesh in himself, it remains that he should exercise his mind through the studies of holy operation; and whosoever now expands his mind through holy works, it remains that he should extend it even to the secret studies of inward contemplation. For he is not a perfect preacher who either neglects things to be done for the sake of the study of contemplation, or postpones things to be contemplated for the sake of the urgency of operation. For hence it is that Abraham buries his dead wife in a double sepulchre (Gen. 23:19); because surely every perfect preacher hides his soul, which is extinct to the desires of the present life, under the cover of good operation and contemplation, so that as if insensible to fleshly concupiscence, it may lie hid under the active and contemplative life, which soul, previously feeling the desires of the world, was living mortally. Hence it is that the Redeemer of the human race exhibits miracles in the cities by day, and passes the night in the study of prayer on the mountain, that He may surely hint to perfect preachers that they should neither fundamentally desert the active life for the love of speculation, nor thoroughly despise the joys of contemplation through excessive operation; but that while quiet they should drink in by contemplating what they should pour back while occupied in speaking for the benefit of their neighbors. For by speculating one rises into the love of God, but by preaching one returns to the utility of the neighbor. Whence in Moses, while the heifer is sacrificed (Num. 19:3), scarlet twice dyed is commanded to be offered with hyssop and cedar wood. For we sacrifice the heifer when we extinguish the flesh from the wantonness of its pleasure. Which we offer with hyssop and cedar wood and scarlet; because with the maceration of the flesh, we burn the sacrifice of faith, hope, and charity. For hyssop is accustomed to cleanse our internal parts. And it is said by Peter: Purifying their hearts by faith (Acts 15:9). Cedar wood does not fail through any rottenness, because the end does not consume the hope of heavenly things. Whence also it is said by Peter: He hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away (1 Pet. 1:3). Scarlet flames with a red color, because charity inflames him whom it fills. Whence also in the Gospel Truth says: I am come to send fire on the earth (Luke 12:49). But scarlet twice dyed is commanded to be offered, so that namely before the eyes of the internal Judge our charity may be colored with the love of God and of the neighbor; so that the converted mind may not so love rest for the love of God as to postpone the care and utility of the neighbor; nor so serve when occupied for the love of the neighbor as to fundamentally desert rest, and extinguish in itself the fire of supernal love. Whosoever therefore has already offered himself as a sacrifice to God, if he desires perfect things, he must necessarily take care that he extend himself not only to the breadth of operation, but also to the summits of contemplation.

[Old Edition XXVI.] 57. The active life is more suitable for some, the contemplative for others. Either one is to be cultivated according to each one's genius. ---But among these things it is greatly to be known that the temperaments (conspersiones) of minds are very different from one another. For some men are of such a leisurely mind that if the labor of occupation takes them up, they succumb at the very beginning of the work; and some are so restless that if they have a vacation from labor, they labor more heavily, because they tolerate so much worse tumults of the heart the more freely they are at leisure for thoughts. Whence it is necessary that neither should the quiet mind expand itself to the exercise of immoderate work, nor should the restless mind narrow itself to the study of contemplation. For often those who were able to contemplate God in quiet have fallen when pressed by occupations; and often those who would live well for human uses when occupied have been extinguished by the sword of their own quiet. For hence it is that some restless spirits, while they seek out more by contemplating than they can grasp, break out even to perverse dogmas; and while they humbly neglect to be disciples of truth, they become masters of errors. Hence Truth says through Itself: If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee. It is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire (Matt. 5:29). For the two lives, namely the active and the contemplative, when they are preserved in the mind, are held as two eyes in the face. For the right eye is the contemplative life, and the left is the active. But there are some, as we have said, who can by no means discretely behold supreme and spiritual things, and yet they take up the heights of contemplation, and therefore they slip into the pit of perfidy (perfidiae foveam) through the error of a perverse intellect. These, therefore, the contemplative life taken up beyond their strength compels to fall from the truth, whom the active life alone could have humbly guarded in the state of their rectitude. To whom rightly Truth says what we have prefaced: If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee. It is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire. As if He said openly: When thou dost not suffice for the contemplative life with suitable discretion, keep the active life alone more securely. And when thou failest in this which thou choosest as great, be content with that which thou regardest as least; so that if by the contemplative life thou art compelled to fall from the knowledge of truth, thou mayest be able at least one-eyed (luscus) to enter the kingdom of heaven through the active life alone. Hence again He says: *Whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone (mola asinaria) were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea* (Matt. 18:6). What is signified by the sea but the present world; what by the millstone but earthly action? Which, while it binds the neck of the mind through foolish desires, sends it into the circuit of labor. There are therefore some who, while they desert earthly actions and rise beyond the strength of their intelligence to the studies of contemplation, having postponed humility, not only cast themselves into error but also divide all the weak from the bosom of unity (gremio unitatis). He therefore who offends one of the least, it had been better for him, with a millstone tied to his neck, to be cast into the sea; because surely it could have been more expedient for a perverse mind to perform earthly business occupied with the world than to be at leisure for the destruction of many through the studies of contemplation. Again, unless the contemplative life were more suitable for certain minds than the active, the Lord would by no means say through the Psalmist: Be still, and see that I am God (Ps. 46:10).

[Old Edition XXVII.] 58. The power of fear and love for contemplation. ---But among these things it is to be known that often love excites sluggish minds to work, and fear restrains restless ones in contemplation. For the weight of fear is the anchor of the heart; and for the most part it is shaken by the flood of thoughts, but it is held fast by the bonds of its own discipline; nor does the tempest of its restlessness draw it to shipwreck, because on the shore of divine love perfect charity binds it. Whence it is necessary that whosoever hastens to the studies of contemplation should first subtly question himself as to how much he loves. For the engine (machina) of the mind is the force of love, which while it draws it out from the world, lifts it on high. Let him therefore first discuss whether in seeking the highest things he loves, whether in loving he fears, whether he knows how either to comprehend unknown things by loving, or to venerate things not comprehended by fearing. For in contemplation, if love does not excite the mind, the torpor of its own lukewarmness obscures it; if fear does not weigh it down, its sense lifts it through vanities to the cloud of error; and when the closed door of secrets is opened to it more slowly, it is repelled further from it by its own presumption; because it desires to break into that which it seeks without finding; and when the proud mind perceives error for truth, where it reaches its step as if inward, it tends outward. For hence it is that the Lord, about to give the law, descended in fire and smoke (Exod. 19:18); because He both illuminates the humble by the clarity of His showing, and obscures the eyes of the proud by the mist of error. Therefore the mind is first to be wiped clean from the appetite for temporal glory, and from all delight of fleshly concupiscence, and then to be raised to the sharpness of contemplation. Whence also when the law is received, the people are prohibited from the mountain, so that namely those who still desire earthly things with weak minds may not presume to consider sublime things. Whence also it is rightly said: If a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned (Ibid. v. 12, 13). For a beast touches the mountain when a mind subjected to irrational desires raises itself to the heights of contemplation. But it is struck with stones, because not sustaining the highest things, it is killed by the very strokes of the supernal weight.

59. What perfection is necessary to attain it. ---Those therefore who strive to apprehend the summit of perfection, when they desire to hold the citadel of contemplation, let them first prove themselves in the field of work by exercise, that they may carefully know if they now inflict no evils on their neighbors, if they bear with equanimity evils inflicted by their neighbors, if when temporal goods are presented the mind is by no means dissolved by joy, if when they are taken away it is not wounded by excessive sorrow; and then let them weigh whether when they return within to themselves, in that they search out spiritual things, they by no means draw with them the shadows of corporal things, or perhaps drive away those drawn with the hand of discretion; if desiring to see the uncircumscribed light (incircumscriptum lumen), they suppress all the images of their own circumscription; and in that they desire to touch what is above them, they conquer what they are. [Old Edition XXVIII.] Whence it is now rightly said: Thou shalt enter into the sepulchre in abundance. For the perfect man enters the sepulchre in abundance, because he first gathers the works of the active life, and afterwards fundamentally hides from this world the sense of the flesh made dead through contemplation. Whence also it is aptly subjoined: Like as a shock of corn cometh in in its season (Ibid.).

60. Action ought to precede contemplation. ---For the time of action is first, that of contemplation is last. Whence it is necessary that every perfect man should first exercise his mind in virtues, and afterwards store it in the barn (horreum) of rest. For hence it is that he from whom the legion of demons departed at the Lord's command sits at the feet of his Savior, receives the words of doctrine, and desires to depart from his region together with the Author of salvation; but yet Truth itself, which bestowed salvation, says to him: Return first to thine own house, and show how great things God hath done unto thee (Luke 8:35-39). For when we receive however small a portion of divine knowledge, we no longer wish to return to human things, and we refuse to be burdened with the necessities of our neighbors; we seek the rest of contemplation, and we love nothing else but this which refreshes without labor. But Truth sends us when healed to our house, and commands us to tell what things have been done with us, so that namely the mind should first sweat in work, and afterwards ought to be refreshed through contemplation.

[Recent Edition XVIII.] 61. Rachel and Leah, Mary and Martha, are figures of contemplation and action. Great are the merits of the active life, but those of the contemplative are better. ---Hence it is that Jacob serves for Rachel, and receives Leah, and it is said to him: It is not the custom in our land to give the younger in marriage before the elder (Gen. 29:26, 27). For Rachel is called "the sight of the principle" (visum principium); but Leah is called "laborious." And what is designated by Rachel but the contemplative life, and what by Leah but the active? For in contemplation the Principle, which is God, is sought; but in operation one labors under a heavy bundle of necessities. Whence also Rachel is beautiful but sterile; Leah is blear-eyed (lippa) but fruitful; because surely when the mind seeks the leisure of contemplating, it sees more, but generates fewer sons for God; but when it directs itself to the labor of preaching, it sees less, but brings forth more abundantly. Therefore after the embraces of Leah, Jacob comes to Rachel, because every perfect man is first joined to the fecundity of the active life, and afterwards is coupled to the rest of the contemplative life. For that the contemplative life is indeed shorter in time, but greater in merit than the active, is shown by the words of the Holy Gospel, in which two women are related to have done different things. For Mary, hearing the words of our Redeemer, sat at His feet; but Martha was busy about corporal ministries. And when Martha complained against the leisure of Mary, she heard: Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things. But one thing is needful. Mary hath chosen the best part, which shall not be taken away from her (Luke 10:41, 42). For what is expressed by Mary, who sitting heard the words of the Lord, but the contemplative life? What is signified by Martha occupied in outward services but the active life? But the care of Martha is not reproved, but that of Mary is even praised, because great are the merits of the active life, but those of the contemplative are better. Whence also the part of Mary is said never to be taken away, because the works of the active life pass away with the body, but the joys of the contemplative life grow stronger better from the end. Which the prophet Ezekiel expresses well and briefly, when having contemplated the flying animals he says: And the likeness of a man's hand was under their wings (Ezek. 10:21). For what can we understand by the wings of the animals but the contemplations of the saints, by which they fly across to the highest things, and deserting earthly things, poise themselves in heavenly ones? What do we receive by the hands but operations? Because when they expand themselves in the love of the neighbor, they also corporally administer the goods which they are able. But their hands are under their wings, because they surpass the works of their action by the virtue of contemplation.

[Old Edition XXIX.] 62. By the name of "sepulchre" eternal rest can be understood. ---Not only contemplation in this life, but the rest of eternal and inward retribution can be understood by the "sepulchre"; in which rest one is quieted so much the more truly as the life of corruption is more perfectly killed in us. He therefore enters the sepulchre in abundance who, after the works of the present life have been heaped up, being fully dead to his own mutability, is hidden in the secret of the true light. Whence also it is said by the Psalmist: Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy face from the disturbance of men (Ps. 31:20). Which the joined comparison also well commends, when it is subjoined: Like as a shock of corn cometh in in its season. For the grain in the crop is touched by the sun, because in this life the human soul is illustrated in respect of the supernal light; it receives rains, because it is made fat by the eloquence of truth; it is shaken by winds, because it is exercised by temptations; and it carries the growing chaff with it, because it daily tolerates the more wicked life of sinners against itself; and having been brought to the floor (area), it is pressed by the weight of threshing, so that it may be loosed from the connection of the chaff; because our mind, subjected to heavenly discipline, while it perceives the scourges of correction, departs cleaner from the society of carnal men; and having left the chaff, it is led to the barn (horreum), because while the reprobate remain outside, the elect soul is lifted up to the eternal joys of the supernal mansion. Well therefore is it said: Thou shalt enter into the sepulchre in abundance, like as a shock of corn cometh in in its season; because while after affliction the just find the rewards of the heavenly country, as if after pressures the grains are carried to the barn; and in a foreign time (alieno tempore) indeed they feel strokes, but in their own they rest from the stroke. For the present life is a foreign time to the elect, whence also Truth says to some still unfaithful: My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready (John 7:6). And again: This is your hour, and the power of darkness (Luke 22:53). He therefore enters the sepulchre in his season like a shock of corn, who perceives eternal rest, having first felt here the pressures of discipline, so that he may be free from the chaff that is to be burned. But Eliphaz, because in the series of his locution he named the tabernacle, stones, beasts, seed, herbs, and the sepulchre, hinted himself that he did not speak these things according to the letter, who after all things immediately subjoins:

VERS. 27.---Lo this, as we have searched it out, so it is.

63. The words of Eliphaz are to be understood spiritually. ---It is surely clear that in these words nothing is said by him according to the surface, because surely that which is searched out does not lie before the face. He therefore who indicates that he has searched out these things, demonstrates that he has sought inner things in outward words. But after everything he arrives at the folly of boasting, because he immediately subjoins:

CHAPTER XXXIX.

IBID.---Which having heard, consider it in thy mind.

64. It is a heavy unskilfulness in him to wish to teach one who is better. ---With however great learning a mind may be endowed, it is a heavy unskilfulness in it to wish to teach one who is better. Whence also those things which were rightly brought forward by the friends, are judged not to be right by the internal Judge. For in this they lose the force of their rectitude, that they do not suit the hearer; because medicines also lose their powers, when they are applied to healthy limbs. In everything therefore which is said, it is necessary that the cause, the time, and the person be weighed; whether the truth of the sentence strengthens the words, whether a suitable time requires this, whether the quality of the person does not oppose both the truth of the sentence and the suitability of the time. For he laudably sends forth darts, who first beholds the enemy whom he may strike. For he badly bends the horns of a strong bow, who, directing his arrow with force, strikes a fellow-citizen.

BOOK SEVENTH.

It explains the whole of the sixth chapter, except the last three verses, partly allegorically, partly morally.

CHAPTER FIRST.

1. Job tried by scourges and reproaches. If he speaks anything which sounds like impatience, these things are to be weighed not by human judgment, but by divine. ---The minds of some are more tortured by scourges than by reproaches; but those of others reproaches more than scourges chastise. For often the torments of words rage more harshly against us than any punishments; and when they rouse us to defense, they prostrate us into impatience. Whence, lest any temptation should have been wanting to blessed Job, not only do scourges from above strike him, but the discourses of his friends afflict him more grievously than his wounds; so that the soul of the holy man, being pulsed on this side and on that, might break forth into the motion of anger and elation, and whatever he had lived purely, he might defile through the contumacy of proud speech. But touched by wounds he returned thanks; provoked by words he answered rightly; and being struck he makes known how he held the health of the flesh for a very small thing. Speaking also he indicates how wisely he was silent. But some things are mixed with his words, which in human judgments might seem to pass the limit of patience: which things we truly understand, if we weigh the sentence of the supernal Judge in their examination. For He Himself both previously preferred blessed Job against the adversary, saying: Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him on the earth; a simple and upright man, and fearing God, and departing from evil? (Job i. 8). He Himself after the trial reproved his friends, saying: Ye have not spoken before me that which is right, as my servant Job (Job xlii. 7). It remains therefore that when the mind fluctuates in the discourses of blessed Job, it should weigh their weight from the beginning and end of the same history. For he could neither be praised by the eternal Judge when about to fall, nor preferred after having slipped. If therefore, being caught in the tempest of ambiguity, we behold the first and the last things of this history, the ship of the heart is restrained by the ropes of its own consideration, as if from the prow and the stern, lest it be led into the rocks of error. We are overwhelmed by no storms of our ignorance, if we hold the tranquil shore of the supernal sentence. For behold, he says that which may move the mind of the reader with no small question. But who would dare to call that not right, which sounds right in the ears of God?

CHAPTER II.

CHAP. VI. VERS. 2, 3.---Would that my sins, by which I have deserved wrath, and the calamity which I suffer, were weighed in a balance: as the sand of the sea this would appear heavier.

TYPICAL SENSE. 2. Christ is the balance in which both what we deserve, and what He suffered for us, are weighed. He made known to us the gravity of our punishment. ---Who else is expressed by the name of the balance, but the Mediator of God and men? who came to weigh the merit of our life, and brought with Him at once justice and mercy; but outweighing in the scale of mercy, He lightened our faults by sparing us. For in the hand of the Father, being made as it were a balance of wonderful poise, He suspended on this side our calamity in Himself, and on that side our sins. But He made known the calamity to be of heavy weight by dying, and showed that sin is light in the presence of mercy by releasing it. Who conferred this first benefit of grace, because He made our punishment knowable to us. For man was created to contemplate his Creator, but, his merits requiring it, being cast down from internal joys, rushing into the misery of corruption, sustaining the blindness of exile, he both endured the punishments of his fault, and knew it not; so that he believed exile to be his country, and thus under the weight of corruption he rejoiced as if in the liberty of salvation. But He, whom man had left within, having assumed flesh, appeared as God without; and when He presented Himself outwardly, He recalled the man expelled without to the things within, that he may now see his losses, now groan for the punishment of his blindness. Therefore the calamity of man appeared heavy in the balance, because he did not recognize the evil which he endured except in the presence of the Redeemer; for not knowing the light, he voluptuously endured the darkness of his damnation. But after he saw what he should love, he understood also what he should grieve for; and he felt that to be heavy which he endured, because that became known to be sweet which he had lost. Therefore the holy man, being shaken from the cloisters of silence by the sentences of his discoursing friend, and filled with the abundance of the prophetic spirit, let him speak in his own voice, let him speak in the voice of the human race: Would that my sins, by which I have deserved wrath, and the calamity which I suffer, were weighed in a balance: as the sand of the sea this would appear heavier. As if he were to say openly: The evil of our damnation is believed to be light, because it is not yet weighed by the recognized equity of the Redeemer. But would that He might come, and suspend the misery of so great an exile in the scale of His mercy, and teach us what we should seek after exile. For if it becomes known what we have lost, it insinuates that what we endure is heavy. Well, moreover, is this same calamity of our pilgrimage compared to the sand of the sea. For the sand of the sea is driven outwards by the heat of the waves, because also delinquent man, since he has changeably endured the waves of temptations, has gone out of himself from his inmost parts. Moreover, the sand of the sea is of great weight; but the calamity of man is said to be heavier than the sand of the sea, because the punishment is shown to have been hard, while the fault is lightened by the merciful Judge. And because whoever recognizes the grace of the Redeemer, whoever loves the return to his country, being instructed groans under the weight of his pilgrimage, after the desire of the balance there is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER III.

VERS. 2.---Whence also my words are full of grief.

3. He does not cease to groan here who knows himself to be an exile. ---He who loves his pilgrimage as his country, knows not how to grieve even in the midst of griefs. But the words of the just are full of grief, because as long as he endures present things, he sighs for something else in speaking; he beholds everything which he has endured by sinning; and that he may return to the state of blessedness, he solicitously weighs the judgments by which he is afflicted. Whence it is subjoined:

CHAPTER IV.

VERS. 4.---For the arrows of the Lord are in me.

4. By arrows preaching or punishment is signified. ---For by the name of arrows sometimes the words of preaching, sometimes the sentences of animadversion (punishment) are designated. For the eloquences of preaching are expressed by arrows, because in that they strike vices, they transfix the hearts of those living evilly. Of these arrows it is said to the coming Redeemer: Thy arrows are sharp, O thou most powerful; the peoples shall fall under thee in the heart (Psal. xliv. 6). Of which Isaiah says: I will send of them that shall be saved to the nations into the sea, into Africa, and into Lydia, holding the arrow, into Italy, into Greece (Isai. lxvi. 19). Again, by arrows the percussion of animadversion is designated, as it is said to King Joash by Elisha: Shoot the arrow. Who shooting said: Thou shalt smite Syria, until thou consume it (4 Reg. xiii. 17). Therefore the holy man, because he respects the misery of his pilgrimage, because he groans under the percussions of the Lord's animadversion, let him say: Whence also my words are full of grief, because the arrows of the Lord are in me. As if he were to say openly: I do not rejoice in the damnation of exile, but being placed under judgment I grieve, because I recognize the force of the percussion. But there are many whom torments torture, but do not amend. Against which it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER V.

IBID.---The indignation of which drinks up my spirit.

5. The just are amended by the punishments which they sustain. ---For what is the spirit of man, but the spirit of elation? But the arrows of the Lord drink up the spirit of man, when the sentences of supernal animadversion restrain the afflicted mind from elation. The arrows of the Lord drink up the spirit of man, because they draw inwards him who was intent on outward things. For David's spirit had been drunk up, when he said: When my spirit failed within me, then thou knewest my paths (Psal. cxli. 4). And again: I refused to be comforted, my soul was mindful of God, and I was delighted, and was exercised, and my spirit failed a little (Psal. lxxvi. 4). Therefore the indignation of the arrows drinks up the spirit of the just, because the supernal sentences change the elect whom they find in sins, while they wound them; that the transfixed mind may desert its hardness, and from the health-giving wound the blood of confession may run. For they weigh whence and whither they have fallen, they weigh from how great blessedness to what torments of their own corruption they have fallen; and they not only groan in those things which they sustain, but moreover they fear that which the strict Judge threatens to delinquents from the fires of hell. Whence it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER VI.

IBID.---And the terrors of the Lord war against me.

6. They grieve for present punishments, they fear future ones. ---The mind of the just not only considers what it endures, but also fears what remains; it sees what kind of things it suffers in this life; it fears lest after this it may suffer more grievous things. It mourns because in the exile of this blindness it has fallen from the joys of paradise; it fears lest even when exile shall be left, eternal death may follow. Already therefore it endures the sentence in punishment; but it still dreads the threats of the coming Judge because of fault. Hence the Psalmist says: Thy wraths have passed over me, and thy terrors have troubled me (Psal. lxxxvii. 17). For after the wraths of the internal Judge pass over, his terrors also trouble, because already we suffer one thing by damnation, and yet we fear another concerning eternal vengeance. Therefore the holy man, weighing the evils which he endures, let him say: The arrows of the Lord are in me, the indignation of which drinks up my spirit. But, fearing more grievous things for ever, let him add: And his terrors war against me. As if he were to say openly: Being struck indeed I grieve for present things; but this becomes more grievous in grief, because even being placed in punishment, I still greatly fear eternal torments. But because he already desires the intervention of the balance, already weighs the evils into which the human race has fallen, although placed in a Gentile nation, yet full of the gift of the prophetic spirit; with what ardor either Gentility or Judea thirsts for the coming of the Redeemer, he demonstrates by the following words, saying:

CHAPTER VII.

VERS. 5.---Will the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or will the ox low when he standeth before a full manger?

7. The desires of Gentility and of Judea for the coming of the Redeemer. ---For what is designated by the wild ass (onager), that is, the field ass, but the Gentile people? whom as nature brought forth outside the stalls of discipline, so it remained wandering in the field of its own pleasures. What is figured by the ox but the Jewish people, which, being placed under the yoke of supernal dominion, gathering proselytes to hope, drew the ploughshare of the law through the hearts which it could. But by the life of blessed Job attesting it, we know that we may believe that many even from the Gentiles expected the coming of the Redeemer. And when the Lord was born, Simeon coming in the spirit into the temple, we learned with how great desire the holy men from the Israelitish people wished to see the mystery of His incarnation. Whence also it is said to the disciples by the same Redeemer: Many, I say to you, just men and prophets have desired to see the things which ye see, and have not seen them (Luke x. 24). The grass therefore of the wild ass, and the hay of the ox, is this very incarnation of the Mediator, by which Gentility and Judea are satisfied together. For because it is said by the prophet: All flesh is grass (Isa. xl. 6), the Creator of the universe, taking flesh from our substance, willed to become grass, lest our flesh should remain grass for ever. Then therefore the wild ass found grass, when the Gentile people received the grace of the divine incarnation. Then the ox had not an empty manger, when the law exhibited His flesh to the Jewish people expecting it, whom it prophesied to them expecting it for a long time. Whence also the born Lord is placed in a manger, that surely it might be signified that the holy animals, which were found for a long time fasting under the law, are satisfied by the hay of His incarnation. For being born He filled the manger, who offered Himself as food to the minds of mortals, saying: He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him (John vi. 57). But because both the vows of the elect Gentiles were long delayed, and the holy ones from the Hebrew people groaned for a long time expecting their redemption, blessed Job, well narrating the mysteries of prophecy, insinuates the causes of affliction from both nations, saying: Will the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or will the ox low when he standeth before a full manger? As if he were to say openly: Therefore Gentility groans, because the grace of its Redeemer does not yet refresh it; and therefore Judea spreads its lowings, because, holding the law, but not seeing the Author of the law, it fasts standing before the manger. Which law indeed, because before the coming of the Mediator it was by no means held spiritually, but carnally, is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER VIII.

VERS. 6.---Or can that which is unsavoury be eaten, which is not seasoned with salt?

8. The law carnally understood is unsavoury, seasoned with salt by Christ. ---In the law the salt of the letter is the virtue of occult understanding. Whoever therefore, being intent on carnal observances, has not willed to understand this spiritually, what else has he eaten but unsavoury food? But the recognized Truth put salt in this food, when He taught that the savour of occult understanding lay hid in the law, saying: If ye believed Moses, ye would perhaps believe me also, for he wrote of me (John v. 46). And again: Have salt in yourselves, and have peace among yourselves (Mark ix. 49). But because before the coming of the Mediator Judea held the law carnally, Gentility refused to be subjected to its precepts commanding hard things. Therefore it willed not to eat unsavoury food, because before it perceived the seasoning of the Spirit, it dreaded to keep the force of the letter. For who of the Gentiles would bear that which is there commanded, to cut the flesh of sons for the observance of religion, to cut off the faults of words by death? Whence also it is still well subjoined:

CHAPTER IX.

IBID.---Or can any one taste that which being tasted brings death?

9. The law carnally tasted was before mortiferous. ---For the law carnally tasted brought death, because it constrained the commissions of delinquents with hard animadversion; it brought death, because both by the precept it made the fault known, and did not blot it out by grace, Paul attesting, who says: The law brought nothing to perfection (Heb. vii. 19). And again: The law indeed is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. And a little after: Sin, that it might appear sin, wrought death to me by that which is good (Rom. vii. 12, 13). But Gentility being converted to Christ, because it understands that He sounds through the words of the law, being straitened by its desires, seeks Him whom it vehemently loves spiritually among the carnal precepts. Whence also it is subjoined from the voice of the Church presently through the spirit of prophecy:

CHAPTER X.

VERS. 7.---The things which my soul before refused to touch, are now through anguish my food.

10. The words of Job are pregnant with spiritual understanding. It is foretold that the Gentiles would seek the food of the law, and that the Jews would not disdain the society of the Gentiles. ---For he falls greatly into error who suspects that the words of blessed Job were uttered for history alone. For that holy man, supported by so many praises of his Creator, what great thing, or rather what true thing would he say, if he had said that unsavoury food could not be eaten? Or who had offered to his eating mortiferous aliments, that he should subjoin: Or can any one taste that which being tasted brings death? Which if we feel to be said of the colloquies of his friends, we are restrained from this understanding by the sentence subjoined, in which he says: The things which my soul before refused to touch, are now through anguish my food. For far be it that the holy man, established in the integrity of his state, should have ever despised the words of his friends, who, as we afterwards learned from his own attestation, was humble even to his servants. His words therefore are not void of mysteries, which, as we learn from the end of the history, the internal Judge also praises. Which would by no means have run even with such great veneration to the ends of the world, if they had not been pregnant with mystic understanding.

11. Blessed Job, therefore, because he is a member of the holy Church, speaks also from her voice, saying: The things which my soul before refused to touch, are now through anguish my food, because doubtless Gentility being converted, anxious with the heats of its love, hungers for the food of the old Scripture, which long ago in its pride it despised. Which things nevertheless agree also with the voices of Judea, if they be discussed a little more considerately. For she, from the erudition of the law, from the knowledge of the one God, had salt, and despised all nations as brute animals. But because, being erudite in the precepts of the law, she had contemned receiving the society of the Gentiles to herself, what else did she loathe but to take unsavoury food? For the divine sentence, death being proposed, had forbidden that the Israelitish people should join a league with foreigners, and defile the life of holy religion (Exod. xxiii. 32). Whence also it is subjoined: Or can any one taste that which being tasted brings death? But because this same Judea was converted to the faith of the Redeemer from the part of the elect, she was busy to preach the light which she had known to the infidels of her own offspring through the holy apostles. But the pride of the Hebrews rejected the service of that preaching. Whence she presently turned the words of her exhortation to the gathering of the Gentiles, as it is said also through the same apostles: It behoved us first to speak the word of God to you; but because ye have rejected it, and have judged yourselves unworthy of eternal life, behold we turn to the Gentiles (Acts xiii. 46). Whence in this place also it is aptly subjoined: The things which my soul before refused to touch, are now through anguish my food. For Judea, disdaining the life of the Gentiles, long ago would not as it were touch that, whose society she scorned to receive; but coming to the grace of the Redeemer, being rejected by the infidel Israelites, while she dilates herself to the gathering of the Gentiles through the holy apostles, she receives as it were hungering into food, that which before in her fastidiousness she despised as unworthy. For she endured the anguishes of her preaching, when she saw that what she spoke was despised among the Hebrews. But through anguish she ate the foods which long ago she had contemned, who, the hardness of the Jews being rejected, desires to receive the Gentile peoples whom she had despised. Because therefore we have said these things figuratively, it remains now that we inquire morally.

MORAL SENSE.---12. The holy man, desiring the advent of the Redeemer under the appellation of the balance, while he opens himself through eloquence, instructs us in the study of living; while he relates his own things, he indicates some of ours; while he insinuates concerning himself what we may recognize, he confirms us, trembling and weak, in hope. For already we live by the faith of the Mediator, and yet we still sustain the hard scourges of internal animadversion for the purging of vices. Whence also after the desire of the balance he subjoins:

CHAPTER XI.

VERS. 4.---For the arrows of the Lord are in me, the indignation of which drinks up my spirit.

13. The good are pierced by scourges and the terror of judgment. Yet it is better to be moved by love. ---But behold, as has been said above, we are both pierced by the stroke of divine correction, and yet that is still more grievous which we dread concerning the terror of the future Judge from eternal animadversion. Whence it is immediately subjoined: And the terrors of the Lord do war against me. Yet the mind ought to be shaken out of fear and grief, and to be extended to the desires of the eternal country alone. For then we show the nobility of our regeneration, if we love Him as a father, whom now with a servile mind we dread as a lord. Whence it is said also through Paul: Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again in fear, but ye have received the spirit of adoption of sons, in which we cry, Abba, Father (Rom. viii. 15). Therefore let the mind of the elect lay aside the weight of dread, let it exercise itself in the virtue of love, let it desire the dignity of its renovation, let it pant for the appearance of its Creator; whom so long as it is not able to behold, it must needs, hungering, expect His eternity, that is, its own inward food. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XII.

VERS. 5.---Will the wild ass bray when he has grass? or will the ox low when he stands before a full manger?

14. The wild ass designates the faithful people, the ox the ecclesiastical order. The cause of groaning for both here is the delayed vision of God. ---Who else are signified by the appellation of the wild ass, but they who, being established in the field of faith, are bound by the thongs of no office? Or whom does the signification of the ox express, but those whom the yoke of the order they have undertaken presses within holy Church for the office of preaching? Now the grass of the wild ass and the food of the ox is the internal refection of the faithful people. For some, after the manner of the ox, are held within the Church by the thongs of an office they have undertaken; others, after the manner of the wild ass, know not the stalls of a sacred order, and live in the field of their own will. But when any one from a secular life pants with the desire of internal vision, when he longs for the food of inward refection, when, considering himself fasting in the blindness of this pilgrimage, he refreshes himself with what tears he can, the wild ass, as if not finding grass, brays. Another also bears the necessity of the order he has undertaken, swelters in the labour of preaching, and desires already to be refreshed by eternal contemplation; but because he does not yet behold the appearance of his Redeemer, he groans like an ox tied to an empty manger. For because, being placed far from internal wisdom, we do not discern the greenness of the eternal inheritance, like brute animals we fast from the desired grass. Concerning which grass indeed it is said by the voice of the Redeemer: By me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and go out, and find pasture (John x. 9). But for the most part, which is wont to be more grievous to those that love, the life of the bad contradicts the holy studies of the good; and when the mind is snatched away to celestial desire, the well-begun intention is beaten back by the interrupting words and manners of fools; so that that which already by the effort of contemplation had flown to the highest things, girts itself in the lowest things against contests to subdue the folly of the wicked. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XIII.

VERS. 6.---Or can that which is unsavoury be eaten, which is not seasoned with salt? Or can any one taste that which being tasted brings death?

15. How grievous to the elect are the words and manners of carnal men. ---For the words and manners of carnal men thrust themselves like food into our minds, that they may be snatched into the belly of delight. But every elect person does not eat that which is unsavoury, because, judging the words and deeds of the wicked, he repels them from the mouth of the heart. Paul forbade unsavoury things to be brought for the eating of minds, when he said to his disciples: Let your speech be always in grace, seasoned with salt (Col. iv. 6). And to the Psalmist also the words of the reprobate had tasted unsavoury in the mouth of the heart, when he said: The wicked have told me fables, but not as thy law, O Lord (Psal. cxix. 85). But often the words of carnal men, while they thrust themselves importunately into our ears, beget a war of temptation in the heart; and although reason rejects these, and the tongue reprehends them, yet that is with labour conquered within which is judged with authority without. Whence it is necessary that that should not even come to the ears, which the mind, watching from the entrance of thought, should repel. Holy men, therefore, when they pant with desires of eternity, raise themselves to such a height of life, that they believe it already a grievous and depressing weight to themselves to hear the things which are of the world. For they estimate as greatly insolent and intolerable whatever that is which does not sound of that which they love within.

16. It is not for all to be girt for undergoing tortures of the body for God. ---But often the mind is already snatched away by desire to sublime things, is already thoroughly separated from the foolish speech of earthly men, and yet is not yet girt for enduring the tortures of this present life for the love of truth; it already appetites supernal things, already contemns foolish things in the lowest, but has not yet directed itself to the tolerance of enduring adversity. Whence also it is subjoined: Or can any one taste that which being tasted brings death?

CHAPTER XIV.

17. By tolerating the infirmities of our neighbors, we are strengthened to undergo tortures. ---For it is hard to appetite that which tortures, to follow that which puts life to flight. But for the most part the mind of the just man extends itself to such a height of virtue, that it both presides within in the citadel of internal reason, and by tolerating the folly of some without, converts them. For those whom we strive to draw to strong things, it is necessary that we tolerate their weak things, because he does not raise up one lying, except he who bends the rectitude of his own state through compassion. But when we have compassion for the infirmity of another, we are more valiantly strengthened from our own; so that by the love of future things the mind may prepare itself for present adversities, and expect the tortures of the body which it feared. For by the increase of celestial desires it is straitened; and when it considers how great is the sweetness of the eternal country, it ardently loves the bitternesses of the present life for it. Whence after the loathing of unsavoury food, after the impossible taste of death, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XV.

VERS. 7.---The things which my soul before refused to touch, are now through anguish my food.

18. For the love of the heavenly country we love the punishments of exile. ---For the mind of the just man profiting, which before, while it cared for its own things alone, loathed to bear the things of others, which having less compassion for the things of others, was not able to grow strong against adversities, when it draws itself to tolerate the weak things of its neighbor, it grows strong to overcome adversities; so that for the love of truth it afterwards more strongly appetites the tortures of this present life, by how much more it before fled from weak things. For by its own inclination it is raised up, by attraction it is stretched, by compassion it is strengthened; and when it dilates itself into the love of its neighbor, it gathers as it were from meditation with what great fortitude it may rise to its Author. For charity, which humbles us to the force of compassion, raises us higher in the summit of contemplation; and being multiplied it now glows with greater desires, it now pants to arrive at the life of the spirit, even through tortures of the body. That, therefore, which it before refused to touch, this it afterwards eats through anguish, who, scarcely containing its desires, now loves even those punishments which it long ago feared, for the love of the heavenly country. For if the mind is directed with a strong intention toward God, whatever becomes bitter to it in this life, it esteems sweet, everything which afflicts it thinks rest; it desires to pass even through death, that it may be able to obtain life more fully; it desires to be thoroughly extinguished in the lowest things, that it may more truly ascend to the highest. But these things I falsely say concerning the mind of any just man, these things concerning the mind of blessed Job, unless he himself subjoin:

CHAPTER XVI.

VERS. 8-10.---Oh that I might have my request; and that God would grant me the thing that I long for! Even that it would please God to destroy me; that He would let loose His hand, and cut me off! Then should I yet have comfort; yea, I would harden myself in sorrow: let Him not spare.

19. The example of Job blessing his striker. God crushes us, and the devil crushes us, with different results. ---But perhaps he seeks these things through contumacy, perhaps in that he desires to be perfectly extinguished, he accuses the injustice of the striker. Far be this. For with what mind he seeks it, he demonstrates by the following words, saying: Neither will I contradict the words of the Holy One. By no means therefore does he murmur concerning the injustice of the striker, who calls his striker "holy" even among the blows. But it is to be known that sometimes the adversary crushes us, and sometimes God. Now from the crushing of the adversary we fail from virtue; but being broken by the crushing of the Lord, we are strengthened from vices in virtue. The Prophet had foreseen this crushing, when he said: Thou shalt rule them with a rod of iron, and thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel (Psal. ii. 9). The Lord rules and crushes us with a rod of iron, because with the strong rectitude of His dispensation while He refreshes us interiorly, He afflicts us exteriorly. For by how much He humbles the virtue of the flesh, He exalts the intention of the spirit. Whence also this same crushing is compared to a potter's vessel, as it is said also through Paul: We have this treasure in earthen vessels (II Cor. iv. 7). Who, expressing at once the crushing and the rule, says: Though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day (Ibid. 16). The holy man, therefore, who desires to approach God even through scourges, says through the spirit of humility:

CHAPTER XVII.

VERS. 9.---He that began, let Him also crush me.

20. God mercifully corrects him that raises himself up concerning virtues. ---For for the most part the Lord begins to work the crushing of vices in us; but when the mind is extolled from the very beginning of its progress, and when it already raises itself up as it were concerning its virtues, it opens an entrance to the adversary raging against it, who, penetrating the inmost parts of the heart, breaks in pieces everything which he shall have found in it of the study of a good beginning; and he exhibits himself so much more vehemently in the breaking of it, by how much more heavily he grieves because it had been advanced even to a little. Whence also, the Gospel being witness, by the voice of the Truth, to the neglected house of the conscience the unclean spirit who went out alone returns with seven spirits (Matth. xii. 45). Lest therefore after the beginnings of divine correction the ancient enemy should steal upon him, and draw him to the breaking of his virtues, the holy man congruously prays, saying: He that began, let Him also crush me. As if he should say openly: Let Him not cease to perform by striking this which He has begun in me, lest He should deliver me, being deserted, to the adversary for crushing. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XVIII.

IBID.---That He would let loose His hand, and cut me off.

21. How much it is to be feared lest He should keep His hand bound from striking our vices. --- For often, being inflated with the confidence of long prosperity, we are raised up in a certain state of elation. And when the Creator beholds us being extolled, but does not exercise His love towards us through blows, He as it were keeps His hand bound from striking our vices. Had He not bound the hand of His affection, when He said to the sinning people: I will no longer be wroth with thee (Isai. liv. 9); and: My zeal has departed from thee (Ezech. xvi. 42)? Let Him therefore let loose His hand is said, that He may exercise His affection. But it is rightly subjoined: And cut me off. For when a sudden pain of the scourge, or a temptation of infirmity, strikes us, secure and elated concerning the affluence of our virtues, immediately the elation of our mind, being cut off, falls from the summit of its state, so that it dares nothing concerning itself, but, prostrated by the stroke of its own infirmity, seeks the hand of Him that raises it up. Hence it is that holy men, when they are suspicious concerning the occult disposition towards themselves, dread prosperity itself more, they desire to be tempted, they long to be scourged, in order that fear and pain may instruct the incautious mind, lest in this way of pilgrimage, the enemy breaking forth from ambush, its own security should more miserably prostrate it. Hence the Psalmist says: Prove me, O Lord, and try me (Psal. xxvi. 2). Hence again he says: I am ready for scourges (Psal. xxxviii. 17). For because the saints consider that the wound of the correction of their own mind is not without rottenness, they willingly prepare themselves under the hand of the Physician for incisions, that, the wound being opened, the virus of sin may go out, which was killing within under a sound skin. Whence also it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER XIX.

VERS. 10.---And let this be my consolation, that afflicting me with pain, He spare not.

22. The saints fear prosperity, they desire scourges. ---The elect, who when they know that they have committed unlawful things, but searching find that they have suffered no adversities for those unlawful things, waste away with the force of an immense dread, they are feverish with fear, they labor being agitated by sinister suspicions, lest grace should have deserted them for eternity, whom in the present life no retribution for their evil keeps in custody; they fear lest the vengeance which is suspended should be reserved more heavy at the end; they desire to be struck by paternal correction, and they think the pain of the wound the medicines of salvation. Rightly therefore is it now said: And let this be my consolation, that afflicting me with pain He spare not. As if it were openly said: He who for this reason spares some here, that He may strike them for ever; for this reason let Him strike me here, that by not sparing, He may spare for ever. For I am consoled from affliction, because knowing the rottenness of human corruption, I am made certain of the hope of salvation from the wound. Which because he uttered not with a swelling but with a humble mind, he makes clear by subjoining, as we said before, saying:

CHAPTER XX.

IBID.---Nor will I contradict the words of the Holy One.

23. God often speaks silently by His works. --- For the most part the words of God to us are not the sounds of things spoken, but the effects of His operations. For in that He speaks to us which He silently works towards us. Blessed Job therefore would contradict the words of God, if he were to murmur concerning His strikings. But what he thinks concerning his Striker, he indicates, who (as we have already said) calls Him holy, whom he tolerates striking him. It follows:

[Old IX, New VIII].

VERS. 11.---For what is my strength, that I should sustain; or what is my end, that I should act patiently?

24. What is the fortitude of the just, and what that of the reprobate. ---It is to be known that the fortitude of the just is one thing, and that of the reprobate is another. For the fortitude of the just is to overcome the flesh, to go against one's own wills, to extinguish the delight of the present life, to love the harsh things of this world for the sake of eternal rewards, to despise the allurements of prosperity, and to overcome the fear of adversity in the heart. But the fortitude of the reprobate is to love transitory things without ceasing, to endure insensibly against the scourges of the Creator, to rest not from the love of temporal things even in adversity, to arrive at vain glory even with the loss of life, to seek out increases of malice, to impugn the life of the good not only with words and manners, but even with swords, to place hope in themselves, to commit iniquity daily without any failure of desire. Hence it is that it is said to the elect by the Psalmist: Do manfully, and let your heart be comforted, all ye that hope in the Lord (Psal. xxxi. 24). Hence per prophet reprobis dicitur: Woe unto you that are powerful to drink wine, and strong men to mix ebriety (Isai. v. 22). Hence it is said by Solomon that the holy ones contemplate internal rest without any debility of desire: Behold the bed of Solomon, sixty strong men surround it, of the strongest of Israel (Cant. iii. 7). Hence the Psalmist, speaking in the person of the Redeemer in His Passion against the reprobate, says: Behold they have occupied my soul, the strong have rushed upon me (Psal. lix. 3). How well Isaiah embraced both kinds of fortitude, saying: They that trust in the Lord shall change their strength (Isai. xl. 31). For because he said not they shall take, but they shall change their strength, he certainly made it plainly known that that which is laid down is one, and that which is begun is another.

25. In what things the reprobate is strong, the just is slothful. ---Are not even the reprobate strong, who run with so many labors to the concupiscence of the present life, who boldly object themselves to perils, who willingly bear contumelies for gains, who recoil from the lust of their appetite conquered by no contrariety, who grow hard with strikings, and tolerate the evils of the world for the world, and seeking its joys, so to speak, they lose them, nor yet in losing these are they fatigued? Whence it is well said by the voice of the human race through Jeremiah: He hath inebriated me with wormwood (Lam. iii. 15). For he that is drunk knows not what he suffers. He therefore is drunk with wormwood, who, alien from the sense of reason through the love of the present world, while he accounts as light whatever he sustains for the world, is ignorant of the bitterness of the labor which he tolerates, because doubtless he is led delectably to all things in which he is painfully fatigued. But on the contrary, the just man studies to be weak for the sake of tolerating the perils of the world for the world, he beholds his end, he attends to how transitory the present life is, and he refuses to suffer labors outwardly for it, whose delight he has conquered within. Blessed Job therefore, pressed by the adversities of the present life, let him say from his own voice, let him say from the voice of all the just: For what is my strength, that I should sustain? or what is my end, that I should act patiently? As if he plainly insinuated, saying: I cannot tolerate the evils of the world for the world, because I am no longer strong in the desire for it. For while I behold the end of the present life, why do I suffer its weight, whose appetite I tread upon? And because all the unjust, as we said, so much more strongly bear the labors thereof as they are more greedily fed with its delight, he rightly soon subjoins that same fortitude of the reprobate, saying:

CHAPTER XXII

[Old X, New IX].

VERS. 12.---Neither is my strength the strength of stones, nor is my flesh of brass.

26. At the striking of God some are stones without sound, others sounding brass without sense. Job is strong not through insanity, but through the state of salvation. ---What are signified in this place by brass and stones, but the hearts of insensible men, who often both receive supernal blows, and yet are softened by no striking of discipline? On the contrary to the elect it is said through the prophet, the Lord promising: I will take away from you the stony heart, and I will give you a heart of flesh (Ezech. xi. 19). Paul also says: If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal (1 Cor. xiii. 1). Now we know that stones when struck cannot return a clear sound; but brass when it is struck, a very sonorous sound is formed from its striking. Because this, like stones, lacks life, it has no sense in the sound. And there are some who, like stones, have so hardened themselves to the precepts of piety, that when the striking of supernal animadversion examines them, they by no means return the sound of humble confession. But some differing in nothing from the metal of brass, when they receive the scourges of supernal striking, emit the sound of pious confession; but because they do not bring forth the voices of humility from the heart, being reduced to a state of salvation, they know not what they promised. The former, therefore, struck after the manner of stones, have not even voices; but the latter in nothing flee the imitation of brass, who, being placed in striking, speak good things which they do not feel. The former deny even words to the veneration of Him that strikes; the latter, promising what they do not fulfil, cry out without life. The holy man, therefore, fleeing the hardness of the reprobate among blows, let him say: Neither is my strength the strength of stones, nor is my flesh of brass. As if he openly confessed, saying: I flee the similitude of the reprobate under the scourge of discipline, because I have not so hardened after the manner of stones, that under the sting of striking I should be silent from the ministry of confession; nor again as it were brass do I resound the voice of confession, and am ignorant of the sense of the voice. But because at the striking the reprobate are weakly strong, but the elect are powerfully weak, blessed Job while he asserts that he is not strong through insanity, makes it known that he is strong through the state of salvation. [Old XI.] Whence therefore he perceived this same strength, let him insinuate, lest if he arrogate to himself the powers which he has, he should run powerfully to death. For for the most part a virtue possessed kills worse than if it were lacking; because while it raises the mind to confidence in itself, it transfixes it with the sword of elation; and when it as it were vivifies it by strengthening, it kills it by elevating; namely, it draws it to destruction which it plucks away from the trust in internal fortitude by its own hope. But because blessed Job both prevails in virtue, and has not confidence in himself, and, so to speak, being weak he has powers, he aptly subjoins, saying:

CHAPTER XXIII.

VERS. 13.---Behold, there is no help for me in me.

27. Because he ascribes his powers not to himself, but to God. ---It is now evident to whose hope the mind of the struck recurs, when it denies that there is help for it in itself. But because he insinuates that he is weak in himself, to the merit of still greater fortitude let him add how he is also destitute of his neighbors,---IBID.:---My kinsfolk also have departed from me. But behold, despised outwardly, he presides within on the throne of judgment. For when he asserts that he is forsaken, immediately he breaks forth into a sentence, saying:

[New X].

VERS. 14.---He that taketh away mercy from his friend, forsaketh the fear of the Lord.

28. What the love of God and the love of neighbor afford to each other. ---Who is designated in this place by the name of friend but any neighbor, who is faithfully joined to us by this, that, having now received a good work from us, he truly helps towards obtaining afterwards the eternal country? But because there are two precepts of charity, namely, the love of God and of our neighbor, through the love of God the love of neighbor is begotten, and through the love of neighbor the love of God is nourished. For he who neglects to love God, certainly knows not how to love his neighbor; and then we profit more fully in the love of God, if we are first suckled by the charity of our neighbor in the bosom of the same love. For because the love of God generates the love of neighbor, the Lord about to say through the Law, Thou shalt love thy neighbor (Deut. vi. 5; x. 12), premised, saying: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God (Matth. xxii. 37, 39): that namely in the earth of our heart He might first fix the root of His own love, so that afterwards fraternal love might germinate through the branches. And again because the love of God coalesces from the love of neighbor, John testifies, saying: He that loveth not his brother whom he seeth, how can he love God whom he seeth not? (1 John iv. 20). Which divine love, however, is born through fear, but in growing is changed into affection.

29. The love of neighbor is proved in his distresses. How great is the iniquity of him who despises a friend in adversities. ---But often Almighty God, in order that it may be known how far any one is from His charity and that of his neighbor, or how much he has profited in it, dispensing all things in a wonderful order, depresses some with scourges, and supports others with successes. And when He deserts some temporally, He shows in the hearts of others what evil lies hid. For for the most part they themselves pursue us as miserable, who beyond comparison worshipped us as happy. For when any one placed in prosperity is loved, it is very uncertain whether the prosperity or the person be loved. But the loss of happiness interrogates the force of love. Whence well a certain wise man says: A friend is not known in good things, and an enemy is not hidden in evil things (Ecclus. xii. 8). For neither does prosperity indicate a friend, nor does adversity conceal an enemy, because both the former is often covered by the reverence of our prosperity, and the latter is opened from the confidence of our adversity. The just man therefore, being placed in scourges, let him say: He that taketh away mercy from his friend, forsaketh the fear of the Lord, because doubtless he who from adversity despises his neighbor, is openly convicted that he did not love him in prosperity. And since Almighty God strikes some for this reason, that He may both instruct the struck, and provide to those not struck the occasion of a good work, whoever despises the struck, repels from himself the occasion of virtue; and so much the more wickedly he raises himself against the Author, as he neither recognizes Him as pious in his own salvation, nor as just in another's wound. But it is to be considered that blessed Job so speaks his own words, that the life of the whole elect people also is signified through him. For because he is a member of the same people, when he narrates what he himself suffers, he also denounces those things which that people sustains, saying:

CHAPTER XXV.

VERS. 15.---My brothers have passed me by as a torrent, which rapidly passes in the valleys.

30. Why the reprobate are called by the just both brothers and passing by. They are rightly compared to a torrent. By a short and fugitive life they pass to eternal torments. ---Because the mind of the reprobate loves only present things, for the most part it now exists as much alien from the scourge, as it remains afterwards a stranger from the inheritance; and proud it despises the just, whom paternal severity mercifully afflicts. But often the reprobate retain the same faith by which we live, they perceive the same sacraments of faith, they are contained in the unity of the same religion; but yet they know not the bowels of compassion, they recognize not the force of charity, with which we are on fire towards God and our neighbor. Rightly therefore are they called both brothers and passing by, because they proceed from one womb of a mother with us through faith, but they are not fixed in one study of charity towards God and neighbor. Whence they are also aptly compared to a torrent which rapidly passes in the valleys. For a torrent flows down from the mountains to the depths, and being collected by winter rains, it dries up with summer suns. For they who, loving earthly things, desert the hope of the supernal country, as it were seek the valleys from the mountains; whom however the winter of the present life multiplies, but the summer of the future judgment dries up, because when the sun of supernal strictness shall have glowed, it turns the joy of the reprobate into aridity. Well therefore is it said: Rapidly passes in the valleys. For for a torrent to pass rapidly to the valleys is for the minds of the wicked to descend to the lowest desires without any obstacle and difficulty. [Old XII.] For all ascent is in labor, descent in pleasure, because by effort the step is tended to higher things, but by remission it is declined to lower things. For to carry a stone to the summit of a mountain is of great labor, and the same to let down from the highest to the lowest is not labor. Namely, he rushes down without delay, who with great efforts arrived at the summit. With long study the crop is sown, it is nourished by the sun and long-continued rain, but yet by one and sudden spark it is consumed. For a little while buildings profit to the heights, but by sudden falls they seek the earth. The robust tree raises itself into the air by slow increments; but whatever it brought forth long to the heights, falls once and at once. Because therefore ascent is in labor, descent in pleasure, rightly is it now said: My brothers have passed me by as a torrent, which rapidly passes in the valleys. Which however can be understood also otherwise.

31. For if we understand the valleys to be the lowest places of punishments, all the unjust pass as a torrent rapidly to the valleys, because in this life, which they seek with all their desires, they can by no means stand long. For as many days of age as they receive, by as it were so many steps daily they tend to the end. They wish times to be increased to them, but because those granted cannot subsist, as many increments of living as they perceive, so many they lose from the space of living. The moments therefore of times fly by that which they follow, they lose that which they receive. Rapidly therefore they pass to the valleys, who indeed draw out the desires of pleasures into length, but are suddenly led down to the bars of hell. For because even this time, which is extended by any longevity, if it is closed by an end, is not long; from the end the miserable gather that that was short which they held in losing. Whence well it is also said by Solomon: If a man live many years, and have rejoiced in them all, he must remember the darksome time, and the many days, which when they come, the past things shall be accused of vanity (Eccles. xi. 8). For the foolish mind when it shall have suddenly found the evil, which by no means passes by, understands its eternity by tolerating it, because that which could pass by was vain. Now it is to be known that many desire to act rightly, but there are some things which contradict their weak minds from the present life; and while they fear to suffer adversities in the lowest things, they stumble into the rectitude of supernal judgment. Whence it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXVI

[New XI].

VERS. 16.---They that fear the frost, the snow shall fall upon them.

32. They who from fear of temporal losses desert justice, shall fall into eternal evils. ---For frost freezes below, but snow rushes down from higher places. And often some, while they greatly fear temporal adversities, object themselves to the strictness of eternal animadversion. Of whom it is well said by the Psalmist: There have they trembled with fear, where there was no fear (Psal. xiv. 5). For this one now desires to defend the truth freely, but yet in that very desire of his, trembling he greatly fears the indignation of human power; and while he fears man upon earth against the truth, he sustains from heaven the wrath of the same truth. That one, conscious of his sins, now desires to bestow those things which he possesses upon the needy, but yet he dreads lest he himself should be in want when the things are given. And while trembling he prepares the subsidies of the flesh by reserving them, he kills his soul from the nourishments of mercy; and when he fears to suffer want upon earth, he cuts off from himself the eternal abundance of supernal refreshment. Rightly therefore is it said: They that fear the frost, the snow shall fall upon them, because they who fear things to be trodden upon from the lowest, suffer things to be feared from the highest; and when they will not pass through what they could have trodden upon, they receive judgment from the supernal regions, which they can by no means tolerate. But doing these things, they obtain the glory of the world temporally. But what are they to do at the time of their calling, when trembling they desert all things at once which they have kept here with grave fear? Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXVII.

VERS. 17.---At the time when they shall have been dissipated, they shall perish.

33. How great is their dread, as judgment approaches. ---For those whom the solicitude of the present life orders, the loss thereof dissipates; and then they perish even outwardly, who long ago perished within by neglecting eternal things. Concerning whom it is rightly added: And as they shall have grown hot, they shall be dissolved from their place. [Old XIII.] For every unjust man, when he shall have grown hot, is dissolved from his place, because approaching the judgment of internal strictness, when he has already begun to glow through the knowledge of punishment, he is separated from that delight of his flesh, to which he had long ago clung. For hence it is that it is said by the prophet against the reprobate: And only vexation alone shall give understanding to the hearing (Isai. xxviii. 19), because namely they do not understand eternal things, except when they are already punished for temporal things without amendment. Then the mind is feverish, and inflames itself with the fires of an unfruitful penitence, it fears to be led to punishment, it retains the present life from desire; but it is dissolved from its place, because deserting the allurements of the flesh, its hardness is liquefied through punishment. But because we have heard what all the unjust will suffer at the time of their abstraction, let us still hear some things with which they are implicated in the space of their liberty. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVIII

[Old XIV, New XII].

VERS. 18.---The paths of their steps are involved.

34. It profits nothing to propose right things, unless we are tenacious of the purpose. ---Everything that is involved is folded back into itself. And there are some who deliberate to meet seductive vices as it were with their whole intention, but the point of temptation rushing upon them, they do not persevere in the purpose of their deliberation. For one, inflated with the perverse daring of pride, when he considers that the rewards of humility are great, raises himself against himself, and as it were lays down the tumor of turgid fastidiousness, he promises to exhibit himself humble to any contumelies; but when suddenly the injury of a single word shall have struck him, he returns immediately to his accustomed elation, and is so led to tumor, that he by no means remembers that he had desired the good of humility. Another, feverish with avarice, pants for increasing his means. He, when he beholds all things passing away swiftly, fixes his mind wandering through concupiscences, decrees now to seek nothing, and to possess only things obtained under the rein of great moderation; but when suddenly things which please shall have been offered to his eyes, immediately the mind pants in ambition, it does not contain itself, it seeks an occasion of acquiring these, and having forgotten the continence which it had pledged with itself, it disquiets itself with the stings of thoughts through the desires of acquisition. Another is polluted by the wasting of luxury, and is held captured now by long custom; but he beholds how great is the cleanness of chastity, and finds it base to be conquered by the flesh. He deliberates therefore to restrain the flux of pleasures, and prepares himself to resist custom as it were with all his powers. But either a form being presented to his eyes, or recalled to memory, when he is shaken by sudden temptation, immediately he is dissipated from his former preparation; and he who had raised against this the shield of deliberation, lies pierced through by the dart of delight; and thus luxury overcomes him nerveless, as if he had prepared no arms of intention against it. Another is kindled with the flames of anger, and is unbridled even to bringing contumelies upon his neighbors. But when no occasion of fury strikes his mind, he considers how great is the virtue of meekness, how great the height of patience, and prepares himself to be patient even against contumelies; but when any small occasion of commotion arises, suddenly he is inflamed to the marrow to voices and contumelies; so that not only the promised patience does not return to memory, but even the mind knows not itself and the reproaches which it speaks. And when he shall have fully satisfied his fury, as it were after exercise he returns into tranquillity; and then he recollects himself to the bars of silence, when not the patience of the tongue, but the satisfaction of his own procacity has placed a rein. Scarcely therefore does he restrain himself late after the reproaches brought upon another, because also often the term of the field, not the right hand of the rider, coerces foaming horses from their course. Well therefore is it said of the reprobate: The paths of their steps are involved, because indeed they seek right things by deliberating, but are always folded back to their accustomed evils; and as it were stretched outside themselves, they return to themselves by a circuit, who indeed desire good things, but never depart from evils. For they wish to be humble, but yet without contempt; to be content with their own, but without necessity; to be chaste, but without maceration of the body; to be patient, but without contumelies; and while they seek to obtain virtues, but flee the labors of virtues, what else than that they know not the contests of war in the field, and desire to triumph in the cities concerning the war.

[Vet. XV.] 35. While some subdue certain vices, they neglect others, and soon succumb even to those they had mastered. ---However, this fact, that their paths are mentioned as involved, can still be understood in another way. For frequently some girt themselves vehemently against certain vices, but neglect to subdue others; and since they do not raise themselves against the latter, they also restore against themselves those which they had subdued. For one has already mastered the flesh from luxury (luxuria), but yet has not refrained his mind from avarice (avaritia); and while he keeps himself in the world for the exercise of avarice, and since he does not depart from earthly acts, when the point of occasion breaks out, he falls even into luxury, which he already seemed to have subdued. Another has conquered the heat of avarice, but by no means has subjected the force of luxury; and while he prepares the price for fulfilling luxury, he also subjects the neck of his heart to the yoke of avarice, which he mastered a short while ago. Another has already laid low rebelling impatience (impatientia), but has not yet conquered vain glory (inanis gloria); and when he inserts himself into the honors of the world through this, being pierced by the stings of causes, he returns captured to impatience; and when vain glory raises his mind to the defense of itself, he, being conquered, also tolerates that which he overcame. Another has subjected vain glory, but yet has not yet laid low impatience; and when he threatens many things to those resisting through impatience, blushing not to fulfill what he speaks, he is recalled under the yoke of vain glory; and he, being conquered through one thing, tolerates that which he was rejoicing that he had fully conquered. Thus therefore by vicarious aid vices retain their fugitive, and receive him as it were already lost under the right of their dominion, and deliver him in turn to each other for vengeance. To the perverse therefore the paths of their steps are involved, because even if they lift their foot from one defeated wickedness, yet while another reigns, they entangle it even in that which they had defeated.

36. One sinning entangles himself, while one fault is the occasion of another and of many following. As it were man ends in a beast, while under the pretext of reason he sins against reason. ---But sometimes by the involved paths of the steps no fault is overcome, and one is perpetrated through another. For often the fallacy of negation is joined to theft, and often the fault of fallacy is heaped up by the guilt of perjury. Often any vice is committed by impudent presumption, and often (what becomes heavier than all fault) one even prides himself concerning the committed vice. 228 For although elation is accustomed to be born from virtue, yet sometimes a foolish mind exalts itself concerning perpetrated wickedness. But when fault is joined to fault, what else than that by involved paths and knotted bonds the steps of the perverse are bound? Whence well is it said against the perverse mind under the figure of Judea through Isaiah: It shall be a lair of dragons, and a pasture of ostriches, and demons shall meet with onocentaurs, and the hairy one shall cry out one to the other (Isai. XXXIV, 13). For what is designated by dragons but malice (malitia), but what by the name of ostriches but hypocrisy (hypocrisis)? For the ostrich has the appearance of flying, but has not the use of flying, because hypocrisy also insinuates the image of holiness of itself to all looking on, but knows not how to hold the life of holiness. In the perverse mind therefore the dragon lies, and the ostrich feeds, because both latent malice is craftily covered, and the simulation of goodness is preferred to the eyes of those looking on. But what by the name of onocentaurs (onocentauri), but that both the slippery and the elate are figured? For in the Greek speech onos is called an ass, and by the appellation of an ass luxury is designated, the prophet attesting, who says: As the flesh of asses, their flesh (Ezek. XXIII, 20). But by the word of bull the neck of pride is demonstrated, as by the voice of the Lord it is said of the proud Jews through the Psalmist: Fat bulls have besieged me (Psal. XXI, 13). Onocentaurs therefore are they who, subjected to the vices of luxury, thence raise their neck, whence they ought to have been humbled. Who, serving the pleasures of their flesh, shame being expelled far away, not only do not grieve that they lose rectitude, but even yet rejoice concerning the work of confusion. But demons meet onocentaurs, because the malignant spirits serve them greatly according to their wish whom they behold rejoicing concerning these things which they ought to have wept for.

Where fitly is subjoined: And the hairy one shall cry out one to the other For who else are figured by the appellation of hairy ones (pilosi), but they whom the Greeks call Pans, the Latins incubi? whose form indeed is begun from a human effigy, but is terminated with a bestial extremity. By the name of hairy one therefore the roughness of any sin is designated, which even if at any time it begins as if from the pretext of reason, yet always tends to irrational motions; and as it were man ends in a beast, while fault, beginning through the image of reason, is drawn even to an irrational effect. For often the delight of eating serves gluttony (gula), and simulates that it serves the need of nature; and when it extends the belly into gluttony, it raises the members into luxury. But the hairy one cries out one to another, when perpetrated wickedness provokes to perpetrating another, and as it were by a certain voice of thought, fault being already committed, invites the fault which is still to be committed. For often, as we said, gluttony says: If you do not refresh the body with abundant food, you subsist in no useful labor. And when it shall have kindled the mind through the desires of the flesh, soon luxury also makes the words of its own suggestion, saying: If God did not wish men to be mixed corporally, he would not have made those very members fit for the uses of joining. And when it suggests these things as if from reason, it draws the mind to the unbridling of lusts. Which being often detected, it soon seeks the patronage of fallacy and negation; and it does not estimate itself to be guilty, if by lying it should defend its life. The hairy one therefore cries out one to another, when under some appearance of reasoning a subsequent fault entangles the perverse mind from the occasion of a preceding fault. And when hard and rough sins depress this, as if called together in it the hairy ones rule concordantly; and thus it happens that the paths of the steps always involve themselves for the worse, while fault binds the reprobate mind through fault.

[Vet. XVI, Rec. XIII.] 37. The custom of sinning is sometimes preceded by blindness of the mind, and sometimes precedes it. ---But among these things it is to be known that sometimes the eye of the intellect is first blunted, and afterwards the captured mind wanders through exterior desires, so that the blind mind knows not where it is led, and willingly subjects itself to the allurements of its flesh. But sometimes the desires of the flesh first boil up, and after long use of the illicit work they close the eye of the heart. For often the mind beholds right things, yet does not raise itself daringly against perverse things; and resisting it is conquered, while, judging this very thing which it acts, it is overcome by the delight of its flesh. For because mostly the eye of contemplation is first lost, and afterwards the mind is subjected to the labors of the world through the desires of this flesh, Samson captured by the Allophyli (Philistines) testifies, who after he lost his eyes, was deputed to the mill, because namely the malignant spirits, after they dig out the edge of contemplation within by the stings of temptations, send it outside into the circuit of labors. Again, because often even right operation is lost exteriorly, and yet the light of reason is still retained in the heart, the prophet Jeremiah insinuates, who while he narrates the captivity of Zedekiah, denounces the order of internal captivity, saying: And the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah in Riblah in his eyes, and all the nobles of Judah the king of Babylon slew, the eyes also of Zedekiah he plucked out (Jerem. XXXIX, 6). The king of Babylon is the ancient enemy, the possessor of intimate confusion, who first slays the sons before the eyes of the one looking on, because often he so kills good works, that he himself who is captured beholds them lost, grieving. For the mind mostly groans; and yet, conquered by the delights of its flesh, it loses loving the good things which it brought forth, it considers the losses which it suffers, yet does not raise the arm of virtue against the king of Babylon. But while seeing he is struck by the perpetration of wickedness, at some time he is led by the use of sin to this, that he is also deprived of the light of reason itself. Whence the king of Babylon, the sons having first been extinguished, plucked out the eyes of Zedekiah, because the malignant spirit, good works having first been withdrawn, afterwards also takes away the light of understanding. Which rightly Zedekiah suffers in Riblah. For Riblah is interpreted, 'these many things'. For to him also the light of reason is closed, who by perverse use is weighed down by the multitude of his iniquity. [Vet. XVII.] But in whatever way fault proceeds, or breaks out from whatever occasions, yet the paths of the reprobate are always involved, so that being given over to perverse concupiscences, they either seek no good things, or seeking with weak desire, by no means do they stretch the free steps of the mind to these. For they either do not begin right things, or, broken in the way itself, they reach these very little. Whence it happens mostly that they return wearied to their own custom, and prostrate themselves from the intention of the mind in the pleasures of the flesh, they think only those things which pass away, they care for none which 230 remain with them. Whence fitly is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIX.

IBID.---They shall walk in vacuum, and perish.

38. The labor of those gasping for transitory goods is empty (vacuus). ---For they walk in vacuum who carry nothing with them of the fruit of their labor. For one toils for obtaining honors, another burns for multiplying faculties, another pants for deserving praises; but because everyone dying deserts all these things here, he has lost his labors in vacuum, who has carried nothing with him before the judge. On the contrary well is it said through the law: You shall not appear in the sight of the Lord empty (vacuus) (Exod. XXIII, 15). For he who has not provided the reward of the life to be deserved by acting well, appears empty in the sight of the Lord. Hence concerning the just it is said by the Psalmist: But coming they shall come in exultation, carrying their sheaves (Psal. CXXV, 6). For to the examination of judgment they come carrying sheaves who show in themselves right works by which they may deserve life. Hence concerning each elect one the Psalmist says again: Who has not received his soul in vain (Psal. XXIII, 4). For he receives his soul in vain, who, thinking only present things, does not attend to those which follow him forever. He receives his soul in vain who, neglecting its life, prefers the care of the flesh to it. But the just do not receive their soul in vain, because by continual intention they refer to its utility whatever they operate corporally, so that even the work passing away, the cause of the work may not pass away, which prepares the rewards of life after life. But the reprobate neglect to care for these things, because surely, walking in vacuum, they flee the life following them, and finding they lose it. But better are we restrained from the imitation of the perverse, if we weigh their losses from the end. Whence well also with exhortation is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXX

VERS. 19. Consider the paths of Teman, the journeys of Sheba, and wait a little while.

39. Some are ensnared in the nets of the world under the name of honesty. Among these are they who carry on the care of household affairs, or who love their neighbors inordinately. ---Teman (Thema) indeed is interpreted South wind

(Auster), but Sheba (Saba) a net (rete). What is demonstrated here by the South wind, which dissolves members breathed upon with warmth, but a flux remission of living; what by the net but the obligation of action? For they who with a dissolved mind seek those things which are eternal, lest they should proceed with a free step to God, bind themselves by their own inordinate efforts; and when they entangle themselves in the flux acts of their own conversation, they place their feet in the meshes of the net as if about to remain. For as a little above we said that some are drawn back to faults already defeated through certain open and non-defeated vices, so some return to those things which they had left through certain things which are cloaked either by the name of honesty or the honor of praise. For there are many who now do not seek the things of others, and are divided from the quarrels of this world by a begun love of rest, they thirst to be instructed by sacred eloquoies, they desire to be vacant for supernal contemplations; yet they do not desert the care of household affairs with perfect liberty of mind, which while they serve lawfully, they are also entangled in the illicit quarrels of this world; and while they desire to protect earthly things studiously, they desert the rest of heart which they sought; and while the fleeing substance is protected by continual provision, the word of divine 231 knowledge conceived in the mind is dissipated, because, according to the sentence of Truth (Matth. XXIII, Marc. IV, Luke VIII), thorns oppress the seed having sprung up, when importunate solicitudes of earthly things expel the word of God from the memory. With dissolved steps therefore they walk in a net, who while they do not perfectly desert the world, bind themselves by walking, lest they should walk.

40. And there are many who not only do not seek the things of others, but even leave all things which they had possessed in the world, they despise themselves, they require no glory of the present life, they separate themselves from the actions of this world, and almost tread upon whatever of prosperity may have smiled upon them. But yet still bound by the bond of carnal cognation (relationship), while they serve the love of proximity indiscreetly, they return often through the effect of cognations to those things which they already subdued even with their own contempt. And when they love the neighbors of the flesh more than is necessary, being drawn back exteriorly, they are divided from the parent of the heart. For often we see some, as much as pertains to their own study, now not to have the desires of the present life, to have left the world both in work and in profession; but yet for the inordinate affections of neighbors to burst into courts (praetoria), to be vacant for the quarrels of earthly things, to leave the liberty of intimate quiet, and to restore the studies of the world already destroyed in themselves a long time ago. Whither therefore do these walk but in a net, whom the perfection of life already begun had loosed from the present world, but the inordinate love of earthly cognation binds?

41. We ought to despise, hate, and not know our relatives for the sake of God. ---For they who with strict study, and not with dissolved steps, follow the reward of the eternal promise, as they despise themselves for the sake of divine love, so they postpone all things by which they feel themselves to be hindered; and when for the sake of God it is necessary that they serve all with what they are able, for the sake of God they deny private obsequies even to relatives. For hence it is that when a certain one said: Permit me first to go and bury my father (Matth. VIII, 21), he straightway heard from the mouth of Truth: Suffer the dead to bury their dead, but go thou, announce the kingdom of God (Ibid., 22). In which matter it is to be noted that while the elect disciple is restrained from the burial of a parent, that which out of carnal affection he owes even to strangers for the sake of the Lord, he is not permitted to exhibit to a dead father for the sake of the Lord. [Vet. XVIII.] Hence again Truth says: If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple (Luke XIV, 26). In which place, namely, while the hatred of our own soul is subjoined to the hatred of relatives, it is patently shown that we are commanded to hold relatives in hatred just as ourselves, so that snatching them toward eternal things, and postponing their carnal grace when it hinders, we may learn by the tempered art of discretion both to love them conveniently and to hate them salutarily, so far as that he may know how to let hatred rise through love, that we may be able more truly to love them through hatred. Hence again it is said through Moses: Who said to his father and to his mother, I know you not; and to his brethren, I am ignorant of them; and they knew not their own children; these have kept thy eloquence and thy covenant, and have observed thy judgments (Deut. XXXIII, 9). For he desires to know God more familiarly, who for the love of piety desires not to know those whom he knew carnally. 232 For by a heavy loss divine knowledge is diminished, if it is shared with the knowledge of the flesh. Therefore everyone ought to become outside of his cognates and neighbors, if he wishes to be more truly joined to the Parent of all, so that he may love those same ones whom he usefully neglects for the sake of God so much more solidly, as he is ignorant in them of the soluble affection of carnal copula.

42. We ought to benefit our relatives more than others, provided that our progress toward God is not retarded thereby. We ought indeed to be kindly affected toward them, yet not to decline from the journey which leads to God. --- We ought indeed also temporally to benefit those to whom we are more closely joined more than others, because even a flame extends a fire to things moved near it, but first it burns that very thing where it is born. We ought to acknowledge the copula (bond) of earthly cognation; but yet to ignore this when it hinders the course of the mind, so far as that the faithful soul, kindled in divine study, may neither despise those things which are joined to itself in the lowest parts, and, rightly ordering these things in itself, may transcend them by the love of the highest things. Solicitous care must therefore be provided lest the grace of the flesh creep in, and deflect the step of the heart from the right journey, lest it hinder the force of supernal love, and press down the rising mind with a weight imposed upon it. For in such a way ought everyone to compassionated the necessities of relatives, that yet he does not permit the force of his intention to be hindered through compassion, so that affection indeed may fill the bowels of the mind, but yet may not avert it from the spiritual purpose. For neither do holy men not love the neighbors of the flesh in bestowing necessary things, but by the love of spiritual things they overcome that very love in themselves, so far as to temper it by the moderation of discretion, that through this they may not decline from the right journey even in a small or least thing. Whom they well intimate to us through the signification of the cows, which, tending toward the mountains under the Ark of the Lord, walk with an affection that is at once rigid and sensory, as it is written: Taking two cows that were giving milk to calves, they joined them to a cart, and shut up their calves at home, and placed the Ark of God upon the cart (I Kings VI, 10). And a little after: The cows went in a straight line through the way which leads to Bethshemesh, and they walked in one journey, going and lowing, and not declining neither to the right nor to the left (Ibid., 12). For behold, the calves being shut up at home, the cows which are bound to the cart under the Ark of the Lord groan and go on, they give lowings from their innermost parts, and yet they do not change their steps from the journey. They feel love indeed through compassion, but they do not deflect their necks afterward. Just so, just so is it necessary that they ought to go who, subjected to the yoke of the sacred law, now carry the Ark of the Lord through internal knowledge, so far as that through this, that they condole with the necessities of relatives, they may not decline from the begun journey of rectitude. Bethshemesh indeed is called the house of the sun. Therefore, with the Ark of the Lord placed upon it, to go to Bethshemesh is to approach the habitation of eternal light with supernal knowledge. But then we truly tend to Bethshemesh, when walking the way of rectitude, we do not decline to the neighboring sides of error even for the affection of our pledges (children). Whose grace surely ought to hold our mind, but ought not to turn it back, lest this same mind either, if it is not touched by affection, be hard; or, more touched, if it is inflected, be remiss.

[Vet. XIX.] 43. The grace of relatives ought to hold, but ought not to turn back. ---It is pleasing to behold blessed Job, in whom the yoke of divine fear had worn away the necks of the heart, under how great a moderation of discretion he carries the Ark of the divine sentence. 233 For having lost his calves he lows, because, having heard of the death of his children, he fell upon the earth with his head shaven (Job I, 20); but yet he walks with a straight journey while lowing, because his mouth is opened in groaning to the praises of God, when he straightway says: The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away, as it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done; blessed be the name of the Lord (Ibid., 21). But indiscreet minds know not this rule of living, and by as much as they seek the ways of God dissolvedly, by so much are they foolishly folded back to the journeys of the world.

44. The losses of tepidity seen in others are wont to move more piously. ---Rightly therefore the holy man mentions the paths of Teman after the journeys of Sheba, because whom the South wind (Auster) of reprobate tepidity has loosed, these surely the net of implication holds. But describing well the facts of the wicked, he admonishes to consider these, because by doing perverse things we love them, but we judge these same things seen in others; and those things which we believe less to be judged in ourselves, we know how foul they are in the action of others; and thus it happens that the mind returns to itself, and blushes to do what it reprehends. For as if from a mirror a foul face is displeasing, when the mind sees in itself from a similar life what it may turn away from. He says therefore: Consider the paths of Teman, the journeys of Sheba, and wait a little while. As if he should say openly: Attend to the losses of the tepidity of another, and then you will take hope of eternal things more firmly, if you see with the right eye of the heart what may be displeasing in others.

[Vet. XX.] 45. How usefully the brevity of this life is attended to. ---Well indeed is it said: Wait a little while. For often while the brevity of the present life is loved as if about to persevere for a long time, the mind is broken from eternal hope, and delighted with present things, is reverberated by the mist of its own desperation. And when it thinks that space which remains to it for living is long, suddenly deserting life, it finds eternal things which it may no longer be able to avoid. For hence it is that it is said through a certain wise man: Woe to those who have lost patience (Eccli. II, 16). Namely, they lose patience who, while they estimate themselves to stay a long time in visible things, desert the hope of invisible things. And when the mind is fixed in present things, life is terminated; and suddenly they arrive at unforeseen punishments, which, deceived by their own presumptions, they believed either would never happen to them, or would happen late. Hence Truth says: Watch ye therefore, because ye know not the day nor the hour (Matth. XXV, 13). Hence again it is written: The day of the Lord as a thief in the night, so shall it come (I Thess. V, 2). For because arriving to snatch the soul it is not at all seen, it is compared to a thief in the night. By so much therefore ought it to be feared as if always coming, as it cannot be foreknown by us as about to come. Whence also holy men, because they look upon the brevity of life incessantly, live as if daily dying; and they prepare themselves so much more solidly for the things about to remain, as they always weigh from the end that no transitory things are. For hence indeed the Psalmist, beholding the life of the sinner to flee with a swift course, says: Yet a little while, and the sinner shall not be (Psal. XXXVI, 10). Hence again he says: Man as grass his days (Psal. CII, 15). Hence Isaiah says: All flesh is grass, and the glory thereof as the flower of the grass (Isai. XL, 6). Hence James corrects the minds of those presuming, saying: What is your life? It is a vapor appearing for a little while (Jac. IV, 15). Rightly therefore is it said: Wait a little while, because it is even immense what follows without end, and it is little whatever is finished. For it ought not to seem long [234] to us what tends by the course of its own time that it be not; which while it is led through moments, these very moments of its own which defer it, impel it; and whence it is discerned to be held, thence it is driven that it be not held. Well moreover does blessed Job, after he brought in the despising of the brevity of the present life, straightway rise in the voice of all the elect against the iniquitous, adding:

CHAPTER XXXI.

VERS. 20.---They are confounded, because I hoped.

46. The constancy of the good affects the reprobate with shame. ---When the reprobate bring evils upon the good, if they behold these to be shaken from their internal hope, they are gladdened by the effect of the deception. For they reckon the propagation of their own error as a maximum gain, because they exult to have associates in their own perdition. But when the hope of the good is fixed within, and is by no means reclined to the depths by exterior evils, confusion occupies the mind of the wicked, because while they cannot arrive at the innermost parts of the afflicted, they blush to exist as cruel ones in vain. Therefore let the holy man say from his own voice, let him say from the constancy of the universal Church afflicted and groaning, which among the adversities of the reprobate desires the joy of supernal retribution without any defect of mind, and endures even unto life by dying: They are confounded, because I hoped. As if he should say openly: Because by hard persecutions the reprobate do not soften the force of my rigidity, blushing they doubtless lose the labor of their own cruelty. Whence also he beholds the goods of the coming retribution as if now present, and attends to what guilt remains for the reprobate in judgment, subjoining:

CHAPTER XXXII.

IBID.---They came also even unto me, and were covered with shame.

47. The trepidation of the reprobate in judgment. ---To the holy Church indeed the reprobate come in the day of judgment, because even unto her glory then to be beheld are they led through, so that repulsed to the greater punishments of their own guilt they may see what they have lost. Then indeed shame covers the wicked, when the witness of conscience convicts them in the sight of the Judge. Then the Judge is discerned exteriorly, but the accuser is tolerated interiorly. Then all guilt is brought back before the eyes, and the mind is tortured more heavily by its own fire above the burnings of Gehenna. Concerning whom it is rightly said through the Prophet: Lord, let thy hand be exalted, that they may not see; let them see and be confounded (Isai. XXVI, 11). For their merits now obscure the intellect of the reprobate, but then the knowledge of their guilt illuminates it, so that they may both not see now the things to be followed, and may discern them then after they have lost them. For now indeed they neglect to understand eternal things, or they despise the things understood when they seek them; but then they behold them understood without a doubt and desired, when they can by no means follow the things desired.

[Vet. XXI.] 48. The friends of Job covered with shame from his confidence in God. --- Which words of blessed Job also especially agree with his friends, who by hard upbraidings were attempting to shake the mind of the holy man. For he says: They are confounded, because I hoped. As if he should say openly: While by foolish increpations they cannot bend me to desperation, they themselves are confounded by the insanity of their own temerity. They came also even unto me, and were covered with shame. As if he should say: Seeing the wounds of the body, but not knowing the constancy of the mind, while they dared to upbraid me concerning injustice, they had not yet come even unto me; but pulsing me with a hard [235] invection, while they deprehend the mind to stand among adversities, they blush as if coming unto me. For by that they come unto me, by which they know me in my innermost parts; and there shame covers them, where the exterior loss does not touch me standing strongly. There are indeed some who know not how to fear God, except when they are terrified either by adversity experienced in themselves, or known in others, whom prosperous things elevate through audacity, contrary things disturb through infirmity. From whose number namely blessed Job redargues his friends to be, when he straightway subjoins, saying:

CHAPTER XXXIII.

VERS. 21.---Now you are come, and now seeing my stroke you are afraid.

49. God is to be feared even in prosperity. ---As if he should say openly: I feared God then, when, supported by prosperous things, I did not feel the detriments of scourges. But you who have not feared God out of love, dread Him from the stroke of the whip alone. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIV.

VERS. 22, 23.---Did I say: Bring to me, and give me of your substance? or: Deliver me from the hand of the enemy, and rescue me from the hand of the strong?

50. The Church does not wish to hear from those who assert perverse things concerning the faith, what they teach as true concerning morals.

Malignant spirits were created without the infirmity of the flesh. ---If these words are referred to the person of the holy Church, because we have said that the friends of blessed Job hold the type of heretics, she rightly asserts herself not to need their substance. For the substance of heretics is not inconveniently understood as carnal wisdom, by which while they are perversely supported, they show themselves as if rich in words; which the holy Church does not seek, because she transcends this by spiritual intellect. But often heretics, while they assert perverse things concerning the faith, speak some subtle things against the ancient enemy concerning the temptations of the flesh. For sometimes they show in themselves as if healthy members of operation, in which they are held in the head by the bite of the serpent wounded in faith. But the holy Church does not wish to hear from these subtle things concerning temptations, who while they assert certain true things concerning conversation, lead to the false things of perfidy. Whence it is rightly said now: Did I say: Bring to me, and give me of your substance? or: Deliver me from the hand of the enemy, and rescue me from the hand of the strong? For he calls the strength of Satan the hand of the enemy, and he names the powers of malignant spirits the hand of the strong. Whom he mentions as strong for this reason, because while they were created without the infirmity of the flesh, an adjunct imbecility does not withstand their wicked efforts. But this which is subjoined:

[Vet. XXIV.] 55. Those who rebuke others should not flatter themselves. ---For from other deeds of the saints we learn what we ought to think of others. For holy men are neither free through elation, nor submissive through fear; but when uprightness raises them to freedom of speech, the consideration of their own infirmity keeps them in humility. For although they strike the faults of delinquents rebuking them from on high, yet judging themselves more subtly within themselves, they place themselves as it were among the abject; and by as much as they pursue the evil things in others, by so much do they return more severely to repress themselves; and again by as much as they by no means spare themselves even when doing better things, by so much the more vigilantly do they reprehend the deeds of others. For what can they wonder at externally concerning human power, who also despise themselves, even when they almost already grasp the citadel of innermost sublimity? Therefore, they judge well the height of earthly loftiness from without, because the weight of pride does not burden the eye within. Whence also blessed Job, when he despised the earthly prudence, strength, and substance in his friends speaking harshly, saying: Did I say: Bring to me, and give me of your substance? or: Deliver me from the hand of the enemy; and rescue me from the hand of the strong? Teach me, and I will be silent; and if perchance I have been ignorant of anything, instruct me; what he thinks of himself, he manifests a little below, saying: You rush upon a ward (pupillum) (Verse 27). Thus it appears clearer than light in how great an infirmity he beholds himself, whom he calls a ward (pupillum). It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVI

[Rec. XVI].

VERS. 25.---Why have you detracted from the words of truth, since there is none among you who can rebuke?

56. He who wishes to correct others must be clean. He himself must be clean from vices who cares to correct those of others, so that he may not think on earthly things, nor succumb to lowest desires; so that he may see what should be avoided by others by as much more clearly as he more truly avoids these things himself through knowledge and life, because the eye which dust burdens by no means purely considers a blemish in a member, and the hands which hold mud are not able to wipe away superadded filth. Which, according to the series of the ancient translation, the divine voice well indicates to David laboring in exterior wars through a sign, when it says: You shall not build me a temple, because you are a man of blood (2 Sam. 7; 16:8; 1 Chron. 22:8). But he builds the temple of God, who is at leisure for correcting and instituting the minds of his neighbors. For we are the temple of God, who are constructed for true life by His inhabiting, Paul attesting, who says: The temple of God is holy, which you are (1 Cor. 3:17). But a man of blood is forbidden to build a temple to God, because he who still lies under carnal acts must necessarily blush to instruct the minds of neighbors spiritually. Well therefore is it said: Why have you detracted from the words of truth, since there is none among you who can rebuke? As if it were openly said: With what temerity do you reprehend what you have heard, who, being ignorant of the causes of my stroke, still bring forth reprehensible things? It follows:

CHAPTER XVII

[Rec. XVII].

VERS. 26.---You devise speeches only to rebuke, and you bring forth words into the wind.

57. Two kinds of speech are harmful to men. There are two kinds of speech very importunate and harmful to the human race: one which cares to praise even perverse things, another which always strives to correct even right things. That one is led downwards with the river, but this one endeavors to bar against the streams of truth and the channel. That one fear oppresses, this one elation raises. That one catches grace from favors, this one anger agitates so that it may be shown as if from a contest. That one lies ready at hand, this one always swells from the opposite side. Therefore, from the quality of this latter kind blessed Job refuted his friends to have been, when he says: You devise speeches only to rebuke. But whence one arrives at the audacity of unjust rebuking, was immediately made known, when he subjoined: And you bring forth words into the wind. For to bring forth words into the wind is to say idle things. For often while the tongue is by no means restrained from idle words, it is also unbridled to the temerity of foolish rebuking. For by certain steps of its own ruin a slothful mind is impelled into the pit of a fall. For while we neglect to avoid idle words, we arrive at harmful ones, so that at first it pleases to speak of the things of others, and afterwards the tongue bites by detractions the life of those of whom it speaks, and at some time it breaks out even to open insults. Hence the stings of angers are sown, strifes arise, the torches of hatreds are kindled, the whole peace of hearts is extinguished. Whence it is well said by Solomon: He who lets out water is the head of quarrels (Prov. 17:14). For to let out water is to relax the tongue into a flow of speech. Against which he also asserts in a good sense, saying: Deep water, the words from the mouth of a man (Prov. 18:4). He therefore who lets out water, is the head of quarrels, because he who does not refrain the tongue, dissipates concord. Whence on the contrary it is written: He who imposes silence on a fool, mitigates angers (Prov. 26:10).

[Vet. XXV.] 58. The evils of loquacity. The idle word. But because anyone serving loquacity cannot hold the rectitude of justice, the Prophet testifies, because he says: A talkative man (vir linguosus) shall not be directed upon the earth (Ps. 140:11). Hence Solomon says again: In loquacity sin shall not be wanting (Prov. 10:19). Hence Isaiah says: The cultivation of justice is silence (Isa. 32:17), namely indicating that the justice of the mind is desolated, when it is not spared from immoderate speech. Hence James says: If any man thinks himself to be religious, not refraining his tongue, but seducing his own heart, this man's religion is vain (James 1:26). Hence again he says: But let every man be swift to hear, but slow to speak (Ibid., 19). Hence again he adds: The tongue is an unquiet evil, full of deadly poison (James 3:8). Hence by Itself the Truth admonishes us, saying: Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall render an account of it in the day of judgment (Matt. 12:36). For an idle word is that which either lacks the reason of just necessity, or the intention of pious utility. If therefore an account is required for an idle speech, it must be greatly weighed what penalty follows that loquacity, in which sin is also committed through words of pride.

59. Without the censure of silence the whole mind lies open to the enemy. It should also be known that those who slip away through harmful words fall away from every state of rectitude. For the human mind, after the manner of water, being shut in is collected to higher things, because it seeks again that from whence it descended; and being relaxed it perishes, because it scatters itself uselessly through the lowest things. For by as many superfluous words as it is dissipated from the censure of its own silence, by so many rivers as it were it is led outside itself. Whence it does not suffice to return within to the knowledge of itself, because being scattered outside through loquacity, it loses the force of innermost consideration. Therefore it exposes itself entirely to the wounds of the lying-in-wait enemy, because it shuts itself in by no defense of custody. Whence it is written: As a city that lies open, and without a circuit of walls, so is a man who cannot contain his spirit in speaking (Prov. 25:28). For because it does not have the wall of silence, the city of the mind lies open to the arrows of the enemy; and when it casts itself out beyond itself through words, it shows itself open to the adversary, whom he overcomes without labor by so much the more easily as this same mind which is conquered fights against itself through loquacity.

60. The disadvantages of immoderate silence. But among these things it should be known that when we are restrained from speech by too much fear, sometimes we are cooped up within the barriers of silence more than is necessary; and while we incautiously flee the vices of the tongue, we are secretly involved in worse ones. For often while we are immoderately restrained from speech, we tolerate a heavy loquacity in the heart, so that thoughts boil the more in the mind as the violent custody of indiscreet silence constricts them; and for the most part they flow abroad so much the more widely as they think themselves to be more secure, because they are not seen from without by rebukers. Whence the mind sometimes is raised into pride, and beholds those whom it hears speaking as if weak. And when it closes the mouth of the body, it does not recognize how much it opens itself to vices by being proud. For it oppresses the tongue, it raises the thought; and when it by no means considers itself through negligence, it accuses all men before itself the more freely, as it also does more secretly. [Vet. XXVI.] But for the most part the very silent, when they suffer some unjust things, break forth into sharper grief by as much as they do not speak the things which they sustain. For if the tongue should calmly speak the inflicted molestations, grief would flow out from the conscience. For closed wounds torture more, because when the filth, which boils within, is cast out, the pain is opened for health. For the most part the very silent, while they look upon the evils of some, and yet in silence press the tongue, subtract as it were the use of medicine from the wounds they have seen. For they become the authors of death by so much as they would not eject by speaking the poison which they could. Whence also if immoderate silence were not in fault, the prophet would not say: Woe is me because I have held my peace (Isa. 6:5).

61. The tongue should be retained by discipline, and loosed by necessity. What therefore is there among these things, except that the tongue must be studiously refrained under the balance of great moderation, not insolubly bound, lest either being loosed it flow away into vice, or being restricted it grow torpid even from utility? For hence it is said by a certain one: A wise man will hold his peace until the time (Ecclus.

20:7), namely that when he considers it opportune, having set aside the censure of silence, by speaking those things which are congruous, he may spend himself in the use of utility. Hence Solomon says: A time of keeping silence, and a time of speaking (Eccles. 3:7). Discretely indeed the times of vicissitudes are to be weighed, lest either when the tongue ought to be restricted, it should uselessly loose itself through words; or when it can speak usefully, it should lazily restrict itself. Which the Psalmist well considering embraced in a short petition saying: Set, O Lord, a watch before my mouth, and a door of circumstance to my lips (Ps. 141:3). For a door is opened and closed. He therefore who sought not an obstacle to be placed to his mouth, but a door, clearly taught that the tongue both ought to be retained by discipline, and loosed by necessity, so that a discrete mouth both a voice may open at a congruous time, and again silence may close at a congruous time. Which because either the friends of blessed Job, or all heretics, whose type these hold, know not how to observe, they are reported to bring forth words into the wind, because namely the breath of levity carries away the sayings which the weight of discretion does not solidify.

BOOK EIGHT.

Explains the last part of the sixth chapter, from verse 27, and with the seventh the whole eighth. Furthermore, in this explanation from verse 11 of the eighth chapter to the end, he copiously discusses the vice of hypocrisy.

CHAPTER I.

1. Job's humility and love towards persecutors. By which the charity of the Church towards heretics is adumbrated. In the preceding book we have already treated, that blessed Job makes known to us the force of his humility, saying:

CAP. VI, VERS. 27.---You rush upon a ward (pupillum), and you strive to subvert your friend.

For he insinuates in how great an infirmity he weighs himself, whom he calls a ward (pupillum); but because wounded charity knows not how to recede from love, he both complains that he is willed to be subverted, and yet testifies that he is a friend. Whose words, as we have already often said, so specially agree with him, that yet through these, from the prophetic spirit, the sentiment of the faithful people, from the voice of the universal Church, is also expressed, which, tolerating the contrariety of heretics, both beholds itself as weak through humility, and yet does not recede from the magnitude of the love to be preserved. For the people of the holy Church, because it is the son of a dead father, is not incongruously called a ward (pupillum); whose life of resurrection it now indeed follows through faith, but not yet contemplates through sight (speciem). But heretics rush upon the ward (pupillum), when they afflict the humility of the faithful people with importunate and false allegations. And yet he is a friend whom they strive to overturn, because the faithful people of God does not cease by loving to call to the truth even those themselves whom it tolerates as persecutors. But among these things it should be known that holy men neither fear through infirmity to sustain false things, nor being wounded do they ever keep silence from the truth. Whence is subjoined:

CHAPTER II.

VERS. 28.---But finish what you have begun; give ear and see if I lie.

2. Patience and benignity ought to be present with true charity against adversaries. For because he does not fear to endure adverse things, let him say: But finish what you have begun. But because he does not withdraw the preachments of truth from these very persecutors of his, let him subjoin: Give ear, and see if I lie. As if he were openly saying: I neither tremble before the molestations brought upon me, nor do I hide the helps of correction from ungrateful hearers, because both pressed by evils I am exercised, and benignly spent for my very persecutors I grow.

For the mind of the saints in this battle of temptations is both fortified by the shield (clypeo) of patience, and girded with the swords of love, it takes fortitude to endure evils, and exerts benignity to repay good things, so that it may both powerfully receive the weapons of hatreds, and validly return the darts of love. For by no means does he go armed to wars who either taking a shield does not use swords, or using swords is not fortified by a shield. Whence also the soldier of God, caught in the war of adversity, both ought to bring forward the shield of patience, lest he perish; and being prompt for preaching, bring in the darts of love, that he may overcome. Of which armor Paul briefly insinuates the sum, saying: Charity is patient, is benign (1 Cor. 13:4). But when one of both is wanting, it is not charity, if, namely, either tolerating the evil without benignity, he does not love, or again, exhibiting himself without patience, he neglects to tolerate those whom he loves. In order therefore that true charity may be held by us, it is necessary that both patience should support benignity, and again benignity should support patience, so that constructing a certain great edifice in our heart, patience may solidify the citadel of benignity, and benignity may adorn the buildings founded on patience. Let therefore blessed Job, prompt for patience, say: But finish what you have begun; being endowed with benignity let him subjoin: Give ear, and see if I lie.

3. The Church strives to recall those who err by reasons. But because the holy Church, instituted from the mastership of humility, does not command as if from authority the right things which she says to those who err, but persuades from reason, well is it said now: See if I lie. As if she should openly say: By no means believe those things which I assert from authority, but weigh whether they are true from reason. Which even if she says at any time what cannot be comprehended by reason, she reasonably persuades that human reason ought not to be sought concerning hidden things. But often heretics, while they receive the occasion of reasoning, are unbridled to the quarrels of contention. Whence also aptly is soon subjoined:

CHAPTER III.

VERS. 29.---Respond, I pray you, without contention.

4. Heretics seek strifes, not reasons. For heretics do not strive to attain the truth by their inquiries, but to be seen as victors. And while they desire to be shown wise without, they are bound within by the bonds of their own pride through foolishness. Whence it comes to pass that they seek the contests of contentions, and they know not how to speak peacefully concerning God, who is our peace, and from the business of peace they become inventors of strife. To whom it is well said by Paul: But if any man seems to be contentious, we have no such custom, nor the Church of God (1 Cor. 11:16). But rightly is subjoined:

CHAPTER IV.

IBID.---And speaking that which is just, judge.

5. Nothing to be spoken inconsiderately. For he who speaks, while he awaits the sentence of the hearer concerning his words, is as it were subjected to the judgment of him by whom he is heard. He therefore who fears to be reproved in his sayings, ought himself first to examine what he says, so that between the heart and the tongue a certain just and discrete arbiter may sit, subtly weighing if the heart offers right words, which the tongue, receiving usefully, may lead to the judgment of the hearers. Blessed Job therefore, acting his own part against his friends, but denouncing ours against heretics, reprehends the precipitation of those who speak, and collects the words for their mind, saying: And speaking that which is just, judge. As if he were openly saying: If you do not wish to be reprehended in that you go forth to the egress of speech, hold the balance of justice within, so that what is said without may please from the weight of truth by as much as the balance of discretion weighs this within. And because these men exert a right judgment towards the words of others, who know first how to judge their own, after he said: Speaking that which is just, judge, aptly he soon subjoins:

CHAPTER V.

VERS. 30.---And you shall not find iniquity in my tongue, nor shall foolishness resound in my jaws.

6. The censor of his own words judges more rightly of those of others. Falsehoods must first be refuted, before truths are taught. As if he were openly saying: If you weigh your own things more subtly, you consider the things of others more truly, and when what you say begins to be right, you will recognize as just what you hear. For my tongue by no means resounds foolishness to you, if it does not proceed from your own conscience. Thus the holy Church strives first to show the assertions of enemies to be false, and then to open the preachings of truth, because when they estimate that they hold right things, they contumaciously impugn the right things which they hear. Beforehand, therefore, it is necessary that heretics feel their error, lest they contradict the truth they have heard, because if the plowman does not root out the thorns of the fields with the cutting of the plowshare, the earth does not produce the received seeds into a crop; and when the physician does not cast out the rottenness by the opening of the wound, healthy flesh by no means unites in the place of the rottenness. First, therefore, destroying perverse things, let him say: Speaking that which is just, judge; but afterwards insinuating right things, let him add: And you shall not find iniquity in my tongue, nor shall foolishness resound in my jaws. Heretics, moreover, are wont to say some things openly, and to hold others in secret. For by the tongue open speech is designated, but by the jaws secret handling.

7. The Church does not bring forth some things openly and hide others, after the manner of heretics. In the holy Church, therefore, neither does iniquity resound in the tongue, nor foolishness in the jaws, because those things which she preaches through public speech, she also keeps through intimate faith; nor does she teach one thing in the open, and retain another in secret, but she both brings out by speaking what she feels, and guards by living what she speaks; and from the banquet of supernal wisdom, whatever emanates through the tongue of preaching, this she tastes through the jaws of silent expectation. But blessed Job, being indeed one member of the universal Church, insinuating his own things, and manifesting the hearts of all the elect, let him open all that he feels, so that the attestation of his speech may make known the rectitude of his mind. It follows:

[Vet. IV, Rec. III].

CHAP. VII, VERS. 1.---The life of man upon earth is a warfare.

8. Our life is both a warfare and a temptation in the same sense. It is itself a temptation to itself. In this place, in the old translation, the life of man is by no means called a warfare, but a temptation. But if the sense of each word is looked at, that which resounds outwardly is indeed diverse, but it forms concordantly one and the same understanding. For what but a fight against evil spirits is expressed by the name of temptation? And what by the designation of warfare, but exercise against enemies? Temptation therefore is itself warfare, because while it watches against the snares of evil spirits, it undoubtedly toils in the preparation for battles. But it is to be noted, that this same life of man is not said to have temptation, but is asserted to be itself a temptation. For having spontaneously fallen from the state of its condition, and subjected to the rottenness of its own corruption, while it generates troubles for itself from itself, it has already become that which it tolerates. For because, being inclined, it has deserted the state of the mind, what has it found in itself but a motion of variety? Whence now, even if it raises itself to seek the highest things, it immediately falls back to itself by the impulse of slippery mutability. It wishes to stand in contemplation, but it is not able. It strives to fix the step of thought, but is unnerved by the lapses of its own infirmity. Which burdens of its mutability, because it sought them willingly, it carries unwillingly. Man could have possessed the flesh in quiet, if, being well formed by the Author, he had wished to be possessed by Him. And when he studied to raise himself against the Creator, he immediately found in himself the contumely of the flesh. But because along with the fault, the punishment is also propagated from the origin, we are born with the vice of infirmity inserted in us, and as it were we lead an enemy with us, whom we overcome with labor. The very life of man therefore is a temptation, for which there arises from itself that by which it may be destroyed. Which, although it always cuts down by virtue what it generates by infirmity, yet it always generates by infirmity what it may cut down by virtue.

9. In how many ways we are tempted; how one temptation succeeds another. Thus therefore human life is a temptation, so that although it is already restrained from the perpetration of iniquity, yet in its very good works it is darkened, now by the memory of evils, now by the mist of seduction, now by the interruption of its own intention. For one already restrains the flesh from lust, but yet still tolerates the phantasms of lust, because of those things which he did willingly, he remembers unwillingly, and sustains as a punishment what he thought was pleasure. But because he fears to be drawn back to the conquered fault, he restricts the belly with the vigor of a wonderful abstinence, and the countenance grows pale from abstinence; and when the pallor is seen on the face, the life is praised by men as reverend; and soon vainglory comes to the mind of the abstainer with words of favor, which the shaken mind, while it is not able to subject it, seeks to wipe away from the face the pallor through which it had come; and so it happens that, bound by the ties of infirmity, either fleeing the pallor of abstinence, he fears again to be subjected to lust through food, or, overcoming the impulse of lust through abstinence, he greatly fears that his pallor may fight for vainglory. Another, overcoming the lapse of pride, already apprehends the state of humility with all desire; and when he sees certain proud ones break out even to the oppression of the innocent, kindled by the excitation of zeal, he is forced to postpone to some extent what he had decreed, exerts the force of rectitude, and contradicts the depraved not with meekness, but with authority. Whence it often happens that either by the study of humility he deserts the zeal of rectitude, or again by the zeal of rectitude he disturbs the study of humility which he was holding. And since the authority of zeal and the humility of the purpose can hardly be preserved together, the man is rendered unknown to himself by the perturbation, so that he vehemently doubts, lest in the seduced mind either pride should insinuate itself under the authority of zeal, or fearful torpor should feign humility. Another, considering how great is the fault of fallacy, determines to fortify himself in the citadel of truth, so that a false speech may no longer go forth from his mouth, and he may disjoin himself utterly from the transgression of lying. But it often happens that when the truth is said, the life of a neighbor is burdened; and when he fears to inflict injury on another, he returns as if by the study of piety to that vice of fallacy which he had recently suppressed; and so it happens that although malice does not hold the mind, yet in it the shadow of a lie obscures the ray of truth. Whence also often because each one being questioned is not able to be silent, he either, speaking what is false, slaughters his own mind, or, speaking truths, burdens the life of his neighbor. Another, excited by the love of his Creator, takes care to suspend the mind from earthly thoughts by assiduous prayer, and to place it in the secret security of intimate rest; but in the very ascent of his prayer, while he strives to be raised from the lowest things, he is repelled by the phantasm of the lowest things; and the eye of the mind is stretched to behold the light, but from corporeal use, it is obscured by the rising images of earthly things. Whence it often happens that the mind of the intentional person, fatigued by its own infirmity, either, deserting prayer, becomes torpid by sloth, or, if it remains long in prayer, the mist of the images that have arisen thickens before its eyes.

[Vet. V.] 10. From the occasion of virtues we sometimes fall more grievously. Well therefore is it said: The life of man upon earth is a temptation, when it finds there also the guilt of descent, where it thought it had apprehended the progress of ascent; and from there the mind is confounded, whence it was striving to rise from confusion, so that through this it may return lashed to itself, through which, being already collected and joined together, it was passing beyond itself. This one, being a stranger to the erudition of the divine law, is depressed by his own ignorance, lest he should work anything for obtaining salvation. That one, endowed with the knowledge of the divine law, while he rejoices that understanding is supplied to him above others, because he exults in a private joy, dissipates in himself the gifts of the perceived understanding; and from there he is exhibited in judgment worse than the others, from whence he was shown for a time clearer than the others. Because the gifts of virtues do not raise this one, he declines even from the simple way of rectitude; and deputing himself as a stranger to the heavenly gift, he does perverse things as if more securely, by as much as he did not perceive the sublime gifts of the supernal gift. The spirit of prophecy fills that one, raises him to foreknowledge, and shows him all future things as already present. But while often and in many things he is raised above himself, that he may truly contemplate the future, the mind, led into self-confidence, estimates that the spirit of prophecy, which cannot always be had, is always present with him; and when he thinks everything he feels is prophecy, because he attributes this to himself even when he does not have it, he also loses it in so far as he could have had it. And so it happens that from there he returns sad after the merits of others, from whence he was going before joyful in the estimation of all. Therefore the life of man upon earth is a temptation, which either being a stranger to virtues is not able to rise to the heavenly reward, or being enriched with spiritual gifts sometimes falls more grievously from the occasion of virtues.

[Vet. VI.] 11. Our life is a warfare, because like this, in growing it decreases and is finished. But because a little above we said that this temptation is the same as warfare, it is to be known above all that something more is hinted to us by the designation of warfare than by the name of temptation. For this is added to our understanding by the expression of warfare, that certainly through warfare one tends daily toward the end; and when by the order of warfare the place increases, the whole warfare of men fails at the same time. The life of man upon earth therefore is a warfare, because also, as we said above (Book VII, n. 31), each one while daily tending toward the end of life through the increments of times, by increasing life, ceases to live. For he expects the days to come; but when they come for the increase of life, they are already subtracted from the increase of life, because the step of a traveler also, while it profits in the forward parts, the journey that remains decreases. Our life therefore is a warfare, which by the fact that it is led to increase, by that it is finished so as not to be. Well therefore is it said: The life of man upon earth is a warfare, because while it desires to grow through the spaces of times, from that same space, which it collects by losing, it passes through by growing. Whence also the course of the warfare itself is aptly expressed, when it is immediately subjoined:

CHAPTER VII.

IBID.---And like the days of a hireling are his days.

12. The elect, after the likeness of a hireling, wishes his days to be swiftly rolled away. He labors in what is another's. He takes care lest any day should slip away empty of work. A hireling desires his days to be rolled away more swiftly, that he may arrive without delay at the reward of his labor. The days therefore of a man wise with true and eternal wisdom are rightly compared to the days of a hireling, because he considers the present life a way and not a fatherland, a warfare and not a palm; and he sees himself to be further away from the reward, the later he comes to the end. It is also to be considered that a hireling toils in the labors of others, but yet prepares for himself his own reward. Moreover by the voice of our Redeemer it is said: My kingdom is not of this world (John 18:36). All of us therefore who, being endowed with the hope of heavenly things, are worn away by the exercise of the present life, labor in what is another's. For often we are forced to serve even the reprobate, we are constrained to return to the world the things that are the world's; and indeed we are fatigued by the labor of another, but yet we perceive our rewards; and through this we arrive at our own, that we purely minister the things of others. On the contrary, Truth says to some: If you have not been faithful in that which is another's, who will give you that which is your own? (Luke 16:12). It is also to be known that a hireling carefully takes care to inspect lest ever a day should slip away empty of work, and the expected end of time should come in vain for remuneration. For in the study of labor he beholds what he may be able to perceive in the time of remuneration. For when work increases, the confidence of the reward advances; but when the work has become torpid, hope languishes from the remuneration. Whence also each of the elect, weighing his life as the days of a hireling, tends so much more confidently by hope toward the reward, by as much as he now more robustly endures to the increase of labor; he weighs what is the course of the present time, counts the days with the works, fears lest the moments of life pass empty of labor; he rejoices in adversities, is refreshed by passion, is comforted by sorrow, because he sees himself to be remunerated so much more largely with the rewards of the subsequent life, by as much as for the love of Him he more truly spends himself in daily deaths. For hence it is that the citizens of the supernal fatherland say to its Creator with the voices of the Psalmist: For your sake we are put to death all the day long (Psalm 44:22). Hence Paul says: I die daily for your glory, brothers (1 Cor. 15:31). Hence again he says: For which cause I suffer these things, but I am not ashamed; for I know whom I have believed, and I am certain that he is powerful to keep my deposit until that day (2 Tim. 1:12). Holy men therefore, as many labors as they now exhibit commending them to the truth, so many pledges of their remuneration they already hold closed within the chamber of hope. But a heavy heat is now felt in the work, so that at some time refreshment may be perceived from rest. Whence also aptly it is soon subjoined:

CHAPTER VIII

[Rec. IV.].

VERS. 2, 3.---As a servant desires the shadow, and as a hireling waits for the end of his work, so also I have had empty months, and have counted to myself laborous nights.

13. He desires eternal rest. He is a servant, not free, as long as he is subject to corruption. For a servant to desire the shadow is to seek the rest of eternal refreshment after the heat of temptation and the sweat of work. For that servant had desired this shadow who said: My soul has thirsted after the living God; when shall I come and appear before the face of God? (Psalm 42:3). And again: Woe is me, that my sojourning is prolonged! (Psalm 120:5). Who as if fleeing the heat from sharp labor, and seeking the covering of refreshment to obtain rest, says again: I shall go into the place of the wonderful tabernacle, even to the house of God (Psalm 42:5). Paul was panting to apprehend this shadow, having a desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ (Phil. 1:23). To this shadow they had already arrived from the perfection of desire who were saying: We who have borne the burden of the day and the heat (Matt. 20:12). Moreover he who is said to desire the shadow is rightly called a servant, because each of the elect, as long as he is constrained by the condition of infirmity, is held under the yoke of dominant corruption, as if under the anxiety of heat. Who certainly when he shall have been stripped of corruption, then he becomes known to himself as free and tranquil. Whence also it is rightly said by Paul: The creature itself shall be delivered from the servitude of corruption, into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God (Rom. 8:21). For the punishment of corruption now weighs down the elect, but then the glory of incorruption exalts them; and as much as regarding the weights of present necessity nothing of liberty is now shown in the sons of God, so much truly regarding the glory of subsequent liberty, nothing of servitude will then appear in the servants of God. The creature therefore, having put off the servitude of corruption, and having received the dignity of liberty, is turned into the glory of the sons of God, because, being united to God through the spirit, it is declared as if to have passed through and subjected that very thing which is a creature. But he who still desires the shadow is a servant, because as long as he tolerates the heat of temptations, he carries the yoke of a miserable condition. Where it is aptly subjoined: And as a hireling waits for the end of his work.

[Rec. V.] 14. The labor of the elect is lightened by the consideration of the reward. For when a hireling beholds the works to be done, he immediately binds his mind from the length and weight of the labor; but when he recalls his languishing mind to the consideration of the reward of the work, he soon reforms the vigor of his mind for the exercise of labor, and what he weighed as heavy from the work, he estimates as light from the remuneration. Even so all the elect, when they suffer the adversities of this world, when they tolerate insults to their integrity, loss of goods, and tortures of the body, weigh as heavy those things by which they are exercised, but when they stretch the eyes of the mind to the consideration of the eternal fatherland, they find from the comparison of the reward how light is that which they suffer. For what is shown to be very unsupportable from pain, is lightened by provident consideration from the remuneration. Hence it is that Paul is always raised up more robust than himself against adversities, because certainly he waits for the end of his work as a hireling. For he estimates what he sustains as heavy, but weighs this as light through the consideration of the reward. He indeed indicates how heavy is that which he suffers (2 Cor. 11:23), who testifies that he has been in prisons more abundantly, in stripes above measure, in deaths frequently; who from the Jews five times received forty stripes save one, who was three times beaten with rods, once stoned, three times suffered shipwreck, a night and a day he was in the depth of the sea; who bore perils of rivers, of robbers, from his own race, from the Gentiles, in the city, in the wilderness, in the sea, among false brothers; who labored in toil and misery, in many fastings, in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness; who sustained combats without, fears within; who asserts that he was burdened beyond his strength, saying: We were burdened above measure, beyond our strength, so that we were weary even of living (2 Cor. 1:8). But how he wipes away the sweat of so great labor with the linen of remuneration, he himself announces, saying: The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the future glory which shall be revealed in us (Rom. 8:18). He therefore waits for the end of his work as a hireling who, while he considers the progress of the remuneration, estimates as vile that in which he labors almost failing. Moreover it is aptly subjoined: If I also have had empty months, and have counted laborous nights to myself.

15. To the elect there are empty months and laborous nights, as they suffer want and adversities, and do not yet hold the reward. For the elect serve the Creator of things, and are often distressed by the want of things; through love they inhere in God, and yet they lack the supports of the present life. Those therefore who through their actions do not seek present things, lead empty months from the gains of the world. They also tolerate laborous nights, because they carry the darkness of adversities not only as far as want, but often even to the torture of the body. For to suffer contempt and indigence is not laborous to good minds; but when adversity is turned even to the affliction of the flesh, labor is undoubtedly felt from the pain. [Vet. VIII] It can also be understood not inconveniently that each saint leads empty months like a hireling, because he already sustains the labor, but does not yet hold the reward; he tolerates this, he expects that. But he counts laborous nights, because he heaps up for himself the adversities of the present time by exercising himself in virtues. For if he did not desire to progress in the mind, perhaps he would feel the things of the world as less harsh.

16. The Church has empty months in weak members, and laborous nights in strong ones. Labor for the world is known to be vain from its end. Which sentence, however, if it is brought to the voice of the holy Church, its understanding is investigated a little more subtly. For she herself has empty months, who sustains in her weak members earthly actions flowing away without the reward of life. She herself counts laborous nights, who in her strong members carries multiple tribulations. For in this life some things are laborous, some are empty, and some indeed are empty and laborous at the same time. For to be exercised by the tribulations of the present life for the love of the Creator is indeed laborous, but it is not empty. But to be dissolved in pleasures for the love of the world is indeed empty, but not laborous. But to suffer some adversities for the love of that same world is both empty and laborous at the same time, because both the mind is affected by the adversity, and it is not filled with the reward of remuneration. In those therefore who, being already placed in her, still flow away in pleasures, and therefore are not enriched with the fruit of good work, the holy Church leads empty months, because she spends the times of life without the gift of retribution. But in those who, devoted to eternal desires, suffer the adversities of this world, she counts laborous nights, because she carries the darkness of tribulations as if in the mist of the present life. But in those who both love the passing world, and yet are fatigued by its contrariety, she tolerates both empty months and laborous nights at the same time, because no subsequent retribution rewards their life, and the present tribulation distresses them. Moreover, she rightly asserts that she has in them not days, but empty months. For by the name of months the collection and sum of days is signified. Through the day therefore each action is expressed, but through the months the end of the actions is hinted. And often when we do something in this world, suspended by an intense alacrity of hope, we do not think that very thing which we are doing is empty; but after we have arrived at the end of our actions, not obtaining what we seek, we grieve that we have labored in vain. We lead therefore not only empty days, but also empty months, when we weigh that we have labored without fruit in earthly actions, not from the beginning of the actions, but from the end. For when adversity follows our labors, as it were empty months of our life are proved, because from the completion of the actions it is recognized how vainly we were toiling in the actions.

17. The Church groans over this empty labor. But because in sacred eloquence night is sometimes put for ignorance, Paul testifying, who says to the disciples knowing the future life: You are all children of light, and children of the day; we are not of the night nor of darkness (1 Thess. 5:5); to whom he premised: But you, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief (Ibid. 4); the voice of the holy Church can be received in this place from the person of those who, after the mist of their ignorance, return to the love of rectitude, and, illustrated by the rays of truth, wash away with tears what they have erred. For each one being illuminated looks back on how base it was that he labored for the love of the present life. [Vet. IX.]. In them therefore the holy Church, in whom she returns to life, compares her labor to a sweltering servant and a hireling desiring the end, saying: As a servant desires the shadow and as a hireling waits for the end of his work: so also I have had empty months, and have counted laborous nights to myself. For in the comparison there are two things which he premised; in the expression of fatigue also he immediately added two. To the sweltering one indeed he rendered empty months, because the more eternal refreshment is sought, the more it is seen how emptily one labors for this life. But to the one waiting he subjoined laborous nights, because the more we inspect from the end of the work the reward which we attain, the more we groan that we have long been ignorant of what we seek. Whence also the care itself of the penitent is vigilantly expressed, that he might be said to have counted laborous nights, because the more truly we return to God, the more subtly we weigh, grieving, the labors which we have endured in this world through ignorance. For the more sweet what he desires of eternal things becomes to each one, the more heavy is shown to him that which he was tolerating for the love of present things. But if the following words are weighed according to history alone, through these without doubt is expressed the mind of the one grieving, how it is varied through diverse motions of desire, sadness impelling. For it is subjoined.

CHAPTER IX.

VERS. 4.---If I sleep, I shall say: When shall I arise? and again I shall expect the evening.

18. The one grieving despises present things, expects future things. For in the night the day is sought, in the day the evening is desired, because certainly pain does not permit present things to please; and since it affects the mind through the experience of present things, it always stretches it toward other things through expectation, as if by a consoling desire. But because the afflicted mind is led by appetite, and yet its pain, even when seduced by desires, is not finished, it is rightly subjoined,---IBID.:---I shall be filled with sorrows even until darkness. Moreover the cause of the same pain is expressed, when it is immediately subjoined:

[Rec. VI].

VERS. 5.---My flesh is clothed with rottenness, and with the filth of dust; my skin has withered and is drawn together.

19. The instability of fallen man.---But we discuss these things more subtly and fittingly if we return to the order of the preceding exposition.

For by sleep the torpor of idleness is expressed, but by rising the exercise of action. Also by the name of evening, because it is suitable for sleep, the desire for idleness is again figured. But the Holy Church, as long as it leads a life of corruption, does not cease to bewail the losses of its mutability. For man had been created for this purpose: that, with his mind standing firm, he might raise himself to the citadel of contemplation, and no corruption might turn him away from the love of his Creator. But in that he moved the foot of his will from the innate solidity of standing toward fault, he immediately fell from the love of the Creator into himself. Deserting the love of God, namely the true citadel of standing, he could not even consist in himself, because, by the impulse of slippery mutability, rushing down below himself through corruption, he even disagreed with himself. Who now, because he is not fixed by the solidity of his condition, is always varied by the motion of alternating desire, so that when quiet he desires action, and when occupied he pants for rest. For because the fixed mind would not stand when it could, it is no longer able to stand even when it wishes. For deserting the contemplation of its Creator, it lost the strength of its salvation, and wherever placed, being always sick, it seeks another place. Expressing therefore the variety of the human mind, let him say: If I lie down, I shall say: When shall I arise? and again I shall expect the evening. As if he said openly: Nothing perceived suffices the mind, because it has lost Him who truly could suffice. For in sleep I desire rising, in rising I expect the evening, because even when quiet I appetite the exercise of action, and when exercised I seek the rest of quiet.

20. The just man must also seek to rise from sin. Lest he be exalted, he desires to be fortified by adversities. ---Which however can be understood in another way. For to sleep is to lie in sins. For if the appellation of sleep were not a fault, Paul would by no means say to his disciples: Awake, ye just, and sin not (1 Cor. 15:34). Whence also he admonishes his auditor, saying: Arise thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall enlighten thee (Eph. 5:14). And again: It is now the hour for us to rise from sleep (Rom. 13:11). Whence also Solomon rebukes the sinner, saying: How long, sluggard, wilt thou sleep (Prov. 6:9)? Every elect person, therefore, when he is pressed by the sleep of sin, endeavors to arise to the vigils of justice. But often when he has arisen, he feels himself exalted by the very magnitude of his virtues. Whence also he desires to be tempted by the adversities of the present life after virtues, lest he fall worse from confidence in virtues. For if he did not know that he is better preserved through temptation, the Psalmist would by no means say: Prove me, O Lord, and tempt me (Psal. 26:2). Well therefore is it now said: If I lie down, I shall say: When shall I arise? and again I shall expect the evening, because even in the sleep of sin the light of justice is sought; and when prosperous things of virtues elevate the mind, helping adversity is desired, so that indeed the soul, when it is lifted up more than it ought with the joy of its virtues, may be solidified through contrariety by the sorrow brought forth by the present life. Whence also it is by no means said: I shall dread the evening, but I shall expect it. For we expect prosperous things, we dread adverse things. The just man, therefore, expects the evening, because when it is necessary for him to be exercised by tribulation, that very adversity becomes prosperous to him.

21. He is never not subject to the temptation of sin here. He does not fear temptations, but prepares himself against them. ---By the name of evening, the temptation of sin can also be designated, which often assails the mind all the more sharply, as the Spirit raises that same mind higher toward heavenly things. For by no means is sin so deserted in this life through the exercise of justice, that one may remain unshaken in that same justice, because even if righteousness already eliminates fault from the habitation of the heart, yet that same fault which is repelled, sitting at the doors of our thought, knocks that it may be opened to it. Which Moses also spiritually hinted at, when he narrated the moments of time corporally made, saying: Light was made; and adding a little after: The evening was made (Gen. 1:3, 5). Certainly the Creator of all, foreknowing human fault, then expressed in time what now is turned in the mind. For light is led toward evening, because certainly the shadow of temptation follows the light of righteousness. But because the light of the elect is not extinguished by temptation, by no means night, but evening is said to have been made, because certainly temptation often hides the light of justice in the heart of the righteous, but does not destroy it; it draws it as if to the pallor of trepidation, but does not utterly extinguish it. The elect therefore after sleep appetite rising, after rising they wait for evening, because they both awake from sin to the light of justice, and placed in the very light of justice, they always prepare themselves against the allurements of temptations. Which indeed they do not fear, but expect, because they are not ignorant that even trials profit the utility of their righteousness.

22. No one here possesses complete health.--- However much they contend with virtue against their corruption, they cannot have complete health until the day of the present life is finished. Whence it is added: And I shall be filled with sorrows even until darkness. For now adverse things rush in: now prosperous things themselves also entice with crafty hilarity. Now rising vices excite the war of the flesh, now vanquished they call the soul to elation. The life of the good therefore is filled with sorrows even until darkness, because as long as the time of corruption is acted out, it is shaken by internal and external affliction, and does not find the security of salvation, unless when it leaves the day of temptation fundamentally. Whence well also this same cause of sorrows is immediately subjoined, when it is said: My flesh is clothed with rottenness and with the filth of dust. For as we said a little above, man voluntarily deserted his innate solidity, and plunged himself into the whirlpool of corruption; whence now he either slips through unclean works, or is defiled through illicit thoughts. For that I may so speak, penally subjected to its own fault, our very nature has now become outside nature; and if relaxed it is led even to perverse works, but if restricted it is darkened by the importunate thought of perverse works. Therefore through the completion of illicit action rottenness affects the flesh, but through the levity of wicked thought dust rises as if before the eyes. By consenting to vices we are worn away by rottenness, but by tolerating the images of vices in the heart we are defiled by the filth of dust. He says therefore: My flesh is clothed with rottenness and with the filth of dust. As if he said openly: The carnal life, which I suffer, either the wasting of slippery operation pollutes, or from the memory of vices the darkness of miserable thought oppresses.

23. The flesh of the Church rots in its slippery members, and becomes filthy in those seeking the earth. ---Which however if we receive from the voice of the universal Church, we sometimes find it without doubt burdened by the rottenness of the flesh, and sometimes by the filth of dust. For there are many in it who, while they serve the love of the flesh, rot with the stench of luxury. And there are some who indeed abstain from the pleasure of the flesh, but yet lie with their whole mind in earthly acts. Let the Holy Church therefore say by the voices of its one member, let it say what it tolerates from both kinds of men: My flesh is clothed with rottenness and with the filth of dust. As if it openly suggested, saying: There are many who are members to me through faith, but yet are not healthy or clean through action, because either, conquered by foul desires, they flow down to the rottenness of corruption, or, given to earthly acts, they are sprinkled with dust. For in those whom I tolerate as slippery, I groan for the flesh rotting; but in those whom I suffer as seeking the earth, what else do I carry but one defiled by dust?

24. The skin of the Church are those who serve only exterior cares: whence it should wither. --- Whence also it is subjoined aptly about both at once: My skin has withered, and is drawn together. For in the body of the Holy Church those who serve only exterior cares are congruously called the skin. Which skin indeed is drawn by withering, because the minds of the carnal, while they love present things, and covet them as if placed nearby, will not be stretched toward future things through long-suffering. Who while they neglect the fatness of internal hope, become withered so that they are drawn, because if despair did not dry up their hearts, by no means would the heat of this smallness of mind draw them. For the Psalmist had dreaded this drawing when, fearing the dryness of the mind, he said: Let my soul be filled as with marrow and fatness (Psal. 63:5). For the fatness of fatness fills the soul, when the infusion of heavenly hope refreshes it against the heat of present desires. The skin therefore withering is drawn together when the heart, given to exterior things and dried up by despair, is not stretched into the love of its Author, but is folded back in itself, so to speak, in wrinkled thought.

25. He is not held by the love of present things who considers the brevity of this life. --- But it must be weighed that carnal minds for this reason love present things, because they by no means weigh how fugitive the life of the flesh is. For if they beheld the speed of its passage, they would by no means love it even when prospering. But the Holy Church daily beholds in its elect how great is the course in exterior things, and for that reason fixes the foot of solicitous intention in its inmost parts. Whence also it is subjoined aptly:

[Rec. VII].

VERS. 6.---My days have passed more swiftly than a web is cut off by the weaver.

26. The time of the flesh is aptly compared to a web.---By a very suitable similitude the time of the flesh is compared to a web, because as a web profits by threads, so mortal life by individual days; but in that it profits toward increase, in that it tends toward incision, because, as we also said above (Lib. VII, n. 30), when perceived times pass by, those to come are shortened, and of the whole space of life those which come become fewer, in that many are those which have passed. For a web, bound below and above, is fastened to two pieces of wood so that it may be woven; but in that the woven part is rolled up below, in that what is to be woven is unfolded above; and whence it multiplies itself toward increase, thence what remains becomes less. So indeed we roll up the times of our life, both those passed as if below, and we unfold those to come from above, because by how much the more they become past, by so much the less do they begin to be future. But because even the web does not suffice for the expression of our time, for the velocity of our life passes even its haste, it is rightly said now: My days have passed more swiftly than a web is cut off by the weaver. For a web has slowness of progress, but the present life has no delay of failure. For in that, when the hand of the laborer is fixed, the term of arrival is elongated; in this indeed, because we incessantly consume time always ending, we arrive at the end of our journey even by resting, and we go through the course of our transit even while sleeping. The elect therefore, because they behold the moments of the present life run down under haste, by no means fix the intention of the heart in this journey of such great mobility. Whence also it is subjoined aptly immediately:

IBID.---And they are consumed without any hope.

27. The elect think of death even when healthy, the reprobate not even when it is imminent.---The mind of the reprobate is bound with such great love toward the days of the present life, that they always so desire to live here, as to wish, if they were able, never to finish the course of living. For they despise thinking of future things, they place all hope in passing things, they covet to have nothing except those which pass away. And when they think too much on passing things, and hope for nothing in lasting things, the eye of the heart is so closed by insensible blindness, that it is in no way directed toward eternal light. Whence it happens that often now trouble shakes the body, and neighboring death cuts the strength of the vital spirit, and yet they do not cease to care for what things are of the world. And already the Avenger draws them to judgment; and yet they themselves, occupied by solicitous ordination of passing things, think of nothing else except how they may yet live in this world. Leaving all things, they dispose of them as if possessing them, because the hope of living is not broken even when life is terminated. Already they are drawn to judgment by sentence, and yet they still cling to things to be had by care. For by a hard mind death is believed to be far away, even when it is felt. And so the soul is loosed from the flesh, that retaining itself toward present things with immoderate love, while it is led to eternal punishment, it does not even know this very thing whither it is led; and deserting what it would not love with an end, it suddenly finds without end what it never foresaw. But on the contrary, the mind of the righteous is stretched toward the intention of eternity, even when the present life happily accompanies it. It uses great health of flesh, yet the soul is not retarded by its confidence. It does not yet break through any point of death, and daily it beholds this as if present.

For because life falls away incessantly, the hope of living is fundamentally amputated for it. Well therefore is it said of the days passing by: They are consumed without any hope. As if it were said openly: I have not placed the confidence of my mind in the present life, because I have despaired of everything that passes by treading upon it. Whence also it is subjoined aptly soon:

[Rec. VIII].

VERS. 7.---Remember that my life is wind.

28. The present life, dear to those not attending to eternal things, is vile to those who attend. The consideration of brief life is a grateful offering to God.---For they love the life of the flesh as if permanent, who do not attend to how great is the eternity of the following life; and when they do not consider the solidity of perenniality, they think the exile to be the fatherland, the darkness to be light, the course to be the station, because those who are ignorant of greater things are by no means able to judge of the least. For the order of judgment requires that we transcend what we strive to examine. For if the mind is not able to be over all things, by no means does it see clearly about these things by which it is conquered. Therefore the reprobate mind does not suffice to estimate the course of the present life, because it succumbs to its admiration out of love. But holy men, by how much they raise the heart toward eternal things, weigh how brief is that which is closed by an end; and that becomes vile in their senses which passes by, in that by a radiating intellect there inter-shines what once received never recedes; and when they behold the infinity of perenniality, they no longer desire as great whatever a limit narrows. But the uplifted mind is led outside the terms of times, even when it is held by the flesh in time; and it despises things to be ended all the more highly, by how much more truly it knows infinite things. But this very consideration of human brevity is a great offering of virtue to our Author. Whence rightly now with deprecation the sacrifice of that same virtue is offered, when it is said: Remember that my life is wind. As if it were said openly: Look benignly upon one passing swiftly, because I ought to be seen all the more mercifully by thee, by how much I myself do not turn away my eyes from the consideration of my brevity. But because while the time of the present life is cut off, one does not return further to the operation of meriting pardon, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XIV.

IBID.---Neither shall my eye return to see good things.

29. After death there is no place for meriting pardon.---The eye of the dead does not return to see good things, because the soul, having put off the flesh, does not return to exhibit right works. Hence it is that the rich man whom the flame of hell was tormenting, because he had recognized that he could not repair himself by working; for he was busy to profit not at all himself, but his brothers who were left behind, saying: I pray thee, father Abraham, that thou wouldst send him into the house of my father, for I have five brothers, that he may testify to them, lest they also come into this place of torments (Luke 16:27). For hope, even if false, is wont to refresh a sad mind. But that the reprobate may feel their punishment more heavily, they also lose hope of pardon. Whence, delivered to the avenging flames, he desired to help, as we said, not himself, but his brothers, because he recognized, with the added supplication of despair, that he would never be free from the torments of the fires. Hence Solomon says: Whatever thy hand is able to do, work instantly, because neither work, nor reason, nor knowledge, nor wisdom will be among those below, whither thou hastenest (Eccl. 9:10). By no means, therefore, shall the eye return to see good things, because the mind, finding its retribution, is in no way recalled to the use of operation. Because, therefore, everything that is seen flees, and those things which follow are to remain, blessed Job well embraced both in one verse, saying: Remember that my life is wind, neither shall my eye return to see good things. For having contemplated the course of present things, he said: Remember that my life is wind. But considering the eternity of the following things, he added: Neither shall my eye return to see good things. Where also he aptly takes up the voice of the whole human race, destitute of the gift of redemption, saying:

[Old XIII].

VERS. 8.---Neither shall the sight of man behold me.

30. Then the grace of Christ does not free him, whom it does not reform now.---For the sight of man is the mercy of the Redeemer, which, when it looks back, softens the hardness of our insensibility. Whence, the Gospel also testifying, it is said: The Lord looked back at Peter, and Peter remembered the word which Jesus had said; and going out, he wept bitterly (Luke 22:61). But the sight of man no longer beholds the soul put off from the flesh, because after death he does not free him, whom before death grace did not reform for pardon. For hence Paul says: Behold now is the acceptable time, behold now is the day of salvation (2 Cor. 6:2). Hence the Psalmist says: Since his mercy is for the age (Ps. 117:1). Because, doubtless, he whom mercy by no means rescues now, justice alone adjudges after the present age. Hence Solomon says: Because in whatever place the tree shall fall, whether toward the South or toward the North, there it shall be (Eccl. 11:3), because when at the time of the human fall, whether a holy or a malignant spirit shall have received the departing soul from the barriers of the flesh, it will retain it with itself forever without any change, so that neither, being exalted, may it rush forth to punishment, nor, being submerged in eternal punishments, may it ascend further to the remedy of rescue. Therefore the holy man, considering the losses of the human race, because it is withdrawn from the present age without knowledge of the Redeemer, and is buried irreparably in eternal fires, and taking up its voice in himself, may say: Neither shall the sight of man behold me, because doubtless the grace of the Redeemer, which it does not now look upon to correct, it does not then look back upon to hide from destruction. For the Lord, coming into judgment, sees the sinner to strike him, but does not see him to recognize him for the bestowing of the grace of salvation; he examines faults, and is ignorant of the life of those perishing. Whence the holy man, when he confessed that he could not be seen by the respect of man after the present life, aptly soon subjoined:

CHAPTER XVI

[Rec. IX].

IBID.---Thy eyes are upon me, and I shall not exist.

31. Christ in judgment will see the reprobate to strike them, whom here he did not see to bestow mercy.---As if he said openly: Coming severely to judgment, and thou dost not see for saving, and thou dost see for striking, because him whom in the present life thou dost not look upon with the commiseration of thy dispensation, by looking upon him afterward, thou dost extinguish through justice. For now every sinner does not fear God and lives, blasphemes and prospers, because namely the merciful Creator, whom by waiting he wishes to correct, by looking upon he does not wish to punish, as it is written: Overlooking the sins of men for the sake of repentance (Wisd. 11:24). But then the sinner, when he is looked upon, does not exist, because when the severe judge subtilely inquires into merits, the guilty one does not suffice for the torments.

32. The just know they will perish if they are judged by God with piety removed.---Although this also agrees with the voice of the just, whose mind always anxious intends for the coming examination. For they fear everything they do, while they cautiously consider before how great a judge they will stand. They behold the power of that magnitude, and weigh with how great a guilt of their own infirmity they are bound. They enumerate the evils of their own work, and against these they exaggerate the goods of the Creator. They consider how severely he judges perverse things, how subtilely he weighs good works, and they foreknow without ambiguity that they will perish if they are judged with piety removed; because this very thing also that we seem to live justly is a fault, if when he judges our life, divine mercy does not excuse this with himself. For hence it is written in this same book: The stars are not clean in his sight (Job 25:5), because judged severely with him, even they have the stains of pollution who shine through the cleanness of holiness. Well therefore it is said: Thy eyes are upon me, and I shall not exist. As if it were said openly by the voice of the just: If I am discussed by a subtile examination, I do not rise up by enduring the judgment, because life does not suffice for the punishment if the immensity of just retribution presses upon it. But well both the fault of the same human race is briefly subjoined, and the punishment, when it is said immediately:

CHAPTER XVII

[Old XIV, Rec. X].

VERS. 9.---As the cloud is consumed, and passes away, so he that goes down to the lower parts shall not come up.

33. For the damned there is no return to pardon, or to those things which they loved.---For a cloud is suspended to the higher places; but thickened by the wind it is driven that it may run, but by the heat of the sun it is dissipated that it may vanish. Just so, doubtless, are the hearts of men, which through the genius of received reason flash out to the heights, but driven by the blast of the malignant spirit, are drawn hither and thither by the perverse motions of their own desires; but, by the severe respect of the heavenly judge, they melt away as if by the heat of the sun, and, once delivered to the penal places, they return no further to the use of operation. Therefore let the holy man, expressing the elation, the course, and the defect of the human race, say: As the cloud is consumed, and passes away, so he that goes down to the lower parts shall not come up. As if he were speaking openly, saying: He fails by running into the high place, who by being proud tends to destruction; whom if fault once draws along to punishment, mercy does not further lead back to pardon. Whence also it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER XVIII.

VERS. 10.---Neither shall he return any more to his house.

34. The house of the mind is that which it inhabits by loving. The hearts of those despairing are like clouds. They are poured out outside themselves.---Just as the house is the corporal dwelling place of the body, so to each mind that becomes a house which it has been accustomed to inhabit out of desire. To his house, therefore, he returns no more, because once each one, delivered to eternal punishments, is in no way recalled to this now where he had clung by love. Also by the name of hell the despair of the sinner can be designated, about which it is said through the Psalmist: But in hell who shall confess to thee (Ps. 6:6)? Whence again it is written: The impious when he shall have come into the depth of sins, contemns (Prov. 18:3). But whoever succumbs to impiety, certainly by dying leaves the life of justice. But he who even after sin is overwhelmed by the weight of despair, what else than after death is he buried in the punishments of hell? Well therefore it is said: As the cloud is consumed, and passes away, so he that goes down to the lower parts shall not come up, because for the most part with the perpetration of iniquity despair is also associated, and the way of return is already cut off. But rightly the hearts of those despairing are compared to clouds, because they are both obscure with the darkness of error, and thickened with the multiplicity of sins; but being consumed they pass away, because being irradiated by the clarity of the extreme judge they are dissipated. The dwelling place of the heart is also wont to be understood as a house. Whence it is said to a certain one healed: Go into thy house (Mark 5:19), because doubtless it is worthy that the sinner after pardon return to his mind, lest he again admit that by which he may be justly struck. But he who shall have descended to hell, shall not ascend further to his house, because him whom despair overwhelms, it sends forth from the dwelling place of his heart, and he is not able to return inside, because, poured out outside, he falls every day compelled to worse things. For man had been created for contemplating the Creator, that he might always seek His form, and might inhabit in the solemnity of His love. But being sent outside himself through disobedience, he lost the place of his mind, because, scattered by dark journeys, he elongated from the inhabitation of the true light. Whence aptly it is still subjoined:

[Old XV].

IBID.---Neither shall his place know him any more.

35. The place of man is God, deserted through disobedience. He is not to know in judgment those who have despised him here.---For the place of man, but not local, was the Creator himself, who created him that he might consist in himself. Which place doubtless man deserted when, hearing the words of the seducer, he departed from the love of the Creator. But when almighty God by redeeming showed himself to man even corporally, he himself, so to speak, following the footsteps of his fugitive, came as a place to retain the man whom he had lost. For if the Creator could by no means be called a place, the Psalmist praising God would not say: The sons of thy servants shall inhabit there (Ps. 101:29). For we do not say "there", unless when we specifically designate a place. But there are many who even after having perceived the aid of the Redeemer are devolved to the darkness of despair; and they perish all the more wickedly, by how much they also contemn the offered remedies of mercy. Rightly therefore it is said of the damned man: Neither shall his place know him any more, because by his Creator he is then all the more severely not known in judgment, by how much now he is not recalled to the grace of reparation even through gifts. Whence also it is to be noted most greatly that he does not say: Neither shall he know his place any more, but he says: Neither shall his place know him any more. For while knowledge is attributed not to the man, but to the place, the Creator himself is plainly designated by the name of place, who, coming severely to the last examination, will say to those enduring in iniquity: I know you not whence you are (Luke 13:25). But all the elect, by how much they consider the reprobate being severely repelled, by so much do they more solicitously purge themselves every day from the sordes of perpetrated iniquity. And when they behold others perishing growing cold from the love of life, they studiously enkindle themselves to the laments of penance. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XX.

VERS. 11.---Wherefore I also will not spare my mouth.

36. The elect prevent the wrath of the judge in confession.---For he spares his mouth who blushes to confess the evil he has done. For to send the mouth into labor is to occupy this for the confession of perpetrated iniquity. But the just man does not spare his mouth, because preventing the wrath of the severe judge, he rages against himself with the words of his own confession. Hence the Psalmist says: Let us prevent his face in confession (Ps. 94:2). Hence it is said through Solomon: He who hides his crimes shall not be directed; but he who shall have confessed and forsaken them shall follow mercy (Prov. 28:13). Hence again it is written: The just in the beginning is the accuser of himself (Prov. 18:17). But by no means is the mouth opened for confession, unless when by consideration of the severe judge it is narrowed through the fear of the spirit. Whence also aptly it is soon subjoined:

[Rec. XI].

IBID.---I will speak in the tribulation of my spirit.

37. The confession of sins ought to be accompanied by the grief of penance.---For the tribulation of the spirit moves the tongue, so that the voice of confession may attack the guilt of a perverse work. It is also to be known that often even the reprobate confess sins, but they contemn to bewail them. But the elect follow their faults, which they open with voices of confession, with the weepings of severe animadversion. Whence well blessed Job, after he promised not to spare his mouth, soon subjoined the tribulation of the spirit. As if he confessed openly, saying: The tongue so speaks the guilt, that by no means partaking of the stimulus of sorrow does the spirit wander through other things: but speaking faults, I open a wound; but thinking of faults for correction, I seek the health of the wound from the medicine of sorrow. For he who indeed insinuates the evils which he has perpetrated, but refuses to weep for what he has insinuated, as if with a withdrawn garment detects the wound, but with a torpid mind does not apply the medicine to the wound. It is necessary, therefore, that sorrow alone shake out the voice of confession, lest the wound produced, but neglected, by which it is now touched more licentially through human knowledge, should putrefy more greatly. On the contrary, the Psalmist had not only detected the plague of the heart, but applied also the medicine of sorrow to the detected one, saying: I announce my iniquity, and I will think for my sin (Ps. 37:19). For by announcing he detects the hidden wound, but by thinking what else than does he apply the medicine to the wound? [Old XVI.] But for the afflicted mind, and one solicitously thinking of its own losses, a strife for itself arises against itself. For when it instigates itself to the laments of penance, it mangles itself with a hidden reproof. Whence also aptly soon is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXII.

IBID.---I will commune with the bitterness of my soul.

38. The compunct mind detects many things in itself to be bewailed. It recollects with how many gifts of God it was ungrateful.---For afflicted by the fear of divine judgment, while we bewail certain things badly done, excited more vigilantly to discuss ourselves by the very force of our bitterness, we find other things in ourselves also which we may bewail more fully. For often what was hidden to those torpid, becomes more subtilely known to those weeping; and the afflicted mind finds more certainly the evil which it had done and did not know, and its own strife opens to it more truly how much it has deviated from the peace of truth, because its own guilt, which secure it did not remember, it finds this in itself being moved. For the succrescent bitterness of penance importunately brings to the ashamed heart the illicit things which it committed, shows the severe judge against these things, strikes threats of punishments, strikes the mind with fear, confounds it with shame, reproves illicit motions, disturbs the quiet of harmful security; it enumerates what good things the Creator bestowed upon it, what evils it itself responded with to those good things of his, that it was wonderfully created by him, that it was gratuitously nourished, that it was enriched with the substance of reason in its condition, that it was called by the grace of the Creator, that it itself being called did not wish to follow, that the mercy of the one calling did not despise it though deaf and resisting, that it was illuminated by gifts, that it was blinded by its own will by perverse acts even after the gifts, that it was expiated from the errors of its blindness by the scourges of paternal solicitude, that from the pains of the scourges it was led back to the joys of salvation by the medicine of mercy; that subjected to certain faults, even if not heavy ones, nevertheless it does not cease to sin even among the scourges; that heavenly grace did not leave its sinner even when contemned. When therefore it reproves the afflicted mind now by the replication of the gifts of God, now by the reproaches of its own action with so great severity, the bitterness of the soul has its own tongue in the heart of the just, which speaks to them all the more subtilely, by how much it is heard more interiorly. Whence also by no means is it said: I will speak in the bitterness of my soul, but, I will commune with the bitterness of my soul, because the force of sorrow, which reckoning each sin, excites the torpid mind to laments, forms as it were words of communing to it, in which it may find itself having been corrected, and may rise up more solicitous now for its own custody. Therefore let the just man say out of his own voice, and holding the type of the holy Church, let him say out of ours: I will commune with the bitterness of my soul. As if he insinuated more openly, saying: I speak within against myself with the sorrow of my heart, and I hide myself outside from the stroke of the judge. But the mind pressed by the sorrows of penance is constricted in itself, and is separated from all delectations of the flesh by a strong thought, it desires to profit for the highest things, and nevertheless it still feels a contradiction from the corruption of the body. Whence also aptly soon is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIII.

VERS. 12.---Am I the sea, or a whale, that thou hast surrounded me with a prison?

39. Man, the devil, the carnal, are constricted by a prison; when they are not able to fulfill what they wish.---Man is surrounded with a prison, because for the most part he both strives to rise up to the heights by the advances of virtues, and nevertheless is hindered by the corruption of his flesh. From which the Psalmist prays to be put off, saying: Lead my soul out of prison, for confessing to thy name (Ps. 141:8). But what is expressed by the appellation of the sea, except the hearts of the carnal fluctuating with swollen thoughts; what by the name of whale, except the ancient enemy?

Who while he penetrates the minds of seculars by possessing them, swims as it were in their slippery thought. But the whale is constricted by a prison, because the malignant spirit, cast down into the lower parts, lest he should prevail to fly away to heavenly things, is coarcted by the weight of his punishment, Peter attesting, who says: God did not spare the sinning angels, but delivered them drawn down by the ropes of hell into Tartarus to be reserved to be tortured in judgment (2 Pet. 2:4). The whale is astringed by a prison, because he is prohibited from tempting the good as much as he desires. The sea also is surrounded by a prison, because the swollen and insane desires of carnal minds are weighed down by the narrowness of their own impossibility for carrying out the evils which they appetize. For often they desire to dominate the better; but nevertheless they are subject to them, the divine judgment wonderfully disposing all things. The elated desire to harm the good, and nevertheless being subject they hope for solaces from them. For the fulfilling of the pleasures of the flesh they desire longevity of the present life, but nevertheless they are snatched from it under celerity. About whom it is well said through the Psalmist: He stationed the waters as in a wineskin (Ps. 77:13). For the waters are in a wineskin when their slippery desires, because they do not find the effect of the work, are depressed under the carnal heart. The whale therefore and the sea is pressed by the surrounding of a prison, because either the malignant spirit, or his followers, in whose minds he collects himself, and rolls in them the waves of swollen thoughts, so that they may not be able to fulfill the evils which they appetize, heavenly severity narrows them.

[Old XVII, Rec. XII.] 40. The just complain that they suffer the same. Not out of swelling, but out of love of the truth.---But holy men, by how much with a cleaner heart they consider the secrets of heavenly things, pant for these with ardors increased every day. There they desire to be fully satiated, whence they still taste some small thing with the mouth of contemplation. They desire perfectly to subject the stimulus of the flesh, to tolerate nothing illicit in thought now from its corruption; but because it is written: The body which is corrupted aggravates the soul, and the earthly inhabitation depresses the sense thinking many things (Wisd. 9:15), by intention they already indeed eminent beyond themselves, but nevertheless, still subject to the uncertain motions of their own infirmity, they grieve that they are closed by the prison of corruption. He says therefore: Am I the sea, or a whale, that thou hast surrounded me with a prison? As if he said openly: The sea or the whale, namely the iniquitous, and their author the malignant spirit, because they desire to be unbridled for the sole license of perpetrating iniquity, are rightly constricted by the prison of their own punishment. But I, who already desire the liberty of thy eternity, why am I still pressed by the prison of my corruption? Which nevertheless is neither proudly required by the just, because, enkindled by the love of the truth, they perfectly desire to transgress the narrownesses of their own infirmity; nor is it unjustly disposed by the author of the just, because by delaying he tortures the vows of his elect, by torturing he purges, so that they may some time convalesce better from the delay for perceiving what they desire. But the elect, as long as they are delayed from the intimate quiet, return to their heart; and there, hidden from the tumults of their own flesh, they seek as it were a most pleasant secret. But in it they often feel the stings of temptation, they suffer the incentives of the flesh; and there they find most heavy labors, where they had sought great rest from labor. Whence the holy man after the insinuated prison of his corruption, hastening to return to the quiet spaces of the heart, because he finds the same strife even in the inmost things which he flees from the exterior ones, immediately subjoins, saying:

CHAPTER XXIV

[Rec. XIII].

VERSES 13, 14.---If I shall say, my bed shall comfort me, and I shall be relieved speaking with myself in my couch; thou shalt terrify me by dreams, and by visions thou shalt shake me with horror.

41. The just man returns from exterior things to the heart, nor finds he rest there. He is troubled by the terror of the judgments of God.---For in the sacred eloquence (sacro eloquio) the bed, the couch, or the mattress, is wont to be understood as the secret of the heart. For hence it is that under the appearance of each soul the bride, excited by the hidden stings of holy love, says in the Song of Songs: In my bed by nights I sought him whom my soul loveth (Cant. 3:1). For in the bed and by night the beloved is sought, because indeed the appearance of the invisible Creator, every image of bodily vision being repressed, is found in the couch of the heart. Whence also to the same who love Him the Truth says: The kingdom of God is within you (Luke 17:21). And again: If I go not away, the Paraclete will not come (John 16:7). As if He said openly: If I do not withdraw my body from the eyes of your intention, I do not lead you to the invisible understanding through the Comforter Spirit (consolatorem Spiritum). Hence of the just it is said by the Psalmist: The saints shall exult in glory, they shall rejoice in their beds (Psalm 149:5), because namely when they flee evils from exterior things, they glory secure within the secrets of their minds. But then the joy of hearts will be perfect when there shall be no fight of the flesh without. For as long as the flesh entices, because as it were the wall of our house is shaken, the couch also is troubled. Whence also it is rightly said by the same Psalmist: Thou hast turned all his bed in his infirmity (Psalm 40:4), because while the temptation of the flesh shakes us, our trembling infirmity confounds even the couch of the mind. But what in this place do we take for dreams or visions, except the imaginations of the last and strict examination? which already in some way we discern through fear, but yet we do not see as it truly is. Therefore holy men, as we have said, always return to the secrets of the heart, when they suffer from this world either prosperity beyond their wish, or adversity beyond their strength; and, tired by external labors, they seek the couches of the mind as it were a mattress or a bed. But while by certain imaginations of thoughts they behold how subtle the divine judgments are, as if in the very rest of their mattress they are troubled by the vision of a dream. For they contemplate how strict a judge comes, who, while by the force of His immense greatness He illuminates the secrets of hearts, brings back all faults before their eyes. They weigh how great that shame is, to be confounded then in the sight of the whole human race, of all the angels, and of the archangels. They weigh what torment remains after the confusion, when Gehenna consumes both the guilty soul dying immortally and the flesh failing without end. When therefore the mind is shaken by such fearful imagination, what else is seen than a sad dream in the couch? Let him say therefore: If I shall say My bed shall comfort me, and I shall be relieved speaking with myself in my couch, thou shalt terrify me by dreams, and by visions thou shalt shake me with horror. As if he should openly confess, saying: If, fleeing exterior things, I return within, and in some way I desire to rest in the couch of the heart, there, while Thou objectest me to the contemplation of Thy strictness (districtionis), Thou terrifiest me vehemently by the very imaginations of my providence. But it is well said: And I shall be relieved, speaking with myself in my couch, because namely when we tired return to the silence of our mind, as if speaking in the couch, we turn the hidden words of thoughts within us. But this our very communing is turned into fear, because from it the understanding is more vehemently opened to us, which may intent the terror of the judge in the mind.

[Vet. XVIII.] 42. Six causes of dreams.---Lest any one should study to search into these things according to the letter, it is greatly to be inquired in how many ways the images of dreams touch the mind. For sometimes dreams are generated by the fullness or emptiness of the belly, but sometimes by illusion, sometimes by thought and illusion together, sometimes by revelation, but sometimes by thought and revelation together. But the two which we first mentioned we all know by experience, but the following four we find in the pages of Holy Scripture. For unless dreams were for the most part made from the hidden enemy through illusion, the wise man would by no means indicate this, saying: Dreams and vain illusions have made many to err (Ecclus. 34:7). Or certainly: You shall not divine, nor observe dreams (Lev. 19:26). By which words indeed it is shown of what detestation are those things which are joined to divinations. Again, unless they sometimes proceeded from thought and illusion together, Solomon would least have said: Dreams follow many cares (Eccles. 5:2). And unless dreams sometimes arose from the mystery of revelation, Joseph would not see by a dream that he was to be preferred to his brothers (Gen. 37:7), nor would the angel admonish the spouse of Mary by a dream that, the child being taken, he should flee into Egypt (Matt. 2:13, 14). Again, unless dreams sometimes proceeded from thought and revelation together, the prophet Daniel, in discussing the vision of Nebuchadnezzar, would by no means have begun from the root of thought: Thou, O king, didst begin to think in thy couch what should be hereafter, and he that revealeth mysteries showed thee what things are to come (Dan. 2:29). And a little after: Thou sawest, and behold as it were one great statue, that great statue, and high stature stood against thee (ibid. 31), etc. Therefore while Daniel reverently insinuates the dream to be fulfilled, and manifests from what thought it arose, it is plainly shown that this is for the most part generated from thought and revelation together.

43. We are not easily to believe dreams. Why the devil is permitted to affect the hearts of the saints by dreams. But indeed since dreams alternate with so many qualities of things, it ought to be believed in them with so much more difficulty, as it does not easily shine forth from what impulse they come. For often the malignant spirit promises prosperity even to those sleeping whom he intercepts waking by the love of this present life; and those whom he considers to fear adversities, he intends these more harshly to them by the images of a dream, so far as he may affect the undiscerning mind with diverse quality, and confound it, either lifting it up by hope, or depressing it by fear. But often he strives to affect even the hearts of the saints with dreams, that they may be diverted at least for a time and a moment from the intention of solid thought, although they themselves immediately shake off the mind from the imagination of illusion. But the lurking enemy, in what he least overcomes them waking, in that he more heavily assails them sleeping. Whom nevertheless the heavenly dispensation (superna dispensatio) kindly permits to do these things malignantly, lest in the hearts of the elect even sleep should be void from the reward of passion. Well therefore is it said to the Ruler of all (rectori omnium): If I shall say My bed shall comfort me, and I shall be relieved speaking with myself in my couch, thou shalt terrify me by dreams, and by visions thou shalt shake me with horror, because namely God wonderfully dispenses all things, and He Himself does what the malignant spirit desires to do unjustly, who permits this to be done only justly. But because the life of the just is both shaken by temptation during vigils, and fatigued by illusion through a dream, it tolerates the troubles of its corruption without, and within at its own self it heavily carries unlawful thoughts, what is it that it should do, so that it may pluck the foot of the heart from so many snares of scandals? Behold, blessed man, with how great perturbation we have known thee to be pressed on every side, but let us hear what counsel thou findest against this. It follows:

CHAPTER XXV

[Rec. XIV].

VERSE 15.---Wherefore my soul hath chosen suspension, and my bones death.

44. It is a remedy against the anxiety of the mind to carry it to high things.---What is designated by the soul but the intention of the mind, what by the bones but the strength of the flesh? But everything which is suspended is without doubt raised from the lowest things. Therefore the soul chooses suspension, that the bones may die, because while the intention of the mind raises itself to high things, it kills in itself all the strength of the exterior life. For holy men know most certainly that they can by no means have rest in this life; and therefore they choose suspension, because indeed, deserting earthly desires, they lift the mind to high things. But being suspended they bring death to their bones, because by the love of the heavenly country (supernae patriae), being girt in the studies of virtues, they follow with the bond of humility that which they had previously been strong in the world. It is pleasant to behold how Paul had suspended his soul, who said: But I live now, not I, but Christ liveth in me (Gal. 2:20). And again: Having a desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ (Philip. 1:23). And: To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain (ibid. 21). Who, calling back to memory the deeds of earthly strength, numbered as it were certain bones in himself, saying: A Hebrew of the Hebrews, according to the law a Pharisee, according to zeal persecuting the Church of God (Philip. 3:5, 6). But by the suspension of the soul, because he kills these bones in himself, he immediately asserts, who subjoins: But what things were gain to me, those I have counted loss for Christ (ibid. 7). Which bones in himself he insinuates more vehemently extinguished, when he adds: For whom I have made all things loss, and I count them as dung (ibid. 8). But with his bones dead he shows how lifeless he hangs, who immediately subjoins, saying: That I may gain Christ, and be found in him, not having my own justice, which is of the law, but that which is of the faith of Jesus Christ (ibid. 9). But because, his testimonies being compared, we have witnessed Paul suspended to high things, dead to the world, let us now show if blessed Job, full of the same spirit, flees the concupiscence of the exterior life. It follows:

[Vet. XIX, Rec. XV].

VERSE 16.---I have despaired, I shall now live no longer.

45. Some of the just possess earthly things, others renounce them.---There are some of the just who so desire heavenly things, that nevertheless they are least broken from the hope of earthly things. They possess the patrimonies bestowed by God for the support of necessity, they hold the honors temporarily paid to them, they do not covet the things of others, they use their own lawfully. Who nevertheless are alien from the same things which they have, because they are not held by desire to these very things which they possess. And there are some of the just who, girt for comprehending the summit of perfection, while they desire higher things within, relinquish all things without; who strip themselves of the things they had, and spoil themselves of the glory of honor; who by the desire of internal things through assiduity affect themselves with a friendly sorrow (amici moeroris), and will not have consolation from exterior things; who while they approach by the mind to internal joys, kill in themselves fundamentally the life of bodily delight. For to such it is said by Paul: For you are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God (Col. 3:3). The Psalmist had expressed the voice of these, when he said: My soul longeth and fainteth for the courts of the Lord (Psalm 83:3). For they long, but do not faint, who already indeed desire heavenly things, but yet are as yet least wearied from the delights of earthly things. But he longeth and fainteth for the courts of God, who, when he desires eternal things, does not endure in the love of temporal things. Hence the Psalmist says again: My soul hath fainted for thy salvation (Psalm 118:81). Hence the Truth Himself admonishes, saying: If any man will come after me, let him deny himself (Luke 9:23). And again: Unless a man renounce all that he possesseth, he cannot be my disciple (Luke 14:33). Therefore the holy man, with a mind divided from earthly desires, inserts himself in the number of these, who says: I have despaired, I shall now live no longer. For to despair as a just man is to desert the goods of this present life by the choice of eternity, to seek things that will remain, and not to have confidence in temporal things. Who doing these things asserts that he shall by no means live longer, because namely he kills himself daily from the life of passion by a vivifying death (vivificatrice morte). For far be it that the holy man should despair of the bounty of divine mercy, lest he withdraw the step of the heart from the progress of the inward journey, lest, deserting the love of the Creator, he remain in the way as if destitute by the leader, and fall pierced by the sword of robbing despair. But lest we should seem to bend his words violently to the judgment of our understanding, we ought to weigh the premises from the following things. For in what sense he said these things, he himself immediately indicates, who subjoins:

CHAPTER XXVII

[Rec. XVI].

VERSE 16.---Spare me, O Lord, for my days are nothing.

46. Job deserted perishing goods by a pious despair, and sought things that remain forever.---For neither do these two words agree with themselves, I have despaired and spare. For he who despairs by no means now asks that he be spared, and he who still desires to be spared certainly least despairs. Therefore it is from one thing that the holy man despairs, from another that he asks to be spared, because namely while he deserts the goods of his passing life through despair, he rises more robust in hope for obtaining the things which remain. Therefore by despairing he is better led to the hope of pardon, who so much more surely desires the things to come, as he more truly relinquishes present things from despair. And it is to be noted that, insinuating to us the force of his heart, he indeed brought forth one sentence concerning himself, but he repeated this by insinuating it a third time. For what he had said above: My soul hath chosen suspension, this repeating he added, I have despaired; and by longing for eternal things, and postponing temporal things, he finally brought this in, Spare me; and what he said above, My bones death, this indeed he subjoined, I shall now live no longer; this last he brought forth, For my days are nothing. [Vet. XX.] But he well considers his days to be nothing, because, as we have already often said a little above, holy men the more truly they know the highest things, the more sublimely they despise earthly things; and therefore they behold the days of the present life to be nothing, because they fix the eyes of an illuminated mind in the consideration of eternity. From which while they return to themselves, what do they acknowledge themselves to be but dust, and conscious of their own infirmity, they fear to be strictly judged? And when they behold the force of such great vigor, they tremble to be examined what they are. Whence also it is yet aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VERSE 17.---What is man that thou shouldst magnify him? or why dost thou set thy heart upon him?

47. The saints always consider their own vileness, and the gifts and judgments of God.---God magnifies man, because He enriches him with the bounty of reason, visits him with the infusion of grace, exalts him with the honor of conferred virtue. And since of himself he is nothing, He grants him by the gift of benignity to be a participant of His own knowledge. But the Lord sets His heart upon the same magnified man, because after the gifts He exerts judgment, He subtly weighs merits, He vehemently examines the weights of life, and He so much more strictly exacts penalties from him afterwards, as He has more largely prevented him by the bestowed gift. Therefore let the holy man behold the immensity of the heavenly majesty, and let him bring back the eye of consideration to his own infirmity. Let him see that the flesh is not able to take that which the Truth teaches by the spirit concerning itself. Let him see that even the raised spirit of man is not sufficient to tolerate the judgment which God intends under the examination of strict retribution, and let him say: What is man, that thou shouldst magnify him? or why dost thou set thy heart upon him? As if he should openly exclaim, saying: Man is magnified by a spiritual gift, but yet he is flesh; and Thou considerest his ways strictly after the gifts, but yet if he be judged with piety removed, the weight which hangs from Thy subtlety neither the spirit raised to justice is able to bear, because even if Thy gifts dilate him beyond himself, yet his own infirmity narrows him for the inquiry of Thy strict examination. Whence also it is yet aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIX

[Rec. XVII].

VERSE 18.---Thou visitest him at dawn, and suddenly thou provest him.

48. Those whom God has enriched with gifts, He proves by temptations. That they may learn what they are from God, what from themselves. Therefore then they are troubled by slippery thoughts.---Who of us knows not that it is called dawn (diluculum) when now the nocturnal times are changed into the clarity of light? We therefore are pressed by the darkness of night when we are obscured by the perpetration of iniquity. But night is turned into light when the obscurity of our error is irradiated by the knowledge of truth. Night is turned into light when the brightness of justice illuminates our hearts, which the blindness of fault depressed. Paul had beheld this dawn arising in the minds of the disciples when he said: The night is passed, and the day is at hand (Rom. 13:12). Therefore the Lord visits us at dawn, because He illustrates the darkness of our error by the light of His knowledge, He raises us by the gift of contemplation, He exalts us into the citadel of virtue (arcem virtutis). But it is to be noted that God after He visits at dawn, suddenly proves man, because both by approaching He promotes our hearts to virtues, and by receding He permits them to be shaken by temptation. For if after the gifts of virtues he is shaken by no temptation, the mind glories that it has these from itself. Therefore that it may both have the gifts of firmness, and humbly acknowledge its own infirmity, it is lifted up to high things through the approach of grace, and through the recession it is proved what it is of itself. Which is well hinted to us from the history of sacred reading (1 Kings 3:16), by which Solomon is recorded both to have received wisdom from God, and yet after that same wisdom was received, to have been immediately struck by the question of harlots. For as soon as he received the grace of so great a revelation, he bore the contest of base women, because namely often when the respect of intimate bounty illustrates our mind with granted virtues, slippery thoughts immediately trouble it, so that that which exults being raised by an immense gift, being also struck by temptation may find what it is. Thus Elias both visited at dawn, opened the heavens by his word; and yet proved suddenly, fleeing weak through the deserts, he feared one woman (1 Kings 19:3). Thus Paul is led to the third heaven, penetrating he considers the secrets of paradise (2 Cor. 12:2); and yet, returning to himself, he labors against the war of the flesh, he sustains another law in his members, by whose rebellion in himself the law of the spirit grieves to be fatigued (Rom. 7:21). Therefore God visits at dawn, but suddenly after the visitation He proves, because both by the conferred gift He raises, and the gift being withdrawn for a little while, He demonstrates the man to himself. Which without doubt we suffer until, the stain of sin being fundamentally wiped away, we may be reformed to the substance of promised incorruption. Whence it is yet aptly subjoined:

[Vet. XXI, Rec. XVIII].

VERSE 19.---How long dost thou not spare me, nor let me alone, that I may swallow my spittle?

49. The savor of contemplation, not satiety, is given here. ---Saliva slides into the mouth from the head, but from the mouth it is led to the belly when it is swallowed. What therefore is our head but the Divinity? through which we take the principle of existing, that we may be a creature, Paul witnessing, who says: The head of the man is Christ, but the head of Christ is God (1 Cor. 11:3). But what is our belly but the mind? which while it receives its food, namely the heavenly understanding, being refreshed without doubt it rules the members of all actions. For unless the sacred eloquence (sacra eloquia) sometimes expressed the mind by the name of the belly, Solomon would surely not have said: The lamp of the Lord is the spirit of man, which searcheth all the secrets of the belly (Prov. 20:27), because namely while the grace of the heavenly respect illustrates us, it also manifests all things hidden from our mind to us. What therefore is taken by the name of saliva but the savor of intimate contemplation? which flows down to the mouth from the head, because it scarcely touches us placed yet in this life with the taste of revelation from the clarity of the Creator. Whence also the Redeemer coming mixed spittle with clay, and repaired the eyes of the man born blind (John 9:6), because heavenly grace irradiates our carnal thought through the admixture of its contemplation, and reforms man from original blindness to understanding. For because nature brought him forth in this exile already expelled from the joys of paradise, man proceeded as if from birth without eyes. But as the holy man insinuates, this saliva indeed slides to the mouth, but that it may reach even to the belly it is not swallowed, because the contemplation of the Divinity touches the sense, but it does not fully refresh the mind, since the mind is not able to behold perfectly what it as yet sees by snatches, because the darkness of corruption prevents.

50. The mind pressed by the mass of the body is not able to adhere long to the heavenly light. ---For behold the mind of the elect already subjects earthly desires, already transcends all things which it considers to pass away, already is suspended from the delight of exterior things, and searches out what are the invisible goods, and doing these things it is for the most part snatched into the sweetness of heavenly contemplation, and already beholds something of the inmost things as it were through a mist, and with ardent desire endeavors to be present at the spiritual ministries of the angels; it is fed with the taste of uncircumscribed light (incircumscripti luminis), and being carried beyond itself it disdains to fall back to itself; but because as yet the body which is corrupted burdens the soul (Wisd. 9:15), it is not able to adhere long to the light which it sees by snatches. For the very infirmity of the flesh withdraws the soul transcending itself, and brings it back sighing to think on the lowest and necessary things. Therefore the saliva flowing down from the head touches the mouth, but reaches least to the belly, because indeed our understanding is now infused with the liquor of heavenly contemplation, but the mind is by no means fully satiated. For in the mouth is the taste, in the belly satiety. Therefore we cannot swallow the saliva, because we are not permitted to be satiated with the good of heavenly clarity, which as yet we taste from thinness. But because this very thing, which in some way we already know from above, is from the piety of Him who spares, but that we cannot perceive this perfectly is as yet from the penalty of the old condemnation, it is now rightly said: How long dost thou not spare me, nor let me alone, that I may swallow my spittle? As if it were openly said: Then Thou fully sparest man, when Thou shalt have admitted him to the perfection of Thy contemplation, so that being snatched within he may see Thy clarity, and the corruption of his flesh may not repel him without. Then Thou permittest that I swallow the spittle, when Thou shalt have infused me with the savor of Thy clarity even to the abundance of satiety, so that I may no longer hunger by the taste of the mouth through indigence, but may subsist solid in Thee with the belly of the mind watered. But he who wishes to deserve the good which he seeks, ought to confess the evil which he has done. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXI

[Rec. XIX].

VERSE 20.---I have sinned; what shall I do to thee, O keeper of men?

51. Man fallen by himself, by himself is not able to rise.---Behold he confesses the evil which he has done, but he does not find the good which he ought to offer to God in recompense (recompensationem), because any virtue of human action is weak for washing away fault, unless the mercy of Him who spares fosters it, and the justice of Him who judges rightly does not press it. Whence it is rightly said by the Psalmist: Thy mercy is better than life (Psalm 62:4), because however innocent it may seem, yet before the strict judge our life does not deliver us, if the benignity of mercy does not release to it the debt of its guilt. Or certainly when it is said: What shall I do to thee? it is plainly shown that these very goods which we are commanded to do, do not profit the commander, but us. Whence again it is said by the Psalmist: For thou hast no need of my goods (Psalm 15:2). But the humility of our destitution is expressed when God is called the keeper of men (custos hominum), because if His keeping does not at least protect us, before the snares of the hidden enemy, the waking eye of our solicitude sleeps, the Psalmist again witnessing, who says: Unless the Lord keep the city, they watch in vain that keep it (Psalm 126:1, 2). For we have fallen by ourselves, but we are not able to rise by our own strengths. Fault once laid us low of our own will, but the penalty of fault daily depresses us worse. We strive to rise to the lost rectitude by the endeavors of studies, but we are burdened by the weight of merits. Whence also it is aptly subjoined.

CHAPTER XXXII

[Vet. XXII, Rec. XX].

VERSE 20.---Why hast thou set me contrary to thee, and I am become burdensome to myself?

52. By sinning he is made contrary to God.---Then God set man contrary to Himself, when man deserted God by sinning. For being caught by the persuasions of the serpent, he stood forth as His enemy, whose precepts he despised. But the just Creator set him contrary to Himself, because He deputed him as an enemy from pride (elatione). But this very contrariety of fault is made to man a weight of punishment, so that being evilly free he may serve his own corruption, who being a good servant rejoiced in the liberty of incorruption. For deserting the healthful citadel of humility, he arrived at the yoke of infirmity by being proud, and by erecting he subjected the neck of the heart, because he who would not be under the divine commands, laid himself low under his own necessities. Which we show better, if we express those things which being cast down he sustains, and first the weights of the flesh, and afterwards of the mind.

53. In how many ways man is burdensome to himself, on account of the body. And on account of the mind. Our mind ample and narrow.---For to say nothing of this, that he tolerates pains, that he pants with fevers, this very thing of our body which is called health is constricted by a certain sickness of its own. For by ease it pines away, by work it fails; failing by hunger, it is refreshed by food that it may subsist; becoming weary by refreshment, it is relieved by abstinence that it may thrive; it is bathed with water, lest it should dry up; it is wiped with towels, lest it should melt too much by the bathing; it is quickened by labor, lest it should grow torpid by rest; it is cherished by rest, lest it should succumb by the exercise of labor; fatigued by vigils, it is repaired by sleep; oppressed by sleep, it is shaken out by vigils, lest it should be wearied worse by its own rest; it is covered with clothes, lest it should be penetrated by the adversity of cold; failing by sought-for heat, it is cherished by the breath of the airs. And when it finds troubles from thence, whence it sought to avoid troubles, being evilly wounded, so to speak, it languishes from its own medicine. Fevers therefore being removed, and pains ceasing, our health itself is a sickness, to which the necessity of curing is never wanting. For as many solaces as we seek for the use of living, we meet as it were so many medicines for our sickness. But the medicine also is turned into a wound, because adhering a little longer to the exquisite remedy, we fail more heavily from that which we provide providently for refreshment. So namely ought presumption to be corrected, so pride to be laid low. For because we once took up an elated spirit, behold we daily carry down-flowing mud (lutum).

54. Our mind also itself, excluded from the secure joy of the internal secret, now is deceived by hope, now is vexed by fear, now is cast down by sorrow, now is relieved by false hilarity; it pertinaciously loves transitory things, and is incessantly worn away by the loss of them, because it is also incessantly changed by a rapid course. But being subject to mutable things, it is also varied from itself. For seeking what it has not, it perceives it anxious; and when it has begun to have this, it tires it to have perceived what it sought. It often loves what it had despised, it despises what it loved. With labor it learns those things which are eternal, but of these it suddenly forgets, if it shall cease to labor. It seeks for a long time, that it may find a little of the highest things, but falling back more quickly to accustomed things, it does not persevere even a little in those which it finds. Desiring to be instructed, it can scarcely overcome its own ignorance, but being instructed, it fights more heavily against the glory of science. It can scarcely subject to itself the tyranny of its own flesh, but yet as yet within it tolerates the images of fault, whose works it has already restrained without by overcoming. It raises itself in the inquiry of its Author, but the familiar darkness (amica caligo) of bodily things confounds it being reverberated. It wishes to behold in what manner the incorporeal thing rules the body, and it is not able. It seeks wonderfully what it is not sufficient to answer to itself, and being ignorant it fails under that which it prudently seeks. Considering itself ample and narrow at the same time, it knows not what it may truly estimate itself, because if it were not ample, it would by no means seek such things to be investigated, and again if it were not narrow, it would find at least this very thing which it seeks.

55. Man while, having left God, believed himself to be sufficient for himself, found nothing in himself but a tumult of perturbation. Job, being pressed by this, asks for the mercy of God. --- Well therefore is it said: Why hast thou set me contrary to thee, and I am become burdensome to myself, because while man being repulsed tolerates both troubles from the flesh and questions from the mind, he carries himself as a heavy weight indeed.

On every side he is pressed by languors, on every side he is urged by infirmities, so that he who, having left God, believed himself to be sufficient for himself for rest, should find nothing in himself but a tumult of perturbation, and being found should seek to flee from himself, but, the Author being despised, he should not have whither he might flee from himself. A certain wise man, well contemplating the weights of this infirmity, says: A heavy yoke is upon the sons of Adam, from the day of their coming forth from their mother's womb, until the day of their burial into the mother of all (Ecclus. 40:1).

But blessed Job, considering these things, and groaning why they were so ordained, does not rebuke justice, but inquires for mercy, that by questioning he may himself humbly knock at what divine piety may change by sparing. As if he should say openly: Why dost thou despise man as if contrary to thee, who I know for certain that thou dost not wish to perish even him whom thou art believed to despise? Whence well as yet he both expresses the humility of confession, and joins the voice of free inquiry, saying:

CHAPTER XXXIII

[Vet. XXIII].

VERSE 21.---Why dost thou not take away my sin, and why dost thou not remove my iniquity?

56. He desires the Mediator and the resurrection.---In which words truly what else but the desire for the waited-for Mediator is hinted? of whom John says: Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world (John 1:29). Or certainly sin is then fully taken away from the human race, when our corruption is changed by the glory of incorruption. For we can by no means be free from fault, as long as we are held in the body of death. Therefore he desires the grace of the Redeemer, or the solidity of the resurrection, who hopes for his iniquity to be removed fundamentally. Whence soon adding both the punishment which he deserved from his origin, and the judgment which he fears from his own action, he adds:

CHAPTER XXXIV

[Rec. XXI].

IBID.---Behold now I shall sleep in the dust; and if in the morning thou shalt seek me, I shall not be.

57. While he is pressed by present punishment, he is more heavily urged concerning future things. Humility is a cover from the sword of the judge.---To the first man sinning it was said: Dust thou art, and into dust thou shalt return (Gen. 3:19). But by morning is called that manifestation of minds, which is demonstrated in the arrival of the judge with open thoughts as if after the darkness of the night. Of which morning indeed it is said by the Psalmist: In the morning I will stand before thee and will see (Ps. 5:5). But to seek on the part of God is to discuss man by a subtle interrogation, and to judge by strictly discussing.

Therefore blessed Job, considering the losses of human dejection, let him see that he is both already pressed by present punishment, and as yet more heavily urged concerning future things: And let him say: Behold now I shall sleep in the dust; and if in the morning thou shalt seek me, I shall not be. As if he should more openly deplore, saying: in the present indeed I already suffer the death of the flesh, and yet as yet I fear a heavier death from the coming judgment, the sentence of thy strictness (districtionis): I sustain destruction for fault, but as yet coming to judgment I dread faults to be restored even after destruction.

Considering therefore exterior death, let him say, Behold now I shall sleep in the dust; fearing interior death let him add: And if in the morning thou shalt seek me, I shall not be. For with however much justice they may be strong, even the elect are by no means sufficient for themselves for innocence, if they should be strictly required in judgment. But this they now find for the solace of their deliverance, that they humbly know that they cannot be sufficient for themselves. Therefore under the cover of humility they hide themselves from the sword of so great animadversion, and in that they wait for the terror of the coming judgment with continuous fear, by that it is incessantly acted, that they may become more prepared. It follows.

CHAPTER XXXV

[Vet. XXIV, Rec. XXII].

CHAPTER VIII, VERSES 1, 2.---Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said, How long wilt thou speak these things? and how long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind?

58. The words of the just are heavy to the unjust. The fourfold power of speaking. Only one is subject to crime.---To the unjust the words of the just are always heavy; and what they hear brought forth for edification, they bear these as if a weight imposed upon them. Which Bildad the Shuhite openly indicates concerning himself, saying: How long wilt thou speak these things? For he who says how long shows that he can no longer bear the words of edification. But when the iniquitous despise to be corrected, they criminalize what is well brought forth. Whence also he immediately adds: And the spirit of the speech of thy mouth is multiple. When multiplicity in speech is rebuked, without doubt the gravity of intelligence in sense is denied.

For the highest power of speakers is distinguished by a fourfold quality. For there are some whom the amplitude of both perceiving and speaking dilates, and there are some whom the want of both perceiving and speaking narrows. There are some who have the efficacy of speaking, but have not the acumen of perceiving; and there are some who are supported by the acumen of perceiving, but are mute from the want of locution. For this we see in men, which we often see in insensible things. For for the most part both abundant water is led from the innermost parts and is derived into the surface by large passages (meatibus). For the most part narrow it lies hid in the innermost parts, and finding the cracks of proceeding with difficulty, it sweats out narrower without. For the most part the least arises in hidden places; and when it finds clearly where it may go out, it proceeds thin from a large opening, and large passages dilate themselves, but there is not what they may pour out. But for the most part ample it rises in hidden places, but pressed by narrow passages it flows forth most thinly.

So therefore in others the open mouth flows forth, what the large fount of genius ministers. In others neither sense reaches out the intellect, nor the tongue pours it out. In others indeed the mouth is open for speaking, but the tongue ready for rendering receives nothing from sense. But in others the large fount of perceiving exuberates from the heart, but an unequal tongue narrows this as if by a thin passage. In which four qualities of speaking indeed, only the third is subject to crime, which snatches this to itself through locution, to which it does not rise through genius. For the first is to be praised, which is strongly powerful in both. The second to be pitied, which humbly lacks both. The fourth to be helped, which is not able to fulfill what it perceives. But the third to be despised and repressed, which, while it raises itself by speech, lies down by sense, which similar to limbs swelling with inflation, proceeds vast but empty to the ears of the hearers. Which now Bildad twists to the crime of blessed Job, saying: [Vet. XXV.] The spirit of the speech of thy mouth is multiple. For he who attributes multiplicity of speech to the mouth, truly rebukes the want of the heart. As if he should say openly: Thou art lifted up by the abundance of spirit in the speech of the mouth, but thou art narrowed by the indigence of sense. But the wicked, when they rebuke right things, lest they themselves should seem not to know what are just, bring forth goods known to all, which they have learned by hearing, as if unknown. Whence also Bildad immediately adds:

CHAPTER XXXVI.

VERSE 3.---Doth God supplant judgment? or doth the Almighty subvert that which is just?

59. The wicked hunt for the praise of doctrine. They praise the justice of God where it is well with them, where it is ill they condemn it.--- These things blessed Job neither speaking had denied, nor being silent was ignorant of. But all forward persons, as we have said, boastingly bring forth even known things, that they may seem learned by speaking: they despise to be silent moderately, lest they should be believed to have been silent from unskilfulness. But it is to be known indeed that they then praise the rectitude of divine justice, when safety lifts them up to joy, and scourges chastise others; when they behold themselves to enjoy prosperity of things, others to be fatigued by adversity. For while they act perversely, but yet they think themselves right, they believe this, that prosperous things are supplied to them, to be due to their own merits; and by that they gather that God does not judge unjustly, in that no adversity saddens them as being as it were just. But if the force of heavenly correction shall have touched their life however briefly, being struck they immediately rebuke the counsel of the divine examination, which a little before while safe they preferred by admiring, and they deny the judgment to be just, which is adverse to their morals, they dispute concerning divine equity, they leap forth to words of resistance (resultationis), and being corrected because they have transgressed, they transgress more heavily. Whence well also it is said by the Psalmist against the confession of the sinner: He will confess to thee, when thou shalt do well to him (Ps. 49:18). For the voice of confession is despised, which the pleasantness of prosperity forms. But only confession has the merit of great weight, which the force of sorrow by no means separates from the truth of rectitude, which adversity the witness of the heart sharpens even to the judgment of the voice. Therefore it is no wonder that Bildad praises divine justice, who tolerates nothing of adversity from the same justice.

60. The insanity of heretics against the Church pressed by adversities.---But because we have said that the friends of blessed Job hold the type of heretics, it is pleasing that we should show in a few things how the words of Bildad agree with the subreptions of heretics. For these while they behold the holy Church to be seized by temporal animadversion in themselves, more audaciously swell into the boasting of perverse preaching; and pretending the rectitude of the heavenly examination, they assert themselves to prosper from merits, but they attest her to be afflicted by worthy retributions, and with flattering words they immediately seek an entrance of subreption among sorrows, and they strike the life of others, the deaths of others being reproached, as if those were already justly dead who would not believe worthy things concerning God. Whence Bildad the Shuhite, after he brought forth divine justice, adds there:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

VERSES 4, 5, 6.---If thy children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away for their transgression; if thou wouldest seek unto God betimes, and make thy supplication to the Almighty; if thou wert pure and upright; surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous.

61. They had reproached the cutting off of peoples from the Church as an argument of error.--- As if the preachers of errors should say to afflicted Catholics: Provide for your lives, and know how perverse things you hold, from the damnation of those who have died among you, because unless your perfidy displeased the Creator of all, He would by no means take away from you so numerous peoples by raging destruction. For he says: If thy children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away for their transgression. As if saying openly: They are left in the hand of their own iniquity, who would not imitate the life of our rectitude. If thou wouldest seek unto God betimes (diluculo), and make thy supplication to the Almighty. For because heretics think themselves to hold the light of truth, they call the holy Church as if placed in the night of error, to the dawn (diluculum) of truth, so that both through the knowledge of God, she may rise as if through the dawn, and through the prayer of penitence she may wash away past things. If thou wert pure (mundus) and upright (rectus). Pure namely in thought, upright in work. Surely now he would awake for thee. As if he should say openly: Because He who now does not put forth the virtue of His protection in thy tribulations, sleeps as it were from the help of one erring. And he would make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous. That is, He removes the contrarieties of the present life, and immediately affords the security of tranquility. For because all perverse persons estimate temporal joy as the singular good of divine remuneration, those things which they themselves anxiously go about, these they promise to others for a great thing. Whence for the most part it happens, that either they promise lost things to be recovered, or they extend the minds of their hearers to yet greater rewards of the present life. Which Bildad patently expresses, when he immediately adds:

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

VERSE 7.---Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase.

62. What they promise to their followers.---But if he calls the council of the mind the habitation of justice, the masters of errors promise a pacified habitation of justice to afflicted Catholics, because if they draw them to their own things, truly they are silent from contention. For those who could be drawn to perverse things, are now by so much more tranquilly quiet in temporal peace, by how much further they are separated from the eternal. They also promise the riches of intelligence to increase to those following them. Whence also it is added: Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase. But because their words are not easily believed, since often their life is demonstrated contemptible, they bring forth the sentences of the ancient fathers, and they bend their rectitude into an argument of their own error. Whence also it is added:

CHAPTER XXXIX

VERSE 8. For enquire, I pray thee, of the former age, and prepare thyself to the search of their fathers.

63. They abuse the authority of the ancient fathers.---They admonish the former age and the memory of the fathers by no means to be seen, but to be investigated: because they do not wish that to be beheld in it, which is clearly open to all. But sometimes, after the manner of the good, they teach certain things morally, and they insinuate in what manner present things are gathered from past things, and from those things which have already been taken away from our eyes by passing through, they demonstrate how null are those things which are seen. Whence also it is yet added:

VERSE 9. (For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, because our days upon earth are a shadow.)

64. Those things which are already past teach us how quickly the rest are about to pass away.---Therefore the former generation is proposed to be interrogated, that the time of the present life may be shown to pass like a shadow; because namely if we reduce to memory those things which were, and are already past, we patently acknowledge how quickly this also which we hold flees. But often heretics praise the same fathers with us whom we venerate, but with a depraved intellect, they impugn us with those very praises of them. Whence also it is yet added:

CHAPTER XLI.

VERSE 10. Shall not they teach thee, and tell thee, and utter words out of their heart?

65. The wicked sometimes bring forth good things, but not well. They then strike themselves with their own sword.---It is to be noted that above he had said: The spirit of the speech of thy mouth is multiple; but now, the fathers being reduced to memory, he says: They will bring forth eloquences from their heart. As if heretics detesting the life of the holy Church, should say: Thou hast multiplicity of spirit in the mouth, thou hast it not in the heart. But those are to be heard against thee, who bringing forth words from the heart, taught right things by living.

But often the wicked, while they are ignorant of the vice of their own strength, boldly lacerate the rectitude of others; and when they snatch to themselves the authority of rebuke against the good, they either bring forth those goods which they have learned not by seeing, but by hearing; or they heap upon others those evils, lying, which they themselves commit. But when they bring forth those goods which they despise to keep, it is to be known that for the most part truth so sounds through the mouths of adversaries, that moving their tongue it strikes their life, so that speaking and being ignorant of the summit of rectitude, they themselves should become both judges by words, and accusers by deeds. Whence Bildad adds wonderful things indeed against hypocrites, but he assails himself with the sword of the word, because unless he were a simulator of justice even from a little, he would by no means presume to teach a just man with such great temerity.

And indeed what he says are very strong; but these he ought to have said to the foolish, and not to the wise, to the wicked, and not to the upright, because he also asserts himself senseless who, while gardens are thirsty, pours water into the river. But meanwhile postponing to whom it is said, let us think subtly what is said, so that the things brought forth may instruct us, although they impugn the merit of their author. It follows:

VERSE 11. Can the rush grow up without mire? can the flag grow without water?

To whom Bildad compares the rush (scirpum), or the flag (carectum), he himself immediately opens when he subjoins:

CHAPTER XLII.

VERSES 12, 13. Whilst it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb. So are the paths of all that forget God; and the hypocrite's hope shall perish.

66. The hypocrite has the appearance of good works, not the fruit. He has the gifts of God for the increase of damnation.---Therefore by the name of the rush or the flag he marks the life of the hypocrite, which indeed has the appearance of greenness, but has not the fruit of utility for human uses; which, remaining arid in the sterility of work, grows green by the color of sanctity alone. But neither does the rush profit without mire, nor the flag without water, because the life of hypocrites perceives indeed the infusion of the heavenly gift for good works, but, seeking exterior praises in all things which it acts, it becomes empty from the fruit of the perceived infusion.

For often they perform wonderful works of signs, they drive away spirits from obsessed bodies, and through the gift of prophecy they anticipate by knowing whatever things are about to come, but yet they are divided from the giver of so many gifts by the intention of thought, because through His gifts they seek not His glory, but their own favors; and when through the received goods they lift themselves up in their own praise, they fight with those very gifts against the giver. For from thence indeed they are proud against the giver, from whence they ought to have been more humble to Him.

But a more strict sentence strikes them afterwards by so much the more, by how much more largely heavenly goodness now pours into even the ungrateful. And the amplitude of the gift becomes to them an increase of damnation, because being irrigated they bear not fruit, but under the color of greenness they grow into the height empty. Whom the Truth well expresses through the Gospel, saying: Many will say to me in that day: Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity (Matt. 7:22-23). Therefore the rush or the flag does not live without water, because truly hypocrites do not receive the greenness of good operation except from the heavenly gift; but because they snatch this into the use of their own praise, they grow indeed green in the water, but yet empty.

68. The hypocrite does not persevere in good works.

Among these things it is to be known that the goods of the righteous, because they begin from the heart, grow even to the term of the present life; but the works of hypocrites, because they are by no means rooted in secret, often fail before the present life is finished. For for the most part they insist on the study of sacred erudition; and because they seek this not for preparing merits, but for deserving favors, immediately as they snatch the judgment of human praise, and through this attain the grace of transitory progress, they serve secular cares with their whole mind, and are thoroughly emptied of sacred erudition; and by acting afterwards they indicate how much they love temporal things, who alone previously preached eternal things. But for the most part they show the appearance of an assumed maturity; they are adorned with the quiet of silence, the long-suffering of patience, the virtue of continence; but when through these they have reached the summit of sought honor, and when reverence is now paid to them by all, they immediately pour themselves out into the lewdness of pleasure, and they themselves are witnesses to themselves that they did not hold good things from the heart, who quickly dismissed these. But sometimes some give what they possess, and bestow all things on the indigent; but yet before the term of life, being kindled with the itch of avarice, they seek the things of others, who seemed to bestow their own, and afterwards they go about with pertinacious cruelty for what they previously left with feigned piety. [Vet. XXVIII.] Whence also it is rightly said now: While it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb. For according to the flesh even the righteous are an herb, the Prophet attesting, who says: All flesh is grass (Isai. 40:6). But the rush is said to wither before all other herbs, because, the righteous remaining in their good, the life of hypocrites is dried up from the greenness of assumed rectitude. The other herbs also wither, because the works of the righteous fail with the life of the flesh. But the rush anticipates the aridity of the herbs, because before the hypocrite passes from the flesh, he leaves the deeds of virtues which he had shown in himself. Of whom it is well said also through the Psalmist: Let them be as the grass upon the house-tops, which withereth afore it be plucked up (Psal. 129:6). For the grass of the building is born on high, but it is by no means solidified with a fat root, because the hypocrite also is discerned to act high things indeed, but is not strengthened in them from the purity of the heart. Which truly grass even not plucked up withers more quickly, because forsooth the hypocrite both still subsists in the present life, and already loses the works of sanctity as the appearance of greenness. For because he studied to act good things without the intention of right thought, losing these, he indicates that he has flourished without a root.

69. The hypocrite cannot enjoy his hope for long.

But Bildad, as we have said before, to whom he compares the rush or the flag, immediately opens when he subjoins: So are the paths of all that forget God; and the hypocrite's hope shall perish. For what does the hypocrite hope for by all his works, except the reverence of honor, the glory of praise, to be feared by the better sort, to be called holy by all? But the hope of the hypocrite cannot remain, because, not seeking eternity, he flees what he holds. For by no means is the intention of his mind fixed on that glory which is possessed without end, but when he gapes after transitory favors, he loses in receiving it what he labors for, the Truth attesting, who says: Verily I say unto you, They have their reward (Matt. 6:2, 5). But this hope of receiving a reward cannot be held long, because honor is bestowed for showed works, but life is urged to the term; praises resound, but times hasten to the end with the praises; and because by no means is the mind rooted in the love of eternity, it surely falls with those very things which it loves. For no one is able to love movable things and stand himself immovable. For he who embraces passing things is by that very thing led to the course, by which he is implicated with the running things. Let him say therefore: And the hypocrite's hope shall perish, because human praise which he seeks with great labors runs down, impelled by the moments of times. Well moreover is it subjoined:

CHAPTER XLIII

[Rec. XXV].

VERSE 14. His senselessness shall not please him.

70. The hypocrite sells a thing of great price for a vile one. He is similar to a fertile and neglected vine.---For it is a great senselessness to act laborious things, and to gape after the breeze of praise; to serve heavenly precepts with strong work, but to seek the reward of earthly retribution. For so to speak, he who desires human favors for the virtue which he acts, carries a thing of great merit for sale at a vile price; whence he could have merited the kingdom of heaven, from thence he seeks the coin of transitory speech. Therefore he sells the work at a vile price, because he spends great things, but receives very small things. [Vet. XXIX.] To whom therefore are hypocrites similar, except to fertile and neglected vines, which bring forth fruit through abundance, but are by no means raised from the earth through study? What the fat shoots germinate, the wandering beasts trample; and by how much more richly they behold this, being cast down in the lowest parts they consume it more greedily, because truly the works of hypocrites, while they are shown clear, come forth as if fat, but while they seek human praises they are as if left on the earth. Which the beasts of this world, namely the malignant spirits, eat, because they bend these to the use of perdition; and they snatch them so much more ardently, by how much also the great things become more clearly known. Whence it is well said through the prophet: The standing stalk, there is no bud in them, and they shall make no meal; if so be they yield it, the strangers shall swallow it up (Hosea 8:7). For the stalk has no bud when life lacks the merits of virtues. The stalk makes no meal when he who profits in the present world understands nothing of subtlety, renders no fruit of good work.

71. The hypocrite satiates malignant spirits with his fruits. He himself is also fed now, otherwise after death.---But often even when he has made it, strangers eat this, because also when hypocrites show good works, the vows of malignant spirits are satiated by these. For they who through these do not seek to please God, by no means feed the lord of the field, but strangers. Therefore the hypocrite, similar to a fertile and neglected shoot, is not able to keep the fruit, because the cluster of good work lies on the earth. But yet he is fed by this very senselessness of his, because for a good work he is honored by all; he pre-eminently stands above others, he holds the subject minds of men, he is lifted up in greater places, he is nourished by favors. But these things his senselessness pleases him meanwhile, but it will not please him, because when the time of retribution shall have come, that which was senseless displeases in punishment. Then he will understand that he has acted foolishly, when for the delectation of praise he shall have received the sentence of divine rebuke. Then he considers that he has been senseless, when perpetual torments chastise him for the temporal glory which he perceived. Then punishments open true knowledge, because through these surely it is gathered that all things were nothing which were able to pass away. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLIV

[Rec. XXVI].

IBID.---And his trust is as a spider's web.

72. The hypocrite's trust is vain, no goods before God, unfruitful preaching, empty abstinence.---Well is the trust of hypocrites said to be similar to spiders' webs, because the wind of mortal life dissipates everything which they sweat out for obtaining glory. For since they do not seek eternal things, they lose temporal goods with time. It is also to be thought that spiders lead their threads by order, because hypocrites dispose their works as if under discretion. The spider's web is studiously woven, but is dissipated by a sudden blast, because whatever the hypocrite performs with labor, the breeze of human favor takes away; and while the work fails in the appetite for praise, the labor vanishes as if into the wind. For often the deeds of hypocrites endure even to the term of the present life, but because through these they do not seek the praise of the author, they were never good before the eyes of God. For for the most part, as we have said before, they are supported by the erudition of the sacred law, they bring forth the words of doctrine, they gird everything which they feel with testimonies, and yet through these they seek not the life of the hearers, but their own favors, because they have not known how to bring forth other things, except those which may shake the hearts of the hearers to repaying praises, but not kindle them to tears. [Vet. XXX.] For the mind occupied with exterior concupiscences does not grow warm with the fire of divine love; and therefore those words which are brought forth with a cold heart are unable to inflame their hearers to heavenly desire. For neither does a thing which has not burned in itself kindle another. Whence it happens for the most part that the sayings of hypocrites both do not instruct the hearers, and they render those same ones who bring themselves forth worse, being elated with praises. For Paul attesting, Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth (1 Cor. 8:1). Therefore when charity does not erect by edifying, knowledge perverts by puffing up. For the most part hypocrites afflict themselves with wonderful abstinence, they wear down all the strength of the body, and living in the flesh they as if thoroughly extinguish the life of the flesh, and so through abstinence they approach death, that dying they live almost daily. But for these they seek human eyes, they expect the glory of admiration, the Truth attesting, who says: They disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast (Matt. 6:16). For their faces grow pale, the body is shaken with debility, the breast is urged with interrupting sighs. But among these, the speech of admiration is sought from the mouth of neighbors, and nothing else is thought by such great labor, except human estimation. Whom truly that Simon well signifies, who at the time of the Lord's passion carried the cross in compulsion (angaria), of whom it is written: They found a man of Cyrene, coming to meet them, Simon by name: him they compelled to bear his cross (Matt. 27:32; Mark 15:21). For what we act through compulsion, this we do not perform from the study of love. Therefore to carry the cross of Jesus in compulsion is to tolerate the affliction of abstinence for another intention than is necessary. Or does he not carry the cross of Jesus in compulsion, who as if at the precept of the Lord, tames the flesh, but yet loves not the spiritual country? Whence also that same Simon carries the cross, but by no means dies, because every hypocrite afflicts the body indeed through abstinence, but yet through the love of glory lives to the world.

[Vet. XXXI.] 73. He inflicts the cross on the flesh, but lives to the world.---On the contrary, it is well said through Paul concerning the elect: And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. For we crucify the flesh with the affections and lusts, if we so restrain gluttony, that we now seek nothing of the world's glory. For he who macerates the body, but pants after honors, has inflicted the cross on the flesh, but through concupiscence lives worse to the world, because also often through the image of sanctity the unworthy one attains a place of rule, which, unless he showed something of virtue in himself, he would merit to perceive by no labor. But what he obtains delectably passes away, and what follows remains penally. Trust of sanctity is now placed in the mouths of men; but when the internal judge examines the secrets of the heart, witnesses of life are not sought exteriorly. Well therefore is it said: As the spider's web is his trust, because when the witness of the heart appears, everything passes away which trusts exteriorly in human favor. Whence also it is still aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLV

[Rec. XXVII].

VERSE 15. He shall lean upon his house, and it shall not stand; he shall prop it up, and it shall not rise.

74. The house of the hypocrite upon which he leans is human favor. It is not able to stand.---As the house of exterior conversation is the building which the body inhabits, so the house of our thought is any thing whatever which the mind inhabits through love. For every thing which we love, we inhabit as if resting in this. Whence Paul, because he had fixed his heart in the things above, placed indeed on the earth, but yet a stranger from the earth, said: Our conversation is in heaven (Philip. 3:20). Therefore the mind of the hypocrite thinks of nothing else in every thing which it acts except the glory of its own opinion, nor does it care where it is led afterwards through merit, but what may be said meanwhile. His house therefore is the delectation of favor, which he inhabits as if quiet, because through all his works he reclines himself to this within his mind. But this house is not able to stand, because praise passes away with life, and human favor does not subsist in the judgment. Whence also the foolish virgins, who had not taken oil in their vessels, because forsooth they had glory in the voices of others and not in their own consciences, being troubled by the presence of the bridegroom, say: Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out (Matt. 25:8). For to ask oil from neighbors is to implore the glory of good work from the testimony of another's mouth. For the empty mind, when by all its labors it shall have found that it has held nothing within, seeks testimony without. As if the foolish virgins should say openly: When you behold us rejected without retribution, say what you have seen in our work.

[Vet. XXXII.] 75. Nor will the trust of the hypocrite's sanctity stand any more in the judgment.---But in vain then does the hypocrite lean upon this house of praise, because human attestation supports him nothing in the judgment; because he received that same praise as a gift before, which he afterwards exacts in testimony. Or surely the hypocrite leans upon his house, when, deceived by vain favors, he is lifted up as if from the trust of sanctity. For many hypocrites do evil things in secret, but certain good things in public. And when they receive praises from manifest goods, they turn away the eyes of consideration from occult evils; and they estimate themselves such as they hear without, not such as they have known within. Whence it happens for the most part that they come with trust also to the heavenly judgment, because they believe themselves to be such before the internal arbiter as they were held by men without. But the house of the hypocrite is not able to stand, because in the terror of the strict examination all previous trust of sanctity falls. And when he shall have known the testimonies of another's mouth to be wanting to him, he turns himself to enumerating his own works. Whence also it is still subjoined: He shall prop it up, and it shall not rise. For this, which is not able to stand by itself, is propped up that it may stand, because when the hypocrite beholds his life to be shaken in the judgment, he contends to establish this by propping it up with an enumeration of works. Or do they not prop up the habitation of their praise on this side and that, who enumerating their deeds in the judgment, as we have mentioned before, say: Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? (Matt. 7:22). But the house of praise propped up by so many allegations by no means rises up, because immediately the judge says: I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity (Ibid. 23). And it is to be known that this which rises erects itself from the lowest to the higher things. Therefore the house of the hypocrite is not able to rise, because by everything which he was able to act according to the heavenly precepts, he never lifted his mind from the earth. Rightly therefore then is he by no means erected to the reward of retribution, who by this which he now exhibits lies in the appetite for temporal glory. [Vet. XXXIII, Rec. XXVIII.] But because we have heard how the life of the hypocrite, marked by the appellation of the rush, is reprobated in the judgment, before the strict judge appears, let us hear what sort he is held to be by men. It follows:

CHAPTER XLVI.

VERSE 16. He seemeth moist before the sun cometh.

76. Now the hypocrite is believed holy, but when Christ cometh he will appear iniquitous.---

Often in sacred eloquence the Lord is figured by the appellation of the sun, as it is said through the prophet: But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise (Mal. 4:2). And as the impious rejected in the judgment are described to say in the book of Wisdom: We have erred from the way of truth, and the light of righteousness hath not shined unto us, and the sun of righteousness rose not upon us (Wisd. 5:6). Before the sun, therefore, the rush is discerned moist, because before the divine strictness shines forth in the judgment, every hypocrite shows himself infused with the grace of sanctity; he is beheld as if green, because he is estimated just, he obtains a place of honor, he prevails by the glory of sanctity, veneration is paid to him by all, the opinion of praise is extended. Therefore this rush is moist in the night; but when the sun cometh it is dried up, because truly the hypocrite in the darkness of the present life is believed holy by all, but when the strict judge shall have come, it will appear how iniquitous he is. Let him say therefore: He seemeth moist before the sun cometh, because he now exhibits himself green to human eyes, but then in the heat of divine judgment he will wither. It follows:

CHAPTER XLVII.

IBID.---And in his rising his bud goeth forth.

77. As soon as he acts rightly, the hypocrite wants to be praised. Having assumed the habit of sanctity, sometimes he becomes worse.---Any herb in being born is first produced from the earth, is touched by the breeze and heats, is nourished by sun and rains, and then at last is opened to bringing forth the bud of its seed. But the rush is born with its flower, and soon as it rises from the earth, it produces the bud of its seed with itself. Well therefore by the other herbs any saints, but by the rush the hypocrite is designated, because just men, before they rise in the work of holy conversation, tolerate the winter of this life, and the heats of heavy persecutions fatigue them; but when they do right things, they by no means seek the reward of their rectitude here; but when they depart from the labors of the present world, coming to the eternal country, they enjoy the expected retribution. But on the contrary the hypocrite, because he is soon born in good work, endeavors to receive the glory of the present world. As if after the manner of the rush he rises with a bud, who for that which he begins to live well, seeks immediately to be honored by all. Therefore the bud in the rising is the reward in the beginning. For often some desert the ways of open depravity, assume the habit of sanctity; and as soon as they have touched the first thresholds of living well, forgetting who they were, they are no longer willing to be afflicted through penitence for finished iniquities; but they desire to be praised for begun justice, they covet to be over others even better ones. Whom for the most part while present prosperity follows according to their vow, they become much worse than they had been before from the habit of sanctity. For occupied with manifold things, and confused by that very occupation, they not only by no means deplore things committed, but even exaggerate things which should be deplored.

[Vet. XXXIX. Rec. XXIV.] 78. A recent convert should not be promoted to exterior offices. Our goods perish if too quickly disclosed.---For they who desert the world ought not to be promoted to exterior offices, unless they are solidified for a long time through humility in the contempt of that same world. For those goods perish more quickly which become known to men before the time, because also shrubs planted before they coalesce with a fixed root, if a hand touching shakes them, it dries them up. But if the root is fixed in the depth, and solidified being sprinkled with the humors of the earth, this both the hand pushes, but does not hurt; these also the blasts of winds shake by bending, but do not overturn. Lest therefore the life of the begun work be rooted out, for a long time and robustly the root of the heart is to be fixed in the depth of humility, so that when the breeze of detraction or of favor shall have blown from a human mouth, although it curves it in any direction whatever, it may not root out the mind thoroughly; but it may return to its state immediately after the inflection, if it remains strong in its root within itself. What is more robust in growing things than a rising wall? Which yet if, while it is being constructed, it be pushed, it is immediately destroyed without labor; but if through a space of time it is permitted to be dried from its humor, often it is by no means shaken even by the blows of battering rams. Thus, thus forsooth our goods both perish when manifested unseasonably, and are solidified when hidden longer, because when the hand of human occupation shall have touched the beginning life of our conversation, it pushes as it were a recent wall, and easily destroys it, because it has not yet lost the humor of its own infirmity. But when the mind compresses itself in the long abjection of its quiet, it hardens as it were after the manner of a dried wall against blows, and everything which strikes a solid thing immediately leaps back broken. Hence it is that Moses prohibited the life of those beginning from being exercised in human occupations, saying: Thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, nor shear the firstling of thy sheep (Deut. 15:19). For to work with the firstling of a bullock is to show the beginnings of good conversation in the exercise of public action. Also to shear the firstlings of sheep is to denude our beginning goods from the covering of their occultation to human eyes. Therefore we are prohibited from working with the firstling of a bullock, and we are restrained from shearing the firstlings of sheep, because even if we begin anything robust, we ought not to exercise this in the open too quickly. And when our life begins something simple and innocent, it is worthy that it should not leave the veils of its secret, lest it show this naked to human eyes as if with the fleece withdrawn.

[Vet. XXXV.] 79. The beginnings of a good life are to be dedicated to God alone. Why they ought not to become known too quickly.---Therefore let the firstlings of oxen and sheep profit for divine sacrifices alone, so that whatever strong and innocent we begin, we may immolate this to the honor of the intimate judge on the altar of the heart. Which is without doubt so much more willingly accepted by Him, by how much also being hidden from men it is spotted by no appetite for praise. But often the beginnings of a new conversation are as yet mixed from the carnal life; and therefore they ought not to become known too quickly, lest when the goods which please are praised, the mind deceived by its own praise should be unable to detect in them the evils which lie hid. Whence it is rightly said again through Moses: When ye shall come into the land which I shall give you, and shall have planted all manner of trees for food, then ye shall count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised. Three years shall it be as uncircumcised unto you: it shall not be eaten of (Lev. 19:23). For the trees for food are works fertile with virtues. Therefore we take away the foreskins of the trees when, being suspicious of that very infirmity of the beginning, we do not approve the firstlings of our works. But the fruits which germinate we lead as unclean, and we do not fit them for our eating, because when the firstlings of a good work are praised, it is worthy that this should not feed the mind of the worker; lest while the received praise is sweetly plucked, the fruit of the work should be eaten unseasonably. Therefore he who shall have received praise from a human mouth for begun virtue, has as it were eaten the fruit of a planted tree before the time.

80. The hypocrite seeks witnesses of his work; if they are not present, he thinks he has lost his labor.---Hence through the Psalmist the Truth says: It is vain for you to rise up early, sit down after you have rested (Psal. 127:2). For to rise up before the light is to rejoice in the night of the present life before the clarity of eternal retribution appears. Therefore we must first sit down, that afterwards we may rightly rise, because whoever does not now spontaneously humble himself, by no means does the following glory exalt him. Therefore what is there to rise up before the light, this here is for the hypocrite to bring forth a bud in his rising, because desiring human praises, where he is born to a good work, there he soon desires to attain the glory of retribution. Had they not brought forth a bud in their rising, of whom the Truth said: They love the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets, and to be called of men, Rabbi (Luke 20:46; Matt. 23:6)? For that which they begin to act well, because they endeavor to follow honor from men, they rise up after the manner of the rush from their rising with a bud. These truly when they desire to work right things, first with a solicitous mind seek witnesses of that same work of theirs, and handle with silent thought whether there are those who may see the things to be done, whether those who shall have seen them are able worthily to speak of these. But if it should perhaps happen that no man beholds their deeds, they without doubt estimate that they have lost these; and they repute the eyes of the internal arbiter as if absent, because they refuse to receive from Him the turn of their work in the future. And since when the hypocrite has done anything right, he seeks to be seen by many, it is well subjoined still concerning this rush:

CHAPTER XLVIII.

VERSE 17. His roots shall be thickened upon a heap of stones, and he shall dwell among stones.

81. The hypocrite procures the admiration of men for himself with all his intention.---For what do we receive by the name of roots, except hidden thoughts, which come forth in secret, but rise through the open in the showing of works? as also concerning the seed of the word it is said through the prophet: And the remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah shall again take root downward, and bear fruit upward (Isai. 37:31). For to take root downward is to multiply good thought in hidden places. But to bear fruit upward is to show the right things which he has thought through the efficacy of work. But by the name of stones men are designated in sacred Scripture, as it is said to the holy Church through Isaiah: I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles (Isai. 54:12). Who opened what he had meant by those same stones when he subjoined: And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord (Ibid., 13). And as it is said by the admonition of Peter: Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house (1 Pet. 2:5). In this place therefore because stones are mentioned, but yet they are by no means called living, by the naked appellation of stones the reprobate and elect mixed together can be figured. [Vet. XXXVI, Rec. XXX.] Therefore this rush which dwells among stones, thickens its roots upon a heap of stones, because every hypocrite multiplies his thoughts in searching out the admiration of men. For by everything which hypocrites do, because by hidden thoughts they seek the praises of men, they as it were send the roots of the rush into a heap of stones. For about to work they think of their own praises, but being praised they revolve these with themselves silent in their thoughts. They rejoice that they have shone forth pre-eminent in human estimation. And when being puffed up with favors they swell within themselves, often they themselves even silent wonder at what they are. They desire to seem daily higher than themselves, and they grow up in work with wonderful inventions, because as virtues enervate every vice, so arrogance strengthens. For it compels the mind to grow young again, and to prevail against strength, because also what the vigor of health denies, the love of praise commands. Whence also for their deeds, as we have said, they seek arbiters. But if it should happen that witnesses are wanting to their work, they themselves relate what they have performed. And when they have begun to be carried away by favors, they often add something by lying to those same works of theirs which they report they have done. But when they also speak true things, they make these alien by speaking them, because being rewarded with sought favors, they are emptied of their internal retribution.

VERSE 18.---If he should pluck him out of his place, his place shall deny him, and shall say: I know thee not.

82. By the place of the hypocrite, this world in which he is seen is understood; in which since he now does good works, the place seems to acknowledge him, because as he is himself, so also is the place in which he is, that is, as the hypocrite wishes to be what he is not, so his place seems to be what it is not. For the hypocrite wishes to be holy in heart, but is so in showing; therefore his place where he is called holy is that which he himself is not. But when death shall have plucked him out of his place, soon that same place denies him whom it had held. Whence also is subjoined:

VERSE 19.---For this is the joy of his way, that others may germinate again from the earth.

83. The place denies the hypocrite, because death separates him from all the brightness of the world. And because he who had lived under the appearance of religion is punished in Gehenna after death, the place is said not to have known him, because that which soon appeared as a friend to the hypocrite, soon through his damnation is shown to be an enemy. For the place has not known him who loved his place only for this purpose, that in it he might have been able to be seen as holy. Whence as soon as he is plucked out of his place, that same place denies him whom it had held, because as soon as he who is called great in this world dies, it appears to all that they rejoice in his death, or soon his works and name are deleted by oblivion in this world. But he who is now a hypocrite, as soon as he shall have been snatched from the earth, others germinate. For the place of the earth also brings forth other hypocrites into this world soon after him. Who while they fear nothing concerning those who were before them, as they also seem to germinate in the earth, so again like those they are plucked up by the roots from the same earth. What is said of his place, I know thee not, can not absurdly be understood also concerning the recollection of that same hypocrite. Who while he shall be in torments after death, and shall have returned to the memory of the present world, finds nothing in it for his salvation. For he himself then says to himself: I know thee not, because his place where he was will not now profit him, because that which he had been in the world will not then save him. Whence also is subjoined:

VERSE 20.---God will not cast away the simple, nor will He reach out His hand to the evil.

84. The sense indeed of him who now involves himself in manifold inquiries for human praise, as soon as he shall have been plucked out of his place, is not cast away, because God does not cast away the simple. For he is simple who is what he seems to be; who by no means doubles himself in this world through hypocrisy, but he who is in heart, is in showing. But this one whom God casts away, and will not reach out His hand to the evil, is he who doubles himself. For he who doubles himself in this world through hypocrisy, as soon as he shall have been plucked out of his place, God will not reach out His hand to him, because he who in this world sought the praises of men, as soon as he who praised him shall have been snatched from the world, receives not the hand from the Lord.

VERSE 21.---Until thy mouth be filled with laughter, and thy lips with rejoicing.

85. If God does not cast away the simple, nor will He reach out His hand to the evil, as soon as he who is simple shall have been plucked out from the tribulation of his place, he is led to joy; because his mouth is filled with laughter, and his lips with rejoicing. For when after the hardships of this life, which he shall have simply tolerated for the sole love of his Creator, he shall have been snatched away to that country of eternity, then in him all that exists is filled with laughter and rejoicing, because he who then is silent, no longer prays for himself then, but he who already possesses, rejoices in praises. Whence also is subjoined:

VERSE 22.---They that hate thee shall be clothed with confusion, and the dwelling place of the wicked shall not stand.

86. For the hypocrite hates the simple man, because while he who wishes to be seen as holy beholds him who is truly holy, he sees as it were one contrary to his own simulation. For while he who is simple dwells in the tribulation of his place, the hypocrite glories in the glory of his place. But when the simple man is led to laughter and rejoicing, the hypocrite, who then soon in this world seemed to have existed as a friend to him, soon through his damnation is shown to be an enemy. For then they that hated him shall be clothed with confusion, because they who in this world were in the glory of the world, in that eternity again they blush. For then the tabernacle of the wicked shall not stand, because as soon as he who is called great in this world dies, it appears to all that they rejoice in his death, or soon his works and name are deleted by oblivion in this world. Since therefore this speech of Bildad designates hypocrites through the hypocrite, it is not absurdly said: The tabernacle of the wicked shall not stand. For as soon as he who was wicked shall have been snatched from the earth, others germinate. Who while they fear nothing concerning those who were before them, as they also seem to germinate in the earth, so again like those they are plucked up by the roots from the same earth.

BOOK NINE.

In which the ninth part of the book of Job, from the beginning of the ninth chapter to the end of the eleventh chapter, is explained.

CHAPTER I.

How it can be that a man compared to God is not justified.

VERSE 2.---I know indeed that it is so, and that man may not be justified compared with God.

1. Blessed Job, when he turned himself to Bildad, who was speaking under the appearance of a hypocrite, soon deflected his words to a good sense, because holy men collect fruit even from the sayings of the wicked, and they turn their words to utility then, when they are not ignorant that their mind is perverse concerning those same words which they have brought forth. For Bildad, when he said: God will not cast away the simple, nor will He reach out His hand to the evil, soon turned those words which he said to Job, because as it were he showed the holy man soon plucked out from his place to die, and soon to be cast into Gehenna, soon after his damnation to be shown, soon not to receive the hand from the Lord, soon to be shown through his damnation.

2. In which words blessed Job both captures the truth of the sayings and despises the elation of the speaker. I know indeed, he says, that it is so. As if he were to say openly: I know that God does not cast away the simple, and that He does not reach out His hand to the evil; but this which I know to be true, thou sayest is not so, because he whom thou sayest is not simple, is he who does not deny that he is simple. But this which I know to be true, thou sayest is not so, because he whom thou sayest is not simple, is he who does not deny that he is simple.

If therefore God does not cast away the simple, and I am simple, why am I cast away in this tribulation? If God does not reach out His hand to the evil, and I am evil, why does He not reach out His hand to speak? But if thou knewest what the justice of God is, thou wouldst soon see that he whom thou sayest is not simple, is he who does not deny that he is simple. Since therefore God does not cast away the simple, and I do not deny that I am simple, it remains that he whom thou sayest is not simple, is he who does not deny that he is simple. Whence also is subjoined: And that man may not be justified compared with God.

3. For every man who compares himself to God is soon emptied of the brightness of his own righteousness. For if man be compared to divine justice, all justice in him is soon said to be not justice. But when Bildad himself said: God will not cast away the simple, he soon turned those words which he said to Job, because as it were he showed the holy man soon plucked out from his place to die, and soon to be cast into Gehenna, soon after his damnation to be shown, soon not to receive the hand from the Lord, soon to be shown through his damnation. What then does Bildad accuse in Job, except divine justice? For when he said: God will not cast away the simple, he soon wished to reprove Job of iniquity, because he was not ignorant that he had been cast away by the Lord. But soon blessed Job turned these words to divine justice, because as it were God does not cast away the simple, but yet he who in the eyes of men seems to be simple, in the eyes of God is soon said to be not simple. For he who in this world seems simple among men, compared to God is soon said to be not justified. Whence also is subjoined:

VERSE 3.---If he should wish to contend with Him, he will not be able to answer Him one for a thousand.

4. For in sacred Scripture, universality is designated by the number a thousand, as it is said by the Psalmist: The word which He commanded to a thousand generations (Psal. 105:8). For there cannot be a thousand generations until the coming of the Lord, in which that same word is said to have been commanded. What therefore is designated by a thousand generations, except the universality of generations?

[Rec. XXXII].

VERSE 22.---They that hate thee shall be clothed with confusion.

90. Why the reprobate shall blush in the day of judgment.---Confusion clothes the enemies of the just in the final examination, because when they behold their past evils overflowing before the eyes of their mind, their own guilt, depressing them on every side, vests them. For they then endure the memory of their deeds for punishment, who now sin rejoicing as if strangers to the sense of reason. There they see how much they ought to have fled what they loved; there they behold how mournful was that in which they now congratulate themselves in fault. Then guilt obscures the mind, and conscience itself attacks itself with the darts of its own recollection. Who, therefore, can worthily weigh how great the confusion of the iniquitous will then be, when both the eternal Judge is seen without, and fault is turned before the eyes within? Who for this reason arrive at these things, because they loved only transitory things here. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER LIV.

IBID.---And the tabernacle of the impious shall not subsist.

91. What is the affection of the reprobate concerning earthly goods. What that of the just.---A tabernacle is indeed constructed that the body may be defended from heat and cold. What therefore is expressed in this place by the name of tabernacle, except the building up of earthly happiness, through which the reprobate multiply things about to fall upon themselves, that they may defend themselves from the necessities of the present life as if from heat and rain? For they ambition to increase in honors, lest they seem despised. By aggregating earthly things they heap them up, lest they waste away in the cold of want. They neglect to care for what follows, and with all intention they busy themselves lest anything be wanting in present things. They study to spread their name, lest they be hidden; and if all things are supplied to their desire, they think themselves protected in all things and happy. Where therefore they construct the habitation of their mind, there without doubt they have fixed their tabernacles. They endure adversities impatiently, they rejoice remissly in prosperities. They think only of those things which are present, nor do they breathe again with any recollection to the affection of the heavenly country. They rejoice that the goods which they desire are supplied to them; and where they rest in the flesh, there they also bury their mind by extinguishing it, because, slaughtered by the dart of secular care, they always carry within through thought that heap of earthly things which they multiply by seeking without.

92. [Vet. XL.] But on the contrary, the just neither receive offered goods here as great, nor do they greatly fear inflicted evils. But even when they use present goods, they fear future evils; and when they groan over present evils, they are consoled by the love of following goods. And thus they are refreshed by temporal subsidy, as a traveler uses a bed in an inn: he rests, and hastens to depart; he is quiet in body, but tends to another thing in mind. Sometimes indeed they also desire to endure adversities, and they flee from prospering in transitory things, lest they be delayed from the reaching of the country by the delight of the journey, lest they fix the step of the heart in the way of pilgrimage, and at some time come to the sight of the heavenly country without remuneration. They rejoice to be despised, nor do they grieve to be afflicted by necessities. Those therefore who do not fortify themselves against present adversities, as it were do not wish to have a tabernacle against heat and rains. Whence also Peter is rightly reproved, because not yet strengthened by the perfection of the mind, the brightness of truth being known, he endeavors to fix a tabernacle on earth (Matth. XVII, 4; Mark IX, 2). The just therefore neglect to build themselves here, where they have known themselves to be pilgrims and guests. For because they desire to rejoice in their own things, they refuse to be happy in what is alien. But the unjust, by how much further they are divided from the inheritance of the eternal country, by so much deeper they fix the foundations of thought in the earth. Hence it is that from the very beginning of the human condition, in the elect offspring Enoch is born seventh. Hence it is that Cain calls his first son Enoch, and from his name calls the city which he built (Gen. IV, 17). For Enoch is called dedication. The iniquitous therefore dedicate themselves in the beginnings, because in this life, which is before, they plant the root of the heart, that they may flourish here according to their wish, and wither away from the following country from the foundation. But to the just Enoch arises seventh, because the festive dedication of their life is reserved in the end. Hence it is that, Paul attesting, Abraham dwells in huts (Hebr. XI, 9), because he expects the city having foundations, which the heavenly architect has built. Hence it is that Jacob, following the flocks of sheep humbly, walks (Gen. XXXIII, 14), and Esau coming to meet him is elevated by the tumult of a manifold company, because indeed the elect here have no elation, and in the goods of the flesh the reprobate swell joyful. Hence the Lord says to Israel: If thou shalt choose one of the people of the land, and shalt appoint a prince over thee, he shall not make for himself horses and horsemen (Deut. XVII, 16). And yet the first king elected from the same people, as soon as he reached the summit of power, chose for himself three thousand horsemen, and immediately broke out into elation, and burst forth into the building up of the summit perceived (1 Kings XIII, 2), because he could not restrain without under equality what the mind within swelled above the rest. As if a fortified tabernacle that rich man had constructed for himself, who said: Soul, thou hast many goods laid up for many years: rest, eat and drink, and feast (Luke XII, 19). But because his tabernacle does not subsist in the foundation of truth, he immediately heard: Fool, this night they require thy soul from thee; those things which thou hast prepared, whose shall they be (Ibid., 20)? Well therefore is it said: The tabernacle of the impious shall not subsist, because the lovers of a fleeing life, while they studiously build themselves in present things, are suddenly snatched away to eternal things.

BOOK NINE.

EXPLAINS THE NINTH CHAPTER WITH THE WHOLE TENTH.

CHAPTER I.

1. Perverse minds, if they have once broken out into the eagerness of opposition, whether they hear something wrong or right from those who contradict them, impugn it with adverse responses, because when a person is displeasing through opposition, even the right things they have brought forward do not please. But on the contrary, the hearts of the good, in whom the person does not come into hatred, but the fault, so judge perverse things that they assume the right things which are said. For they sit as most just arbiters in discerning the senses of those who contradict, and thus reject things badly brought forward, that they nevertheless approve what they know from the truth. For it is wont among a multitude of thorns, that even an ear of corn should grow up from the seed of the fruit. Therefore it must be done with the cautious hand of the worker, that while the thorn is taken away, the ear of corn may be nourished, in so far as he who studies to eradicate what pricks, may know how to preserve what refreshes. Whence also blessed Job, because Bildad the Shuhite had rightly said through inquiry: Doth God supplant judgment, or doth the Almighty subvert that which is just (Job VIII, 3)? because he had brought forward true and robust things against hypocrites, well beholding these things brought forward generally even against the wicked, he tramples on the eagerness of his own defense, and immediately approves what he has heard, saying:

CHAPTER II

[Rec. II].

CHAP. IX, VER. 2.---Truly I know that it is so, and that man compared with God is not justified.

2. We ought to be subjected to God, not compared with Him.---For man subjected to God perceives justice, compared with Him he loses it, because whoever compares himself to the Author of goods, deprives himself of the good which he had received. For he who arrogates to himself the goods received, fights with His own gifts against God. Whence therefore he is erected by being despised, it is worthy that being erected he should be destroyed therefrom. But the holy man, because he beholds every merit of our virtue to be fault, if it be strictly judged by the internal Arbiter, rightly subjoins:

CHAPTER III.

If he should wish to contend with Him, he will not be able to answer Him one for a thousand.

3. He loses the gifts of God who is extolled by them.---In sacred Scripture the number a thousand is wont to be understood for universality. For hence the Psalmist says: Of the word which He commanded to a thousand generations (Psal. CIV, 8); since indeed it is certain, that from the very beginning of the world until the coming of the Redeemer, not more than seventy-seven generations are numbered by the Evangelist (Luke III, 38). What therefore is expressed in the number a thousand, except the perfect universality of the foreknown generation for bringing forth a new offspring? Hence also it is said by John: And they shall reign with Him a thousand years (Apoc. XX, 6), because namely the kingdom of holy Church is solidified by the perfection of universality. But because the unit multiplied is led into ten, ten led through itself is dilated into a hundred, which again led through ten tends into a thousand, when we begin from one, that we may come to a thousand, what is designated in this place by the name of one, except the beginning of living well, what by the amplitude of the number a thousand except the perfection of the same good life? But to contend with God is not to attribute to Him, but to arrogate to oneself the glory of one's own virtue. But let the holy man behold that even he who has already received the highest gifts, if he be extolled by those received, loses all things which he had received, and let him say: If he should wish to contend with Him, he will not be able to answer Him one for a thousand. For he who contends with the Author, does not suffice to answer one for a thousand, because he who erects himself from perfection, shows himself to have not even the beginning of living well. For we cannot answer one for a thousand, because when we are extolled by the perfection of a good life, we show that we have not even begun it. But then we are more truly shaken by our infirmity, if we weigh considering how immense is the power of the Judge. Whence also it is subjoined:

[Vet. II].

VERSE 4.---He is wise in heart, and strong in strength.

4. God as wise cannot be deceived, as strong cannot be avoided.---What wonder if we call the Founder of the wise, wise, whom we know to be wisdom itself? And what wonder that he records Him to be strong, whom no one is ignorant that He is this very strength? But the holy man, in two words brought forward in praise of the Author, intimates something to us, whence he may bring us back trembling to the knowledge of ourselves. For God is said to be wise, because He subtly acknowledges our hidden things; and that He is strong is added, because He powerfully strikes things known. Therefore He cannot be deceived by us, because He is wise; nor avoided, because He is strong. Now as wise He beholds all things invisible, then as strong He punishes without any obstacle those whom He reprobates. Who also here ordains this with strong wisdom, that the human mind when it elevates itself against the Author, it may confound itself by its own elation. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER V.

IBID.---Who hath resisted Him, and hath had peace?

5. He who resists God, falls from peace. What it is to resist God.---For He who creates all things wonderfully, Himself ordains that created things should agree with Himself. In that therefore in which the Creator is resisted, the agreement of peace is dissipated, because things cannot be ordained, which lose the disposition of the heavenly governance. For those things which, subjected to God, would persist in tranquillity, being left to themselves confound themselves, because they do not find peace in themselves, whom they contradict in the Author when He comes from above. Thus that highest angelic spirit, who subjected to God could have stood at the summit, suffers himself being repulsed, because he wanders without through the restlessness of his nature. Thus the first parent of the human race, because he resisted the precept of the Author, immediately felt the insult of the flesh; and because he would not be under the Founder through obedience, prostrated under himself, he also immediately lost the peace of the body. Well therefore is it said: Who hath resisted Him, and hath had peace? because the perverse mind, whence it elevates itself against the Author, thence it confounds itself in itself. But we are said to resist God, when we endeavor to fight against His dispositions. For neither does our infirmity meet His unchangeable sentence, but yet it attempts what it is not able to fulfill. For often human infirmity secretly acknowledges the force of the disposition, and yet desires this if it may be able to change it. It busies itself to go against it, but it breaks itself with the very sword of contradiction. It resists the internal order, but being conquered by its own endeavors it is bound. Therefore he who resists cannot have peace, because while confusion follows pride, what is foolishly done through fault, this is wonderfully ordained for the punishment of the agent. But the holy man, full of the virtue of the prophetic spirit, when he beholds generally the confusion of human pride, immediately tends the eyes of his mind to the special evil of the Israelitish people, and shows from the destruction of one nation what punishment awaits all the elated. For he immediately subjoins, saying:

CHAPTER VI.

VERSE 5.---Who removed mountains, and they knew not: whom He overthrew in His wrath.

6. The preaching of the word of God is foretold to be transferred from the Jews to the Gentiles.---In sacred Scripture the height of preachers is often signed by the name of mountains, of whom it is said by the Psalmist: Let the mountains receive peace for thy people (Psal. LXXI, 3). For the elect preachers of the eternal country are not undeservedly called mountains, because through the loftiness of their life they desert the lowest parts of the earth, and become near to heaven. But Truth removed the mountains, when He withdrew the holy preachers from the obduracy of Judea. Whence also it is rightly said by the Psalmist: The mountains shall be transferred into the heart of the sea (Psal. XLV, 3). For the mountains were transferred into the heart of the sea when the preaching Apostles, being repulsed from the perfidy of Judea, came to the understanding of the Gentiles. Whence they also say in their Acts: It behoved us first to speak to you the word of God; but because you reject it, and have judged yourselves unworthy of eternal life, behold we turn to the Gentiles (Acts XIII, 46). But this same removal of the mountains those very ones knew not, who were overthrown in the wrath of the Lord, because when the Hebrews drove the Apostles from their borders, they thought they had made a gain, that they lost the light of preaching. For their merits requiring it, being struck by just animadversion, they were blinded by so great an error of understanding, that what light they lost, they thought this to be joy. But the Apostles being repulsed, Judea is immediately destroyed by the Roman prince Titus, and being scattered among all nations is dissipated. Whence also to the mountains being removed it is rightly subjoined:

[Vet. III].

VERS. 6.---Who shakes the earth out of its place, and the pillars thereof shall be shaken.

291 7. The dispersion of the Jews is foretold.---For the earth was shaken out of its place when the Israelite people, plucked from the borders of Judea, indeed subjected their necks to the nations, because they refused to be subjected to their Author. Which earth, to be sure, had pillars, because upon the priests and princes, the teachers of the law and the Pharisees, the structure of its falling stubbornness arose. For in them the building of the letter held firm, and in the time of its tranquility, it bore the burdens of carnal sacrifices as if of a superimposed fabric. But when the mountains were moved, the pillars were shaken, because the Apostles having been withdrawn from Judea, they themselves were not permitted to live in it, who expelled the preachers of life from it. For it was fitting that, being subdued, they should lose their earthly country, for the love of which they did not at all fear to attack the soldiers of the heavenly country. But when the holy teachers were expelled, Judea became utterly torpid, and by the just examination of the One judging, closed the eyes of its mind in the darkness of its error. Whence also it is further subjoined:

[Rec. III].

VERS. 7.---Who commands the sun, and it rises not; and shuts up the stars as under a seal.

8. Preachers being expelled, the light of Judea failed.---For sometimes in sacred eloquence by the name of the sun, the brightness of preachers is designated; as it is said through John: The sun became as sackcloth of hair (Apoc. 6:12). For in the last time the sun is shown as a sackcloth of hair, because the shining life of those preaching is shown before the eyes of the reprobate as rough and despised. Who are also figured by the brightness of stars, because while they preach right things to sinners, they illustrate the darkness of our night. Whence also, the preachers being withdrawn, it is said through the prophet: The stars of the rains were prohibited (Jerem. 3:3). But because the sun shines through the day, the stars irradiate the obscurity of the night; and mostly in sacred eloquence by the appellation of day the eternal country is signified, but by the name of night the present life: holy preachers become as the sun to our eyes when they open to us the contemplation of the true light, and like stars they shine in the darkness when through the active life they dispose earthly things to be profitable to our necessities. As if in the day they gleam as the sun when they raise the edge of our mind to contemplate the country of internal brightness; and like stars in the night they resplend, because even when they do earthly things they direct by the example of their rectitude the foot of our work about to strike. But because, the preachers being expelled, there was not one who should show either the brightness of contemplation or open the light of the active life to the Jewish people remaining in the night of their perfidy (for the truth, which being repulsed deserted it, the light of preaching being withdrawn, by the merit of its depravity blinded it), it is rightly said: Who commands the sun, and it rises not; and shuts up the stars as under a seal. For He willed not the sun to rise for it, from which He diverted the mind of those preaching. And He shut up the stars as if under a seal, who while He retained His preachers through silence within themselves, hid the heavenly light from the blind senses of the iniquitous.

[Vet. IV.] 9. Judea is to be recalled to the faith.---But it must be weighed that for this reason we shut up something under a seal, that we may bring this forth to the middle when the time is fit. And by the attestation of sacred eloquence we have learned that Judea, which is now deserted, 292 is gathered into the bosom of faith in the end. For hence it is said through Isaiah: If the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, the remains shall be saved (Isai. 10:22). Hence Paul says: Until the fullness of the Gentiles should enter, and so all Israel should be saved (Rom. 11:25). He therefore who now withdraws His preachers from the eyes of Judea, but afterwards shows them, shut up the stars as if under a seal, so that, the rays of the spiritual stars being hidden first, and afterwards gleaming, it may now by repulsion not see the night of its perfidy, and then being illuminated may detect it. Hence it is that those two eminent preachers were withdrawn, their death being delayed, so that they may be recalled to the use of preaching in the end. Of whom it is said through John: These are the two olive trees, and the two candlesticks standing in the sight of the Lord of the earth (Apoc. 11:4). One of whom the Truth in the Gospel promises through Himself, saying: Elias is to come, and shall restore all things (Matth. 17:11). As if therefore under a seal the stars were shut up, who both now are hidden that they may not appear, and afterwards that they may be able to be profitable they will appear. But yet the Israelite people, which will be gathered abundantly in the end, is cruelly hardened in the very beginnings of the holy Church. For it refused the preachers of truth, it despised the words of help. Which nevertheless is done by the wonderful dispensation of the Author, so that indeed the glory of those preaching, which being received in one people could lie hidden, being repulsed in all nations may be dilated. Whence also it is aptly soon subjoined:

[Rec. IV.]

VERS. 8.---Who alone stretches out the heavens.

10. God permitted the Gospel to be repelled by the Jews, that it might be diffused among all nations.---For what is designated by the name of the heavens but this same heavenly life of those preaching? Of whom it is said through the Psalmist: The heavens declare the glory of God (Psal. 18:1). They themselves therefore are called heavens, they themselves are mentioned as the sun; heavens, to be sure, because they protect by interceding; but the sun, because they show the force of light by preaching. The earth therefore being moved, the heavens were stretched out, because when Judea rumbled at the force of persecution, the Lord dilated the life of the Apostles into the cognition of all nations; and while that one through judgment is dispersed captive into the world, these everywhere through grace are stretched into honor. For narrow the heavens had been, when one people held so many excellent preachers. For who of the Gentiles would have known Peter, if he had remained in the preaching of the Israelite people alone? Who would recognize the virtues of Paul, unless Judea by persecuting him had transmitted him to our notice? Behold now those who were repelled with scourges and contumelies by the Israelite people are honored through the ends of the world. The Lord alone therefore stretched the heavens, who by the wonderful dispensation of a secret counsel made His preachers to be dilated from there into the hinges of the world, whence He permitted them to be oppressed in one nation. But neither this gentility itself, devoted to the present world, when the tongue of the Apostles corrected its faults, received the words of life willingly. For immediately it swelled into the elation of contradiction, and excited itself to the cruelty of persecution. But that which strives to go against the words of preaching, is more quickly tempered by the admiration of signs. Whence aptly also in the praise of the Author it is subjoined:

[Vet. et Rec. V].

IBID.---And walks upon the waves of the sea.

293 11. The persecutions of the Gentiles are to be broken by the virtue of miracles.---For what is signified by the name of the sea but the bitterness of this world raging in the slaughter of the good? Of which also it is said through the Psalmist: Gathering as in a wineskin the waters of the sea (Psal. 32:7). For the Lord gathers the waters of the sea as in a wineskin when, disposing all things with wonderful moderation, He bridles the threats of carnal men shut up in their own hearts. Upon the waves of the sea therefore the Lord walks, because when the storms of persecution raise themselves, they are broken by the astonishment of His miracles. For He who mitigates the swellings of human madness, as it were treads upon the waves raised in a heap. For when gentility saw its custom being destroyed by the preaching of a new conversation, when the rich of this world saw the deeds of the poor going against their elation, when the wise of the age weighed that the words of the unlearned were adverse to them, they immediately swelled into the tempest of persecution. But those who, moved by the adversity of words, leap into the storms of persecution, are tempered, as we said, by the admiration of signs. So many steps therefore the Lord placed in these waves, as miracles He showed to the proud persecutors. Whence well again it is said through the Psalmist: Wonderful are the elations of the sea, wonderful is the Lord on high (Psal. 92:4), because against the life of the elect the world wonderfully raised itself to the waves of persecution, but the Founder of the things above more wonderfully strewed these, the virtue of those preaching being raised; for He showed His ministers to be able more through miracles, than the earthly powers had swelled through wrath. Which well also the Lord through Jeremiah says, narrating exterior things, denouncing interior things: I have placed the sand as a boundary for the sea, an everlasting precept which shall not pass away; and they shall be moved, and they shall not be able, and its waves shall swell, and they shall not pass over it (Jerem. 5:22). For the Lord placed the sand as a boundary for the sea, because to break the glory of the world He chose the abject and the poor. Whose waves of the sea to be sure swell, when the powers of the age leap out to the commotion of persecution. But they are unable to pass the sand, because they are broken by the miracles and humility of the despised. But while the sea rages, while it is raised through the waves of its madness, because nevertheless it is trodden upon by the showing of internal virtue, the holy Church profits, and rises to the state of its order through the increments of times. Whence also it is aptly soon subjoined:

CHAPTER XI

[Vet. et Rec. VI].

VERS. 9.---Who makes Arcturus, and the Orions, and the Hyades, and the inner parts of the South.

12. Why Scripture uses the words of the wise of the world.---The word of truth by no means follows the vain fables of Hesiod, Aratus, and Callimachus, so as to suspect, naming Arcturus, the extreme tail of the seven stars of the Bear, and as if Orion, an insane lover, held a sword. For these names of the stars were invented by the cultivators of carnal wisdom; but sacred Scripture therefore uses the same vocables, that the things which it desires to insinuate may be expressed by the notice of the customary appellation. For if it said the stars which it wished through names unknown to us, the man, for whom this same Scripture was made, would doubtlessly not know what he heard. Thus therefore in the sacred eloquence the wise of God draw their speech from the wise of the age, just as in it for the utility of man God Himself, the Founder of men, takes upon Himself the voice of human passion, that he may say for example: It repents me that I have made man upon the earth (Gen. 6:6, 7); when certainly it is established that He who beholds all things before they come, by no means after

He has done something repents so as to change His mind. What wonder therefore if spiritual men use the words of the carnal, when the ineffable Spirit and Creator of all Himself, that He may draw the flesh to His understanding, forms in Himself the speech of the flesh? In sacred Scripture therefore while we hear the known names of the stars, we recognize concerning which stars the speech is moved. But when we weigh what stars are narrated, it remains that from their motions we rise to the secrets of spiritual intelligence. For neither according to the letter is anything wonderful said, that God made Arcturus, the Orions, and the Hyades, concerning which to be sure it is established that there is absolutely nothing in the world which He Himself did not make. But the holy man says the Lord made these: through which he understands to be signified properly those things which are spiritually managed.

13. Arcturus signifies the Church.---For what is expressed by the name of Arcturus, which, constituted in the axis of heaven, shines with the rays of seven stars, but the universal Church, which in the Apocalypse of John is figured by seven Churches and seven candlesticks (Apoc. 1:12, 20)? Which while it contains in itself the gifts of the sevenfold grace of the Spirit, irradiating with the clarity of the highest virtue, shines as if from the axis of truth. It must also be considered that Arcturus is always turned, and never merged, because the holy Church also tolerates the persecutions of the iniquitous without cessation, but nevertheless endures without defect until the end of the world. For often the reprobate, because they persecuted her even to internecion, believed themselves to have utterly extinguished her; but by so much more manifoldly she returned to the state of her progress, by how much she labored by dying in the hands of the persecutors. Arcturus therefore while it is turned is raised, because then the holy Church is more powerfully refreshed in the truth, when she is more ardently fatigued for the truth.

14. The Orions are martyrs.---Whence aptly also after Arcturus he immediately subjoins the Orions. For the Orions arise in the very weight of the winter time, and by their rising excite tempests, and perturb the seas and the lands. What therefore is designated by the Orions after Arcturus but the martyrs? Who, while the holy Church is raised to the state of preaching, about to suffer the weight of the persecutors and troubles, came to the face of heaven as if in winter. For these being born, the sea and the land was troubled, because while gentility grieved that its customs were destroyed, the fortitude of those appearing, it raised to their slaughter not only the wrathful and turbid, but even the placid. From the Orions therefore winter became rough, because, the constancy of the saints becoming clear, the cold mind of the infidels excited itself to the tempest of persecution. Heaven therefore produced the Orions, when the holy Church sent the martyrs. Who while they dared to speak right things to the rude, bore every weight from the adversity of the cold.

15. The Hyades are teachers.---After the Orions he also adds the Hyades. For the Hyades, clearing in the heaven in the spring time, excite rains. What therefore are expressed by the Hyades but the teachers of sacred Scripture? Who, produced to the face of heaven, that is, to the grace of preaching, then watered the world with the rains of words, when in them, the winter of persecution having passed, the grace of spring grew warm from the rising of the heavenly light. For the cold of the martyrs being over, the preachers of the world soon followed in them their turn, as if in spring time. Who then began to clear, when now gentility, by the propitious divinity, was open to the light of truth. But these are called Hyades, because they took their name from rain in a Greek vocable, from that which is hyen, which to be sure is said to rain. Rightly therefore are they called Hyades, who by their advent into the face of the world carry showers of doctrine. Who while they are stretched into the high, and are turned in the axis of heaven, relax our earth, dry with thirst, into the offspring of fruits, the shower of doctrine being infused. For if the shower of doctrine were lacking, by no means would the parched hearts in our lands grow green. Whence also it is said through Moses: Let my speech be expected as the rain (Deut. 32:2). Concerning these rains also it is said through the Psalmist: Thou, O God, hast set apart a voluntary rain for Thine inheritance (Psal. 68:9). By the Hyades therefore the teachers are expressed, because while the spring face of the world grew warm by their advent, from their preaching the earth of our minds profited to germinating.

16. The Hyades are seven.---These same Hyades are also said to be seven. Because to be sure the teachers of the holy Church, while they receive the plenitude of the sevenfold Spirit, are diffused through the universal world to preaching in the septenary number. But because the Hyades are placed in the forehead of the Bull, we must very much inquire into this order. For what is taken by the Bull but either our Redeemer Himself, or any preacher in His body? Because to be sure He deigned to be slain as a victim for us; and these, undergoing the labor of the contest with much labor, as it were in the manner of oxen, gather the fruits of virtues from the plowed minds. Whence it is said through the law: Thou shalt not bind the mouth of the ox treading (Deut. 25:4). And Paul says: Is God concerned about oxen? (1 Cor. 9:9.) What therefore is designated by the head of the Bull but our Author Himself? But what by the forehead but the presumption and confidence of our same Author? The Hyades therefore are placed in the forehead of the Bull, because the holy teachers clear in the presumption and confidence of our Author. For unless they were fortified by His grace, and strengthened themselves in the presumption of Him, by no means would they have been able then to resist the vain glory of the world, and to dilate the rain of their doctrine to us. They themselves also shine in His forehead, through whom the precept of His faith and rectitude is demonstrated to us. Whom while we hear speaking, we recognize in whose confidence they shine.

17. The inner parts of the South, who is the South?---But to all these he subjoins the inner parts of the South. For what is figured by the name of the South but the grace of the Holy Spirit? Who while He has touched the hearts of men with His heat, relaxes from them the torpor of cold. Whence it is said through the Psalmist: Turn our captivity, O Lord, as a torrent in the South (Psal. 126:4). For the South is a warm wind, and from its place dissolves the sluggish waters. So, so the advent of the Holy Spirit relaxes in us the cold of iniquity, and dissolves into the torrents of penitence the tears of strictness. Who again is called South through Solomon: Arise, O North wind, and come, O South wind, blow through my garden, and let its aromatics flow (Cant. 4:16). For the North wind is the malignant spirit, who constrains our hearts, and by no means permits them to flower to the fruits of a good work. But the North wind is ordered to recede from the garden of the Lord, and the South wind to come, that while the Spirit of heavenly grace has possessed the mind, through His love the aromatics of virtues may flow. Because therefore the Holy Spirit is called the South, what are designated by its inner parts but His secrets and occult judgments? Which as they cannot be seen by us, so in those things which are done without the virtue of the same Spirit is wonderfully ordained. After Arcturus therefore, after the Orions, after the Hyades, he subjoins the inner parts of the South; because after the state of the Church, after the contests of the martyrs, after the rains of the teachers, he shows the wonderful and occult judgments of the same Spirit, by which these very things are dispensed. For while many come to the faith, many are left in their perfidy; while some return to penitence from depraved acts, others persevere in their iniquities; while some are crowned with the palm of martyrdom, others, led to punishment, are turned by broken fragility to abnegation; while the Hyades pour out doctrine, some receive this into the increase of fruit, others, the heart being closed, are silent in their own sterility. What are these but the inner parts of the South, that is, the hidden judgments of the Holy Spirit? Which to be sure, by how much they are more occult, by so much more they are to be admired in His praises. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

VERS. 10.---Who makes great and incomprehensible things, and wonderful things, of which there is no number.

18. Every creature is nothing before its Creator.---That according to the letter God both made all these things before, and makes them daily, who doubts? But the holy man, as we said, wonders at the deeds of God, through which he understands another thing to be designated. For he wonders at the state of the Church, the contests of the martyrs, and the showers of the teachers, and what else does he stupify at in them but the Lord doing them? But because these things are great through themselves, but to Him who made them, compared, they are by no means great, it is rightly subjoined: Who makes great and incomprehensible things, and wonderful things, of which there is no number. For the things which are created, although incomprehensible to us, yet to Him who made them, are comprehensible. Whence also John says: What was made, in Him was life (John 1:3). For in itself a created thing is not life, but in its Author it is life, because in His disposition it lives eternally. Those things therefore which are incomprehensible to man, are comprehended in God; and those which in themselves are numerable, in Him are innumerable, because of His wisdom there is no number. For those things which are numerable, unless they were in themselves innumerable, would make a number for His wisdom. But because to Him all things are finished, but He is finished by none, those very things also which have an end in themselves, are without end in His incomprehensibility. Rightly therefore it is said: Who makes great and incomprehensible things, and wonderful things, of which there is no number. As if he should say openly: What wonder if we believe these things to be made by Him, whom nothing comprehended shuts in, nothing completed finishes? Who since He is Himself incomprehensible, also rules incomprehensibly those things which He made. Whence also Job returning to himself, and wondering in himself at the incomprehensibility of the Creator, adds:

VERS. 11.---If He comes to me, I shall not see Him; if He goes away, I shall not understand.

19. God, although He be seen, is not seen.---Blessed Job considers the power of God not only in the government of the world, but also in himself. For while he notices in what order he was founded, and in what order again he is ruled, he feels these very things by which he is ruled, but how he is ruled he does not see. For as we said, the spirit of the creature above is middle between God and the flesh; which in this that it is vivified by God, is below God; but in this that it vivifies the flesh, is above the flesh. He therefore who is above the flesh, well sees all things which are below him; but because he is below God, he is not able to comprehend that which is above him. For how should he who is himself comprehended, comprehend that by which he is comprehended? God therefore beholds all things which are, and can by no means be seen by those things which are. Of whom it is said through John: No man has seen God at any time (John 1:18). And again it is written: No man shall see my face, and live (Exod. 33:20); because to be sure in this life whoever sees God, dies to it, lest by seeing he should live. For unless he die utterly to the delectation of the present age, he is by no means raised to the vision of eternity. Whence also Job says: If He comes to me, I shall not see Him. For the Lord comes to us, when He illustrates our minds with the grace of His visitation. Which while it is done, because His virtue is soon felt in us, He is said to come. But because His essence itself is seen by no creature, it is rightly subjoined: I shall not see Him. For man feels His visitation, but does not see Himself. Who then raises the mind into itself, when he evacuates the forms of human thoughts, and through intention is stretched to that which is beyond man. But when that inaccessible brightness strikes back the intention of the mind, its own infirmity, struck back to that which it can understand, relapses as it were into itself. Since therefore the grace of His visitation is present, but who it is that comes is not seen, it is rightly said: If He comes to me, I shall not see Him.

20. How God comes, how He goes away.--- Because truly this same grace is sometimes withdrawn, that the mind remitted into itself may know what itself is, it is rightly subjoined: If He goes away, I shall not understand. For when He comes, His virtue is felt; but when He departs, it is ignored whence He comes, or whither He goes. Because to be sure we are by no means able to know the beginning and the end of His visitation. Whence also it is said to Nicodemus: The Spirit breathes where He will, and thou hearest His voice, but thou knowest not whence He comes, or whither He goes (John 3:8). For we hear the voice of the Spirit, when through His grace we are pricked by His aspiration. But whence He comes, or whither He goes we know not, because we neither see the beginnings of His visitation through prescience, nor hold the perseverance through comprehension. Rightly therefore it is said: If He goes away, I shall not understand. For the Lord is said to come to us then, as it were, when He pricks our minds with grateful visitation; but then to go away, when after the grace of His compunction He deserts our minds. Because to be sure if He always held our minds in this grace of His visitation, we would already see in this life the joys of the heavenly country. But this same grace is granted for an hour, and is immediately withdrawn, that it may snatch us to itself through desire, but lest it retain us to itself through satiety. To Himself therefore He makes us to come, but permits us by no means to be presented to Himself in this life.

VERS. 12.---If He questions suddenly, who will answer Him? or who can say: Why dost Thou so?

21. What the questioning of God is.---Often the questioning of God is the very striking of man. For the Lord questions when He strikes, because through the pain which He inflicts from without, He bends the mind within to the knowledge of itself. And when the stricken man recognizes his faults, which he has done, he answers the Lord as if questioning. But if He questions suddenly, who will answer Him? For striking if it is foreknown, is sustained more tolerably by the mind. But if it be sudden, it disturbs all the secrets of the heart. Because therefore God for the most part then questions, when He strikes; and then especially He strikes, when the prescient mind suspects nothing such, it is rightly said: If He questions suddenly, who will answer Him? As if he should say: If the Lord then especially strikes, when we fear nothing such, who prepares the voice of reason against His striking, which the unforeseen ferocity of the stricken mind disturbs?

22. In the judgments of God, one must not ask concerning the cause.---Whence also it is soon rightly subjoined: Or who can say: Why dost Thou so? Because to be sure in His occult judgments, even if the cause why anything is done is by no means open, yet it is not necessary that anyone should inquire of Him concerning the cause. For when he who is stricken does not know the law of God, he ought to be reflected to this alone, that he may know that He who strikes is not unjust. And Job reducing us to this, what we ought to feel concerning His omnipotence, adds:

VERS. 13.---God, whose wrath no man can resist, and under whom are curved they who bear the world.

23. What the wrath of God is.---The wrath of God is not a perturbation of mind, as in man, but it is the face of a just judge moved to the vengeance of sin. Which is drawn also from the very custom of men, so that on account of vengeance anyone is said to be wrathful. His wrath can therefore be felt, but it by no means avails to be resisted by him by whom it is felt. Whence also it is rightly subjoined: And under whom are curved they who bear the world. For they bear the world who preside over its mundane administration. But these also are curved under Him, because at whose beck all things are ruled, they also who rule, are without doubt humbled. Or certainly they bear the world, who carry the weight of mundane wisdom. These therefore are curved under Him, because compared to His omnipotence, what else are they but abject? Who are by so much more curved, by how much less they raise themselves to eternal stability through humility. Or certainly they bear the world who rule others in their own favor. But they are curved under Him, because those who are highest among men, are then especially damned by the Lord, when they are caught in His wrath. But blessed Job, when he considers His omnipotence, returning to himself, and comparing his fragility with His so great virtue, says:

VERS. 14.---How great then am I that I should answer Him, and speak with my words with Him?

24. Sinners dare not speak with God.---As if he should say: If they are curved under Him who bear the world, what shall I do, who against Him have not so great virtue? But it is to be known that he who works good things, is said to answer the Lord, when from His precepts he instructs his life. But he who does not suffice for good works, and yet raises against Him the voice of his defense, seems to speak with Him with words. But the holy man considering himself by no means to suffice for the divine precepts, confesses not only that he does not answer Him, but not even to be able to speak with Him with words. Because to be sure he who is yet in sin, since he does not answer the Lord with deeds, ought not even to burst forth into his own defense, so that he may by no means become tumid through words against Him, whom he is not able to placate through deeds. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

VERS. 15.---Who although I shall have anything just, I will not answer, but I will deprecate my judge.

25. Our justice is injustice before the divine.---In whose voice, but the humility of the whole human race is expressed? For all human justice is convinced to be injustice, if it be strictly judged. Therefore after justice it needs prayer, that what being discussed could succumb, may grow strong from the mercy of the judge alone. Whence also it is rightly said: Who although I shall have anything just, I will not answer, but I will deprecate my judge. As if he should say openly: Although I shall have germinated to right works, I will strive for life not through merit, but through pardon. For the good things which we do, are His; and from there we are debtors to Him, whence for our merits we hope for rewards. It is His therefore what we do, His the sacrifice by which He is placated. Just men therefore, while they see their justice, do not trust in their merits, but in the mercy of the Author alone. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

VERS. 16.---When I shall have invoked, and He shall have heard me, I do not believe that He has heard my voice.

26. Prayer is not believed from hearing.---As if he should say: If the Lord is then especially wrathful, when He strikes our sins, who may trust in His wrath? For when we convert ourselves to Him through penitence, and believe ourselves to be heard, yet in our very conversion we tremble. Because to be sure he who beholds himself to be yet in sins, ought not to trust in hearing alone, but ought to tremble at that which is yet remaining of sin in himself. Whence also it is rightly said: When I shall have invoked, and He shall have heard me, I do not believe that He has heard my voice. Because to be sure he who returns to the Lord through penitence, and beholds himself to be heard, ought not to rejoice in hearing alone, but ought to fear concerning the still remaining stain of sin. For neither ought he to believe himself to be heard, who knows himself to be yet in sins. But these things blessed Job speaks from humility, who confesses himself to be heard not from his merits, but from the mercy of the Lord alone. Who while he sees His omnipotence, is reflected to this alone, that he may know himself to be nothing. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

VERS. 17.---For in a whirlwind He will crush me, and will multiply my wounds, even without cause.

27. Why is Job said to have been struck without cause?---By the name of a whirlwind, what is expressed but the force of a sudden striking? Which while it invades us unexpected, draws the mind as if in a whirlwind to the knowledge of itself. But it is to be known that Job, while he says he is struck without cause, does not speak concerning the injustice of the Founder, but wonders concerning His occult judgments. For as we said above, he who knows himself to be yet in sins, ought not to trust in hearing alone. But blessed Job, who sees himself cleansed from his iniquities, ought not to presume from his justice alone. Because to be sure he who sees himself just, but yet beholds himself to be struck, then especially stupifies at the occult judgments of the Founder, when he sees no cause of striking in himself. Which well also is said through Eliu: For Job justified himself before God (Job 32:2). Because to be sure while he asserts his justice, he yet submits himself to His occult judgments. Whence also it is rightly said: For in a whirlwind He will crush me, and will multiply my wounds, even without cause. As if he should say openly: If the Lord then especially strikes, when we merit nothing such, who may not tremble in His occult judgments, who even without cause does not fear to wound us? But this striking without cause is referred not to the injustice of the Judge, but to His secret dispensation. Who while He strikes His elect without cause, is reflected to this alone, that through their patience He may instruct others, and through their wounds heal others. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

VERS. 18.---He suffers not my spirit to rest, and fills me with bitterness.

28. What the bitterness of the mind is.---For it often happens that the mind, while it is snatched to contemplation, in its very snatching feels bitterness. Because to be sure while it raises itself into God, and yet still relapses into itself, in its very elevation it grieves, because it by no means yet holds that which it desires. And because in this life it is by no means permitted to arrive at His vision, remitted to itself, it follows bitterness.

Whence also it is rightly said: And fills me with bitterness. Because to be sure he who is stretched to the eternal country through desire, wandering in this world, suffers bitterness. Who as we said above, by so much more grieves, by how much more he is snatched to the vision of eternity through desire. Because to be sure while he sees that which he desires, and yet still feels that which he is, in his very snatching he is tortured. But this bitterness is not of sin, but of desire. Which to be sure especially fills the minds of the elect, when He snatches them to Himself through love. Whence also Job reducing us to this, what we ought to feel concerning His omnipotence, adds:

VERS. 19.---If strength is sought, He is the strongest; if equity of judgment, no man dares to say testimony for me.

29. What the strength of God is.---As if he should say: If strength is opposed against Him, He is the strongest; if equity of judgment, who prepares the voice of reason against His judgment? Because to be sure no man avails to resist His omnipotence, and no man can compare himself to His equity. His strength therefore is His very fortitude, by which He rules all things; but the equity of judgment is His very justice, by which He disposes all things. Because therefore no man resists His fortitude, and no man equals himself to His justice, it is rightly said: If strength is sought, He is the strongest; if equity of judgment, no man dares to say testimony for me. As if he should say openly: Who prepares his strength against His fortitude, or who against His justice dares to say testimony for me, when he himself who seems to speak for me, compared to His equity, is convinced to be unjust? But these things the holy man speaks concerning His incomprehensibility, who confesses himself to be saved not from his merits, but from the mercy of the Founder alone. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

VERS. 20.---If I shall wish to justify myself, my own mouth will condemn me; if I shall show myself innocent, it will argue me depraved.

30. Human justice before God is injustice.--- In whose voice, but the humility of the whole human race is expressed? For all human justice is convinced to be injustice, if it be strictly judged. For if we open our mouth to our justification, our own mouth itself condemns us, because in our very speaking, what else do we show but our pride? But if we show ourselves to be innocent, our own innocence itself argues us depraved, because while we believe ourselves to be innocent, we deviate from the very rectitude of humility. Whence also it is rightly said: If I shall wish to justify myself, my own mouth will condemn me; if I shall show myself innocent, it will argue me depraved. As if he should say openly: Although I shall have germinated to right works, I will strive for life not through merit, but through pardon. For even if I shall have said myself to be innocent, in my very elation I am argued depraved. Blessed Job therefore, while he sees His equity, reflects himself to this alone, that he may know himself to be nothing. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

24. The virtue of prayer for enemies.---In which matter it can usefully be asked why, leaving aside so many older fathers, only Moses and Samuel are named more excellently and elegantly for pouring forth prayer?

Which, however, we easily recognize, if we weigh the merits of that charity which is commanded to love even enemies. [Old XIII.] For that prayer is especially commended to the ears of the Creator, which strives to intercede for enemies also. Whence also Truth says through itself: Pray for those who persecute and calumniate you (Matth. 5:44). And again: When you shall stand to pray, forgive if you have anything against another (Mark 11:25). But when we revolve the deeds of the prior fathers as sacred eloquence describes them, we find that Moses and Samuel prayed for their adversaries. For one of them fled the persecution of a raging people, and yet intervened for the life of his persecutor; the other, cast down from the leadership of the people, says to those very adversaries of his: Far be it from me this sin in the Lord, that I should cease to pray for you (1 Sam. 12:23). What is it then to bring down Moses and Samuel in the difficulty of praying, unless to indicate more clearly that not even they, if they stood, would withstand His wrath, who for that reason could more quickly intervene for friends, because they were accustomed to intercede with Him even for enemies? Hence it is said to that same Judea: I have struck you with the wound of an enemy, with a cruel chastisement (Jer. 30:14). And again: Why do you cry to me over your contrition? Your pain is incurable (Ibid., 15). Let the holy man therefore behold that by no man's intervention is the divine wrath restrained when it is implacably excited, and let him say: God, whose wrath no man can resist. Which we well lead also to a special understanding, if we weigh the losses of the same Israelite people, whom the Redeemer, shown through the mystery of His dispensation, deserted in their pride, and called the Gentiles to the grace of His knowledge. Whence also it is aptly subjoined: Under whom are curved they who bear the world.

[Rec. X.] 25. They bear the world who rule.--- For they themselves bear the world who tolerate the cares of the present age. For indeed each one is compelled to sustain as many weights as he rules over in this world. Whence also the prince of the earth is not incongruously called basileus in the Greek eloquence. For laos is interpreted as people. Basileus therefore is called basis laou, because in the Latin language it is said to be the basis of the people, because to be sure he himself sustains the people upon himself, who rules, fixed by the weight of that power of movement. For in that he tolerates the burdens of his subjects, in that the basis bears, as it were, a column placed upon it. Let blessed Job therefore, full of the virtue of the prophetic spirit, behold that Judea is deserted, and the princes of the Gentiles are inclined to the worship of the Divinity, and let him say: God, whose wrath no man can resist, under whom are curved they who bear the world. As if he should openly confess saying: And you desert those formerly subject to strictness, and you mercifully bend the upright powers of the Gentiles.

[Old XIV.] 26. Such angels sent into ministry.---Although by that which is said, "under whom are curved they who bear the world," angelic virtues also can be understood. For they themselves bear the world, who administer the cares of ruling the world, as Paul witnesses, who says: "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent into ministry for the sake of those who receive the inheritance of salvation?" (Heb. 1:14). He says therefore: "God, whose wrath no man can resist, under whom are curved they who bear the world." As if he should behold the humility of every creature, and being struck with trembling should say: "Who of weak men withstands your nods, to whose fortitude even the angelic virtues incline?" Or certainly, because when we are curved, we do not discern higher things: those most subtle spirits would be upright, if they fully reached the power of His majesty. But they who bear the world are curved under God, because although they see the highness of His divinity raised up, yet the angelic virtues do not comprehend it. Which the just man, not penetrating it because of his infirmity, but weighing it however from the subject ministries of the highest spirits, recollects himself to his own consideration with solicitous humility, and becomes vile to himself in his own presence before the power of the heavenly magnitude, saying:

CHAPTER XVII.

VERSE 14.---How great then am I, that I should answer Him, and speak with my words with Him?

27. They cannot dispute concerning the judgments of God, who are pressed by the weight of corruption.---As if he should openly say: If that creature does not suffice to consider Him, which is not pressed by the flesh, with what mind do I dispute concerning His judgments, who am narrowed by the weight of corruption? For as the words of God are often to us His judgments, which speak the sentence of our acts, so our words to God are the works which we show. But man is not able to speak with God with his words, because before His subtle judgment he holds no confidence concerning his own acts. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

[Rec. XI].

VERSE 15.---Who although I shall have anything just, I will not answer, but I will deprecate my judge.

28. Our justice needs the deprecation of pardon.---For as we have often said, all human justice is convinced to be injustice, if it be strictly judged. Therefore after justice it needs prayer, that what being discussed could succumb, may grow strong from the mercy of the judge alone. Which when it is fully possessed by the more perfect, it is said that "anything" of it is possessed, because the human mind scarcely performs even what is understood, and those things which it understands are very much at the extreme. Let him say therefore: "Who although I shall have anything just, I will not answer, but I will deprecate my judge." As if he should more openly confess, saying: "Even if I shall have grown to the work of virtue, I grow strong for life not by merits, but from pardon." Therefore prayer is to be leaned upon when we do right things, so that everything which we live justly, we may season from humility. [Old XV.] But for the most part our very deprecation is shaken by so many temptations, that it seems almost repulsed from the sight of the judge. And often the merciful Creator perceives this; but because it is not able to exert itself unblemished as it wishes, it dreads the judgment of reprobation upon itself. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XIX.

VERSE 16.---And when He shall have heard me invoking, I do not believe that He has heard my voice.

29. Alternating motions of the mind during prayer.---For for the most part the mind is kindled by the fire of divine love, and is raised up to the beholding of celestial and secret things; it is now snatched to the highest things, and, being pierced by a perfect desire, is alienated from the lowest; but being struck by a sudden temptation, that which had been upright in God with a strong intention, being transfixed by rising thoughts, is curved; so that it is not able to discern itself, and being caught between vices and virtues, it does not recognize on which part it is more powerful. For it is often led even to this, that it wonders how it comprehends such high things, which an illicit thought pollutes; and again how it receives illicit thoughts, while the fervor of the spirit is strong upon it. Which alternating motions of thoughts in the mind the Psalmist well beholding, says: "They ascend even to the heavens, and they descend even to the abysses" (Ps. 107:26). For we ascend even to the heavens when we penetrate the highest things; but we descend even to the abysses when we are suddenly cast down from the summit of contemplation through shameful temptations. The motions of the mind therefore, while they alternate between vows and vices, to be sure cloud for themselves the certainty of hearing. Rightly therefore it is said: "And when He shall have heard me invoking, I do not believe that He has heard my voice," because the mind from its very mutability becomes fearful; and through that which it suffers unwillingly, it suspects itself repulsed and abject.

30. The severity of the last judgment. Especially upon those whom the patience of God has long tolerated.---It is pleasant to behold with what subtlety the holy man judges himself, lest the divine judgments should find anything to reprehend in him. For beholding his own infirmity, he says: "How great then am I who should answer Him, and speak with my words with Him?" [Rec. XII.] Not trusting in the merits of his own justice, but betaking himself to the sole hope of petition, he subjoins: "Who even if I shall have anything just, I will not answer, but I will deprecate my judge." But fearful concerning the petition itself also, he adds: "And when He shall have heard me invoking, I do not believe that He has heard my voice." Why does he tremble with so much circumspection, why does he fear with so much solicitude, unless because he considers the terror of the judge in the extreme strictness, and, not bearing the force of that discussion, he weighs that all that he does is insufficient for himself? Whence also he immediately subjoins:

[Old XVI].

VERSE 17.---For in a whirlwind He will crush me.

31. Every sinner is bruised in a whirlwind, who seemed upright in tranquility, because him whom the heavenly long-suffering tolerates for a long time, the extreme severity of judgment kills; which is rightly called a whirlwind, because it is revealed in the commotion of the elements, as the Psalmist witnesses, who says: "God our God will come manifest, and will not be silent. Fire will burn in His sight, and a strong tempest in His circuit" (Ps. 50:3). Whence also another prophet says: "The Lord in the tempest and whirlwind is His way" (Nahum 1:3). In which whirlwind to be sure the just man is by no means crushed, because he always here solicitously fears lest he be crushed. For he weighs, still being set in the journey of the present life, how strict the exactor of works appears to human acts, who then damns some bound by the guilt of original sin even without works. Whence rightly the holy man from the voice of the human race immediately adds:

CHAPTER XXI.

IBID.---And He will multiply my wounds even without cause.

32. Little ones are damned from original guilt alone.---For some are withdrawn from the present light before they arrive at producing good or evil merits of active life. Whom because the sacraments of salvation do not liberate from the guilt of origin, they both have done nothing of their own here, and they arrive there to torments. To whom one wound is to be born corruptibly, another to die carnally. But because after death also eternal death follows, by an occult and just judgment wounds are multiplied to them even without cause. For indeed they receive perpetual torments even who have sinned nothing from their own will. For hence it is written: "Man is not pure in His sight, nor an infant of one day upon the earth" (Job 15:14). Hence Truth says through itself: "Unless one shall be born again of water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (John 3:5). Hence Paul says:

"We were by nature children of wrath, as also the rest" (Eph. 2:3). He therefore who, adding nothing of his own, is destroyed from the sole guilt of origin, what is he in that extreme examination, as to the estimation of human sense, but wounded without cause? But yet under divine strictness it is just that a mortal offspring, like an unfruitful tree, should preserve in its branches the bitterness which it drew from the root. He says therefore: "For in a whirlwind He will crush me, and will multiply my wounds even without cause." As if, openly considering the losses of the human race, he should say: With what animadversion does the strict judge slay those whom the guilt of their own action damns, if He also strikes for eternity those whom the guilt of the will does not condemn?

33. Job fears the judgment of God. He was struck so that merit might be increased, not that vice might be wiped away.---Which words to be sure we recognize not to differ from blessed Job specially, if we investigate how truly they were brought forth. For subtly weighing himself, and judging himself in every action, he insinuates with how much solicitude he greatly fears the force of the heavenly strictness, subjoining: "For in a whirlwind He will crush me." As if he should openly say: For that reason I always fear Him even in tranquility, because through scourges I am not ignorant what kind He comes in a whirlwind. Which scourges to be sure both fearing he foresaw, and foreseeing he bore. Whence he subjoins: "And He will multiply my wounds even without cause." For as we have already often said, by no means was blessed Job struck so that in him the striking might wipe away vice, but so that it might increase merit. Therefore asserting himself wounded without cause, he speaks this of himself outwardly, which Truth witnesses of him in secret, saying: "You have moved me against him, that I might afflict him in vain" (Job 2:3). The holy man therefore does not say proudly what he says truly, nor through these words does he differ from rectitude, through which he does not discord from the judge. Who immediately expresses the continuation of those same wounds, when he subjoins:

[Old XVII].

VERSE 18.---He does not grant my spirit to rest, and He fills me with bitternesses.

34. Job is afflicted within and without.--- Often for the just it is an exercise of virtue alone to tolerate adversities outwardly. But so that the conflict of full probation may instruct their strengths, sometimes both torments lacerate them outwardly, and temptations chastise them inwardly. Whence the holy man asserts himself filled with bitternesses, because while he tolerates scourges outwardly, that is more heavy which he bears in his inmost parts from the temptation of the adversary. But among these things the considered equity and power of the striker mitigates the force of the pain. Whence he subjoins:

CHAPTER XXIII.

VERSE 19.---If strength is sought, He is most robust; if equity of judgment, no man dares to say testimony for me.

35. The equity of the judgment of God.---For He examines the causes of life, who does not explore these through the testimony of another, because He who is shown at some time to be the strict inflictor of punishment, Himself existed for a long time as the silent witness of the fault. For hence it is said through the prophet: "I am judge and witness" (Jer. 29:23). Hence again He says: "I have been silent, I have always been still, I have been patient, I will speak like a woman in labor" (Isa. 42:14). For a woman in labor with pain casts out what she has long carried with weight in hidden places. After a long silence, therefore, like a woman in labor, the Lord speaks, because what He now tolerates silent in Himself, in the vengeance of judgment He at some time manifests, as it were, with pain. But it is to be sought by us, whether that just man, if anyone presumed to say testimony for him, would it liberate him from guilt? And if another does not impart testimony to this man, does he himself at least grow strong to bring forth testimony for himself? It follows.

VERSE 20.---If I shall wish to justify myself, my own mouth will condemn me; if I shall show myself innocent, it will prove me depraved.

36. No man knows himself to be certainly innocent.---As if he should openly say: What should I speak of others, who myself am not able to bear testimony concerning me? But because you do not suffice to testify to your innocence, do you know this very thing, that you have innocence? He subjoins:

CHAPTER XXV

[Rec. XIII].

VERSE 21.---Even if I shall have been simple, my soul will be ignorant of this very thing.

37. The utility and inconvenience of our ignorance. [Old XVIII]. Vice often performs what virtue began.---For the most part if we know the good things which we do, we are led to elation; if we do not know them, we by no means preserve them. For who does not pride himself, however little, on the consciousness of his own virtue? Or who again would preserve the good in himself which he is ignorant of; but against both what remains, but that we should be ignorant in knowing the right things which we do, so that we may estimate these both as right, and as minimal, in order that the knowledge of rectitude may sensitize the mind for guarding, and the estimation of minoration may not raise it into swelling? But there are some things which cannot easily be known by us, even when they are being done. For often we are kindled with a right zeal against the faults of delinquents; and when we are snatched by anger beyond the bounds of equity, we estimate this as the zeal of just strictness. Often we assume the office of preaching, so that through this we may serve fraternal utility; but unless we please him to whom we speak, that which we preach is by no means freely received. And when the mind usefully strives to please, it foully flows down to the love of its own praise; and that which was caring to rescue others from the captivity of vices, itself begins to serve being captured by its own favors. For the desire of human praise is like a little thief, who joins himself from the side to those walking on the right journey, so that, the sword being drawn from hidden places, the life of those walking may be slain. And when the intention of proposed utility is led down to private studies, in a horrendous way one and the same work vice performs, which virtue began. Often also from the very beginnings the thought seeks one thing, the action shows another.

[Old XIX.] 38. Otherwise the action is right, not the mind.---Often not even the thought itself exhibits itself faithful to itself, because it turns one thing before the eyes of the mind, and from intention hastens far to another. For for the most part some seek earthly rewards, and defend justice, and estimate themselves innocent, and exult to be defenders of rectitude. From whom if the hope of money is withdrawn, they immediately cease from the defense of justice; and yet they think themselves defenders of justice, and assert themselves right to themselves, who by no means seek rectitude, but money. Against whom it is well said through Moses: "Justly that which is just you shall follow" (Deut. 16:20). For he follows unjustly that which is just, who is excited to the defense of justice not by the emulation of virtue, but by the love of temporal reward. He follows unjustly that which is just, who does not at all fear to sell that very justice which he pretends. To follow justly what is just, therefore, is to seek that same justice in the assertion of justice. Often we do right things, and by no means expect rewards, by no means praises from men; but yet the mind, upright in its own confidence, contemns pleasing those from whom it seeks nothing, despises their judgments, and snatches itself evilly free through the precipices of elation; and from there it is more heavily overwhelmed under vice, whence, as if vices being conquered, it glories that it is subject to no desires.

39. There is a danger for us from either too much or no discussion of ourselves. Often while we discuss ourselves more than is right, we err more indiscreetly from the very study of discretion; and the sharpness of our mind, the more it strives to discern, is darkened, because he also who gazes importunately at the rays of the sun, grows dark; and from there he is compelled to see nothing, from whence he endeavors to see more. Because, therefore, we are entirely ignorant of ourselves when sluggish in our inquiry, or if we seek ourselves with subtle discussion, we are for the most part in a mist between vices and virtues, it is now rightly said: Although I should be simple, my soul shall be ignorant of this very thing. As if it were plainly said: With what temerity do I refute the judgments of the Creator against me, who am ignorant of my very self from the darkness of weakness? Whence it is well said by the prophet: The abyss gave its voice from the height of its phantasy (Hab. 3:10). For the abyss carries the height of phantasy when the human mind, darkened by immense thought, does not penetrate even itself by discussing. But to give a voice from this height is because while it cannot apprehend itself, it is compelled to rise up in admiration, so that it may not dare to scrutinize that which is above it, in that, thinking upon its own incomprehensibility, it is not able to find what it is. But the hearts of the just, because they cannot examine themselves to perfection, bear with difficulty this exile of blindness.

Whence it is also added,---IBID.:---And I shall be weary of my life. It wearies the just man to live, because even in working he does not cease to seek life, and yet he is not able to find the merit of that same life of his. For he draws the balance of examination from the bosom of inward equity; and from there he fails in himself toward the effect of discovery, from whence, snatched above himself, he grows to the force of inquiry. But there is a consolation for our darkness brought back to the mind in the just and incomprehensible power of the Creator, which neither leaves the wicked without vengeance, and transcends the justice of the upright by the immensity of incomprehensibility. Whence it is also aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXVI

[Rec. XIV].

VERSE 22.---It is one thing that I have spoken, He consumes both the innocent and the impious.

40. Human purity compared to the divine vanishes. The impious does not escape God's vengeance. Death invades all.---The innocent is consumed by the Creator, because however great his simplicity may have been, it is devoured by the simplicity of the divine magnitude. For although we may studiously preserve simplicity, yet from the consideration of inward purity it is shown that this very simplicity which we practice is not simplicity. The impious also is consumed by the Creator, because, God wonderfully ordaining all things, his impiety is bound by his very craftinesses. For from that place he entangles himself in punishments even unknowingly, from whence he exults that he does something knowingly. Because, therefore, almighty God both surpasses the innocence of the good by simplicity, and, penetrating the astuteness of the evil, condemns it, it is now rightly said: It is one thing that I have spoken, He consumes both the innocent and the impious. As if it were plainly said: I have brought forth this word of thought within myself, because neither shall I, being innocent, if I am strictly discussed, appear innocent; nor shall I, being impious, if I should wish to lie hid within myself, be concealed from the sharpness of the heavenly examination, since the strict Judge, comprehending all things, wonderfully penetrates the secrets of malice, and, well ordering this by His discoveries, condemns it. Or certainly He is said to consume both the innocent and the impious, because although they are divided in the life of the mind, yet by the merit of the first fault they are equally drawn to the destruction of the flesh. Whence it is also said by Solomon: The learned dies in like manner as the unlearned (Eccl. 2:16). And again: All things are subject to vanity, and all things go to one place; they were made of the earth, and to the earth they return together (Eccl. 3:19). It follows:

CHAPTER XXVII

[Rec. XV].

VERSE 23.---If he scourges, let him kill once, and let him not laugh at the punishments of the innocent.

41. Job desires a Mediator who might free us by His death.---Who would not believe these things were brought forth through pride, unless he heard the sentence of the Judge, who says: You have not spoken right before me, as my servant Job (Job 42:7)? It remains, therefore, that no one dare to reprehend the words of the author, which it is certain that the Judge praises. But they are to be scrutinized in their inward parts with more caution and subtlety, the more harshly they sound outwardly. For the holy man, considering the losses of the human race, weighing whence and whither they have come; that man, the adversary promising, desiring to know the knowledge of good and evil, lost even himself, so that he truly says: Although I should be simple, my soul shall be ignorant of this very thing; that after the punishment of expulsion he sustains also the scourges of corruption, and still tends to the destruction of the flesh, or certainly of the mind, even after torment, so that he rightly says: He consumes both the innocent and the impious; he seeks the grace of the Mediator against these things, saying: If he scourges, let him kill once. For we, because we have both receded in mind from God and return in flesh to dust, are bound by the punishment of a double death. But He came to us who would die in the flesh alone for us, who would join His single (death) to our double (death), and free us from both deaths. Of which it is said by Paul: 307 But in that he died to sin, he died once (Rom. 6:10). Let the holy man, therefore, look upon the losses of our corruption, and seek the one death of the Mediator which may destroy our two, and desiring this let him say: If he scourges, let him kill once.

42. He desires that his longing not be deferred.---But behold, as if he resists humility, that which is immediately subjoined: And let him not laugh at the punishments of the innocent. Yet we know this to be most humble without difficulty, if we weigh it with a humble mind. For it is clear to all that every desire is a punishment when it is deferred, Solomon also attesting, who says: Hope which is deferred afflicts the soul (Prov. 13:12). But to laugh, for God, is to be unwilling to have mercy on human affliction. Whence again by Solomon the Lord says to the reprobate remaining in fault: I also will laugh in your destruction (Prov. 1:26); that is, I will compassionate your affliction with no piety. Before the coming of the Redeemer, therefore, all the elect had their punishment, because, with burning desire, they longed to see the mystery of His incarnation, He Himself attesting, who says: Many, I say to you, just men and prophets have desired to see the things which you see, and have not seen them (Luke 10:24). The punishments of the innocent, therefore, are the desires of the just. As long, then, as the Lord, not compassionating, deferred the vows of His elect, what else did He do but laugh at the punishments of the innocent? Therefore let the holy man, considering the gifts of the future Redeemer, and bearing heavily the delay of his vows, say: If he scourges, let him kill once, and let him not laugh at the punishments of the innocent. As if he were openly praying, saying: Because our life is daily worn away by the scourge of vengeance for fault, let Him now come who may die for us once without fault, so that God may no longer laugh at the punishments of the innocent, if He Himself appears passible in the flesh, in whose desires our mind chastens itself.

[Vet. XXI.] 43. God laughs at the punishments of the innocent when He is delighted with their tears. Or certainly if he calls the laughter of God His joy, the Lord is said to laugh at the punishments of the innocent because the more ardently He is sought by us, the more sweetly He rejoices over us. For we make a kind of joy for Him out of punishment, when through holy desires we chasten ourselves for the love of Him. Hence the Psalmist says: Appoint a solemn day in thick crowds, even to the horn of the altar (Ps. 118:27). For he appoints a solemn day to the Lord in a thick crowd, whoever assidiously afflicts himself in desire for Him. Which day of solemnity is commanded to be extended even to the horn of the altar, because it is necessary that each one afflict himself for so long, until he reaches the height of the heavenly sacrifice, that is, to eternal joys.

The just man, therefore, because he desires his longing to be fulfilled, not deferred, humbly says: Let him not laugh at the punishments of the innocent. As if he were saying: Receiving our vows willingly, let Him not defer further, but let Him exhibit by showing Him who chastens us in expectation of Him. But because blessed Job specifically asked for Him to be killed once who endured the death of the flesh alone for us in the end of the world, he immediately opens (the matter), who also joins the very order of His passion, saying:

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VERSE 24.---The earth is given into the hands of the impious, he covers the face of its judges.

44. Christ's flesh delivered to the impious devil. Christ's slayers blinded by the devil. The wicked and the devil are one person, than which nothing is more impious.---For what is expressed by the name of earth but the flesh? Who is designated by the appellation of the impious but the devil? The hands of this impious one were those who raged in the death of our Redeemer. The earth, therefore, was given into the hands of the impious, because the ancient enemy was not able to corrupt the mind of the Redeemer by tempting Him himself (Matt. 4:10, 11), but he was permitted to extinguish His flesh through his satellites for three days (Matt. 27:45), and unknowingly served the dispensation of heavenly piety from this very permission. For striking our Redeemer with three temptations, he was not able to violate the heart of God. But when he excited the mind of Judas to the death of His flesh (Matt. 26:14), and when he delivered to him the cohort and ministers from the chief priests and Pharisees, that impious one certainly stretched his hands toward the earth. The judges of this earth were the priests and princes, Pilate and the mocking soldiers. This impious one, therefore, covered the face of its judges, because he veiled the hearts of the persecutors with the cloud of malice, lest they should know their Author. Whence it is said by Paul: Even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart (2 Cor. 3:15). Who says again: For if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory (1 Cor. 2:8). The face of the judges, therefore, stood covered, because the mind of those persecuting Him did not recognize Him as God even through miracles, whom it was able to hold in the flesh. But because the ancient enemy is one person with all the wicked, so for the most part Sacred Scripture speaks of the head of the wicked, that is, the devil, that it is suddenly derived to his body, that is, to his followers. [Vet. XXII.] By the name of the impious, therefore, the unfaithful and persecuting people can be designated, to whom also this which is subjoined entirely agrees:

CHAPTER XXIX.

IBID.---But if it is not he, who then is it?

45. As if it were plainly said: Who is ever to be thought impious, if that people, which persecuted piety itself, is not impious? But the holy man, having considered the perfidy of the Jewish people, recalls the eyes of his mind to himself; he grieves because he cannot see Him whom he loves; he is affected with sorrow, because he is withdrawn from the present world before the salvation of the world is revealed. Whence also he adds:

[Rec. XVI].

VERSE 25.---My days were swifter than a runner; they fled, and they saw not good.

46. The ancient just men grieve that they did not arrive at the times of Christ.---For it is the office of a runner to announce things to follow. All the elect, therefore, who were born before the advent of the Redeemer, because they announced Him either by living only, or also by speaking, were as it were certain runners in the world. But because they foresee that they are withdrawn before the waited-for time of redemption, they grieve that they pass away swifter than a runner; and they groan that their days are short, because they are by no means extended as far as seeing the light of the Redeemer. Whence it is aptly said: They fled, and they saw not good. All things that were created are good, as Moses attests, who says: God saw all things that He had made, and behold, they were very good (Gen. I, 31). But this good alone is principally good, through which all these things are good, which are not principally good. Of which good Truth says through the Gospel: None is good save God alone (Luke XVIII, 19). Because, therefore, the days of the ancient fathers were finished before God was shown in the flesh to the world, it is rightly said of those same days: They fled, and they saw not good. As if it were plainly said: They elapsed before the expected time, because they were unable to arrive at the presence of the Redeemer. Whence it is further added:

CHAPTER XXXI.

VERSE 26.---They passed through as ships carrying fruit.

47. We are satisfied by the sight and fruit of Him whom they smelled by expecting. They brought to us the hidden fruit of the Spirit.--- Those who cross the seas carrying fruit, they indeed enjoy the odor of the fruits, but they bring the foods of the same fruits to others. What, therefore, were the ancient fathers but ships carrying fruit? Who, prophesying the mystery of the divine incarnation, were themselves possessed of the odor of hope, but they brought to us the fruit of the perfection of the same hope. For what they smelled by expecting, this we are satisfied with by discerning and perceiving. Whence also the Redeemer says to those same disciples: Others have labored, and you have entered into their labors (John IV, 38). Whose days, namely, are compared to ships, because they run down; and rightly to those carrying fruit, because all the elect whom they bore before the presence of the Redeemer, they were able to refresh by expectation through the spirit of prophecy, but not to restore by manifest exhibition. Or certainly because ships, when they carry fruit, mix these with chaff, that they may bring them unharmed to land, rightly the days of the preceding fathers are described as similar to ships carrying fruit, because the words of the ancients, in that they announce the mysteries of spiritual life, preserve these through the straw of history interspersed, and bring to us the hidden fruit of the Spirit when they speak carnal things. For often while they narrate certain proper things, they are elevated to the secrets of Divinity. Who frequently also, when they behold the height of Divinity, are suddenly poured out to the mystery of His incarnation. [Vet. XXIII.] Whence it is still aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXII.

IBID.---As an eagle flying to its prey.

48. Like eagles they descend from the highest to the lowest, to be fed with the flesh of Christ.---

For it is the custom of the eagle to behold the rays of the sun with an unreverberated gaze; but when the need for refreshment urges, it inclines the same gaze of the eyes, which it had fixed on the rays of the sun, to the respect of a carcass; and although it flies to the heights, yet for the sake of taking flesh it seeks the earth. So namely, so were the ancient fathers, who, as far as the infirmity of humanity admitted, contemplated the light of the Creator with an erect mind; but foreknowing Him to be incarnated in the end of the world, they deflected their eyes as it were from the rays of the sun to the earth. And they come as it were from the highest to the lowest, while they acknowledge Him as God above all things and man within all things. Whom, while they behold Him about to suffer and die for the human race, by which death namely they knew themselves to be refreshed and reformed to life, as if in the manner of an eagle after the contemplated rays of the sun they seek food in a carcass. It is pleasing to look at the eagle intuiting the rays of the sun, which says: Mighty God, Father of the world to come, Prince of Peace (Isai. IX, 6). But let it come to the earth from the high flight of loftiness, let it inquire for the food of a carcass below. For a little after it adds, saying: The discipline of our peace was upon Him, and by His bruise we are healed (Isai. LIII, 5). And again: And He is a man, and who shall know Him (Jer. XVII, 10, sec. LXX)? The mind of the just man, therefore, lifted up to divinity, when it considers the grace of dispensation from His flesh, flies suddenly as it were from the highest, like an eagle to its prey. But behold, that Israelite people, long ago infused with the immense spirit of prophecy, lost the gifts of the same prophecy, and did not remain in that faith which it had announced by foreseeing; and by denying it repelled from itself the presence of the Redeemer, which it declared by foreannouncing to all following. Whence also aptly the discourse is immediately turned through compassion to their hardness also, and it is indicated how the grace of prophecy is withdrawn from them. For it is added:

CHAPTER XXXIII.

VERSE 27.---When I have said: I will by no means speak so, I change my face, and I am tormented with grief.

49. The perfidy and reprobation of the Jews.--- For the Jewish people was unwilling to speak as before, which denied Him whom it had foretold. But having changed its face, it is tormented with grief, because while it polluted the aspect of its internal man, by which it could have been acknowledged by its Creator, with the filthiness of perfidy, beginning from present evils, it condemned itself under eternal vengeance. For as if with a changed face, it is not acknowledged by the Author, which, having lost the faith of a good conscience, is reproved. But certainly it remains that the grief of punishments should torment her, whom her Creator, not acknowledging, knows not. Because, therefore, we have run through these things under the signification of our Redeemer, let us now repeat them by discussing morally.

MORAL SENSE.---50. CHAP. IX, VERSE 25.---My days were swifter than a runner; they fled, and they saw not good.---Of what goods man was spoiled by sinning, to what evils he was obnoxious.---As we have often said already, so the first man was so created, that his life could only be extended through the increases of times, not evolved. But because he fell spontaneously into fault, in that he touched the forbidden thing, he bore a down-course, which now man, oppressed by the desire of the present life, incessantly both tolerates and wishes for. For lest he should be finished, he desires to live, but through the increases of life he tends daily to the end. Nor does he perceive how very small the increments of times are, unless when suddenly those things are done which seemed long when coming. [Vet. XXIV.] Let the holy man, therefore, behold the state of his condition, and let him groan for the damages of the down-course from the voice of the human race, saying: My days were swifter than a runner; they fled, and they saw not good. As if he should say plainly: Man was created for this, that he might have been able to see the good, which is God; but he who was unwilling to stand at the light, lost his eyes by fleeing, because in that he began to run down to the lowest through fault, in that he bore blindness, lest he should see the internal light. Of which days it is still aptly subjoined: They passed through as ships carrying fruit. Ships when they carry fruit, namely, carry the fruits of the earth through the waves. But the earth of man was paradise, which was able to hold him unshaken, if he had been willing to stand through innocence. But because he fell to the waves of mutability through fault, he came to the seas of the present life after the earth. The fruits also of this earth were the word of the command, the granted possibility of work, the intelligence of the Creator implanted in nature. But these fruits which we refused to eat in the earth, we carry through the seas, because we were unwilling to keep unshaken in paradise the granted goods of so many gifts, and we now endeavor to preserve them in temptations. Tending to the limit, we are impelled by the breeze of the present life, we are fatigued by the wave of our mutability. But because we are restricted to the inborn goods of nature through the mystery of the cross, we carry fruit as if through wood. Which however can be understood also in another way. For ships when they carry fruit, they have the sweetness of odor, but they have not the gravity of weight. And the human race, expelled from the joys of paradise, lost the power of contemplation, lost the strength of created fortitude; and when it raises itself to repeat the supernal things, it smells indeed with the odor of memory, but it does not worthily exert the weight of life. It is filled therefore with the odors of fruits, and yet the ship of our mind is impelled lightly hither and thither, because we both remember the loftiness of paradise with the record of odor, and we tolerate the importunate waves of temptations from the flesh. Whence also it is aptly subjoined: As an eagle flying to its prey. [Vet. XXV.] For the eagle is suspended with a very high flight, and is poised to the ethers with a swift effort; but through the appetite of the belly it seeks the lands, and suddenly pours itself downwards from the heights. So so the human race fell to the lowest from the heights in the first parent, which namely the dignity of its condition had suspended in the loftiness of reason as if in the liberty of the air; but because, against the precept, it touched the forbidden food, it came to the lands through the concupiscence of the belly; and as if after flight it is fed with flesh, because it lost those free inspirations of contemplation, and below is delighted with corporeal pleasures. As therefore an eagle flying to its prey, our days pass swiftly, because in that we seek the lowest, in that we are prohibited from subsisting in life.

51. Hard questions about man's fall that must be restrained. The mind's blindness, though just, is still hard.---But when we revolve these things before the eyes of our mind with continuous thought, we are urged by hard silent questions: why did almighty God create him whom He foreknew would perish? why did He who is supremely powerful and supremely good by no means wish to make man such as could not perish? But when the silent mind asks these things, it fears lest by the very daring of the interrogation it should break out into pride, and it humbly compresses itself, and restrains its thoughts. But it is afflicted all the more heavily, because among the evils which it sustains it is also tortured concerning the hidden understanding of its own condition. Whence here also it is aptly subjoined: When I shall say, By no means will I speak so, I change my face, and am tortured with grief. For we say that we ought by no means to speak so when, passing beyond the measure of our infirmity out of inquiry, we reprehend ourselves with fear, and restrain ourselves by the consideration of heavenly reverence. In which restraint surely the face of our mind is changed, because that which before, not comprehending, daringly required the highest things, afterwards recognizing its own infirmity, begins to venerate what it is ignorant of. But in that very change there is grief, because it is greatly afflicted, since by the merit of the first fault it is blinded to understanding those things which are about itself. It considers that what it suffers is just; it fears lest in grief it should exceed through license of speech; it imposes silence on its mouth, but the excited grief is increased by that very thing by which it is restrained. Let him say therefore: When I shall say, By no means will I speak so, I change my face, and am tortured with grief, because then we are generally more heavily afflicted, when as it were through the study of consolation we endeavor to lighten for ourselves the evils of our affliction. But whoever, now that the damnation of the first parent has been subtly propagated, considers the losses of the human race, it remains that he should fear to add his own to these. Whence the holy man, after he brought in common things, suddenly subjoins special ones, saying:

CHAPTER XXXIV

[Rec. XVII].

VERSE 28.---I feared all my works, knowing that Thou wouldest not spare the offender.

52. Job teaches that even good works are to be feared.---What works blessed Job exercised, the text of this sacred history shows. For he studied to appease the Author by manifold burnt offerings, because according to the number of his sons, as it is written, rising up at dawn, he offered burnt offerings for each one; and he cleansed them not only from unclean acts, but also from perverse thought. Of whom, Scripture being witness, it is related: For he said: Lest perchance my sons should have sinned, and blessed God in their hearts (Job 1:5). He exercised therefore the affection of compassion, because he himself, being exacted by the questions of his friends, says of himself: I wept once over him who was afflicted (Job 30:25). He bestowed the ministry of piety, who says: I was an eye to the blind, and a foot to the lame (Job 29:15). He kept the purity of chastity in his heart, who opens himself by protesting, saying: If my heart has been deceived over a woman (Job 31:9). He held the summit of humility from his very marrow, who says: If I have despised to undergo judgment with my servant and my handmaid, when they disputed against me (Ibid., 13). He bestowed the benefits of largess, who says: If I have eaten my morsel alone, and the ward has not eaten of it (Ibid., 17). And again: If his sides have not blessed me, and he has been warmed from the fleeces of my sheep (Ibid., 20). He exhibited the grace of hospitality, who says: The stranger did not remain without, my door was open to the traveler (Ibid., 32). And among these, to the heap of virtues through the more excellent way of charity, he loved even his enemies, who says: If I have rejoiced at the ruin of him who hated me (Ibid., 29). And again: For I have not given my throat to sinning, that I should seek his soul by cursing (Ibid., 30). Why therefore did the holy man fear his own works, who always exhibited those from which God is wont to be appeased towards iniquities? What is it then that, doing wonderful works, he also fears these very ones with trembling, when he says: I feared all my works, except what we gather in the acts and words of the holy man, that if we truly desire to please God, after we subdue perverse things, we should fear even those things well done in us?

[Vet. XXVI.] 53. Sloth and fraud are to be feared in those.---For there are two things which in good works it is necessary should be studiously dreaded, namely, sloth and fraud. Whence also it is said by the prophet in the ancient translation: Cursed is everyone who does the work of God fraudulently and slothfully (Jer. 48:10). But it is to be known greatly, that sloth is born through torpor, fraud through private love. For a smaller love of God exaggerates the former, but a private love evilly possessing the mind creates the latter. For whoever, inordinately loving himself, through that which he has acted rightly, hastens to the transitory goods of remuneration, perpetrates fraud in the work of God. It is to be known also that fraud itself is committed in three ways, because through it, without doubt, either the silent grace of the human heart, or the breeze of favor, or any exterior thing whatever is desired. Against which it is rightly said of the just man by the prophet: Blessed is he who shakes his hands from every gift (Isa. 33:15). For because fraud is not only in the acceptance of money, a gift without doubt is not one. But there are three acceptances of gifts, to which one hastens from fraud. For a gift from the heart is grace caught by thought. A gift from the mouth is glory through favor. A gift from the hand is a reward through giving. But 313 every just man shakes his hands from every gift, because in that which he does rightly, he seeks neither to receive vain glory from the human heart, nor praise from the mouth, nor a giving from the hand. He alone, therefore, does not commit fraud in the work of God, who when he watches for the studies of good action, pants neither for the rewards of a corporeal thing, nor for the words of praise, nor for the grace of human judgment. Therefore our very goods, because they cannot escape the sword of waylaying fault, unless they be fortified daily by solicitous fear, it is now rightly said through the holy man: I feared all my works. As if it were said by humble confession: What things I have acted openly I see, but what I have endured latently in these I am ignorant of. [Vet. XXVII]. For often our goods perish by robbing fraud, because earthly concupiscence subjoins itself to our right acts. Often they fail by intervening sloth, because they waste away from the fervor in which they were begun, as love grows cold. Because therefore the subreption of fault is with difficulty conquered even in the very act of virtue, what remains for security, except that fear should be studiously always even in virtue?

54. No offense is unavenged.---But after these things something very scrupulous objects itself to the heart which he subjoins: Knowing that Thou wouldest not spare the offender. For if the offender is not spared, who is snatched from eternal death, since no one is found pure from offense? Or does He spare the penitent and not spare the offender? Because when we bewail our offenses, we are by no means any longer offenders. But what of the fact that Peter, when he denies, is looked upon, and by the look of the denied Redeemer is called to tears? What of the fact that Paul, when he endeavored to extinguish the name of the Redeemer on earth, merited to hear His words from heaven? But nevertheless the fault in both was punished, because both of Peter, the Gospel being witness, it is written: Peter remembered the word of Jesus, and having gone out, he wept bitterly (Luke 22:61). And of Paul this same Truth, which called him, says: I will show him how great things it behoves him to suffer for My name (Acts 9:16). Therefore the Lord by no means spares the offender, because

He does not leave the offense without vengeance. For either man himself being penitent punishes this in himself, or God, vindicating this with man, strikes it. By no means therefore is sin spared, because it is in no way released without vindication. Thus David merited to hear after confession: The Lord has transferred thy sin (2 Sam. 12:13). And yet, being afflicted and fleeing after many tortures, he paid the guilt of the fault which he had perpetrated. Thus we are absolved by the wave of salvation from the fault of our first parent; but nevertheless, washing away the guilt of the same fault, being absolved also we still die carnally. Well therefore is it said: Knowing that Thou wouldest not spare the offender, because He cuts off our offenses either through us, or through Himself, even when He releases them. For He studies to wipe away the stains of iniquities from His elect by temporal affliction, which He does not wish to see in them forever. But often the mind, while it trembles more than is just, while it is shaken by fear, while it is urged by sinister suspicions, it tires her to live, who doubts that she will arrive at life even through labors. Whence also it is subsequently subjoined: VERSE 29.---But if I be also thus impious, why have I labored in vain?

[Rec. XVIII].

314 55. The saints are so uncertain that they trust, they so trust that they are not sluggish.---

For if we are discussed with piety removed, our work is worthy of punishment, which we expect to be remunerated with rewards. Therefore the holy man, trembling under the hidden judgments, says: But if I be also thus impious, why have I labored in vain? not that it repents him to have labored, but that he is uncertain about rewards even among labors, and grieves. But it is to be known that holy men are so uncertain that they trust, and they so trust that nevertheless they are not sluggish from security. Because therefore generally the mind, even when expended in right acts, trembles, it remains that after a good work is acted, the tears of deprecation should be sought, so far as the humility of postulation may carry up the merit of the right work to eternal rewards. [Vet. XXVIII, Rec. XIX.] But nevertheless it is to be known that neither life nor tears are able to render us pure to perfection as long as the mortality of our corruption holds us. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVI.

VERSES 30, 31.---If I be washed as if with the waters of snow, and my hands shall shine as if most clean; yet Thou shalt dip me in filth, and my garments shall abominate me.

56. Tears cleanse, if they flow with humility. If not on account of earthly, but heavenly goods.--- For the waters of snow are the lamentations of humility. Which humility indeed, because it stands out before other virtues before the eyes of the strict Judge, shines as if by the color of great merit. For there are some who have lamentations, but have not humility, because being afflicted they bewail, but nevertheless in those very weepings they are proud either against the life of their neighbors, or are erected against the ordination of the Creator. These namely have waters, but have not the waters of snow, and they cannot be clean, because they are by no means washed by the weepings of humility. But he had washed himself from fault with the waters of snow who confidently said: A contrite and humbled heart God does not despise (Ps. 50:19). For those who are afflicted with lamentations, but are rebellious by murmuring, indeed bruise the mind, but despise to be humbled. Although the waters of snow can be understood otherwise also. For the water of a fount and a river arises from the earth, but the water of snow falls forth from the air. And there are very many who torture themselves through the lamentations of prayers, but nevertheless through all the labors of lamentations they sweat out for earthly desires alone; they are pricked in prayers, but they seek the joys of transitory felicity. Therefore the water of snow does not wash these, because their weeping comes from the lowest things. For they are as it were drenched from the water of the earth, who are pricked in prayers for earthly goods. But those who therefore weep, because they desire heavenly rewards, the water of snow washes them, because heavenly compunction infuses them. For when they seek the perennial fatherland through lamentations, and being kindled by desires of it they bewail, they receive from the highest things whence they may be cleansed. But by hands what else than works are designated? Whence it is said to some through the prophet: Your hands are full of blood (Isa. 1:15); that is, works with cruelty.

57. We do not attain perfect cleanness here.---It is to be noted indeed that the holy man does not say: My most clean hands have shone; but, as if my most clean hands, because as long as we are bound by the penalty of corruption, by whatever right works, we by no means apprehend true cleanness, but imitate it. Whence also it is aptly subjoined: Yet Thou shalt 315 dip me in filth. God is said to dip us in filth, to show us dipped in filth, because the more truly we rise to Him through good works, the more subtly we recognize the filths of our life, by which we discord from His cleanness. He says therefore: If I be washed as if with the waters of snow, and my hands shall shine as if most clean, yet Thou shalt dip me in filth. As if he were more plainly saying: Although I be infused with the lamentations of heavenly compunction, although I be exercised through the studies of right operation, yet in Thy cleanness I see that I am not clean. For the corruptible flesh still beats back the soul intent on God, and fouls the beauty of His love with obscene and illicit motions of thoughts.

[Vet. XXIX.] 58. The garment of the soul is the body.---Whence also it is added: And my garments shall abominate me. For what is expressed by the name of garment except this earthly body, with which the soul being clothed is covered, lest it should appear naked in the subtlety of its substance? For hence Solomon says: At all times let thy garments be white (Eccles. 9:8); that is, the members of the body clean from sordid acts. Hence Isaiah says: The garment mixed with blood shall be for burning (Isa. 9:5). For to mix the garment with blood is to stain the body with carnal desires. With which indeed the Psalmist had feared to be polluted, when he said: Deliver me from bloods, O God, Thou God of my salvation (Ps. 50:16). Hence by the voice of the angel it is said to John: Thou hast a few names in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments (Rev. 3:4). But after the manner of sacred eloquence our garments are related to abominate us, because they render us abominable; as also through Peter it is said of Judas: This man possessed a field from the reward of iniquity (Acts 1:18). For neither could Judas possess the field of the potter bought with the price of blood, who, the thirty pieces of silver being returned, immediately punished the crime of betrayal with a more criminal death in himself; but he possessed is said for he made to possess. So in this place: My garments shall abominate me is said for they shall make me abominable, because indeed while the members are proud against the mind, while they interrupt the studies of holy desire with the tumults of their temptations, the soul placed in its very conflict recognizes how much it is still despised by the Divinity, which fully desiring to pass over its correction, but not being able, is defiled by the dust of foul thought. He had felt this abomination of garments who said: I see another law in my members repugnant to the law of my mind, and leading me captive in the law of sin, which is in my members (Rom. 7:23). These garments also, in which he could not perfectly please, he desired to lay down quickly, to be resumed better at some time, saying: Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death (Rom. 7:24)? Let the just man say therefore: If I be washed as if with the waters of snow, and my hands shall shine as if most clean; yet Thou shalt dip me in filth, and my garments shall abominate me, because however much he shall have ascended to the highest things from the compunction of contemplation, however much he shall have girded himself in work through the exercise of labor, yet he still feels something unworthy from the body of death, and considers himself to be abominable in many things, which he carries from the weight of corruption.

[Vet. XXX, Rec. XX.] To whom this also becomes more heavy, that often he does not even understand this whence he offends. He receives scourges, but he does not recognize towards the strict Judge what 316 in himself may displease more, or what less. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

VERSE 32.---For neither will I answer to a man, who is like me, nor who can be heard with me in judgment on an equal footing.

59. How heavy it is for a just man to be ignorant whence he offends.---While we contend with anyone in judgment on an equal footing, we both recognize what is said against us, and in those things which we say we are heard, and by how much we patently apprehend the things objected, by so much we daringly answer to the things proposed. Because therefore the invisible Judge sees what we do, He as it were hears what we say; but because we by no means fully know that which displeases Him, we as it were are ignorant of what He Himself says. The holy man therefore, considering the abomination of his garments, fears all the more, because he is not able to be heard on an equal footing in judgment, because as long as he is pressed by the weight of his corruption, he tolerates this more heavily in his penalty, that he also is ignorant of the sense of his Reprehender. As if he were plainly saying: In this I am not heard on an equal footing, because both all things which I do are patent, and yet I myself do not know through how many things I am reprehended. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

VERSE 33.---There is none who may be able to rebuke both, and to lay his hand upon both.

60. What it is to rebuke God.---It sounds harsh that one should be sought who may rebuke God; but it will not be harsh if it recurs to the memory what He Himself says through another prophet. For through Isaiah He admonishes, saying: Cease to do perversely, learn to do well, seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge for the fatherless, defend the widow; and come, and rebuke me, saith the Lord (Isai. I, 16). For we oppose with the authority of reason him whom we rebuke. And what is it that the Lord, admonishing us to do holy things, adds: Come, and rebuke me, unless that He openly suggests how much confidence He bestows on good actions? As if He were plainly saying: Do right things, and meet the movements of my animadversion no longer through the groan of deprecation, but through the confidence of authority. Hence for indeed John says: If our heart does not reprehend us, we have confidence towards God (I John III, 21). Hence it is that Moses, because he pleases while serving, is heard while silent, when it is said to him while silent: Why criest thou to me (Exod. XIV, 15)? Hence it is that he restrains Him when angry, when he hears: Let me alone, that my fury may be kindled against this people (Exod. XXXII, 10). Hence it is that the Lord complains that He had not one who rebuked, when it is said through the prophet: I sought for a man who should set up a hedge, and stand in the gap against me, lest I should destroy it, and I found none (Ezek. XXII, 30). Hence it is that Isaiah heavily deplores, saying: We all have fallen as a leaf, and our iniquities like the wind have taken us away; there is none who calleth upon thy name, who riseth up and holdeth thee (Isai. LXIV, 6, 7).

61. Christ alone could liberate us from death. By suffering He corrected the fault of man, and appeased the wrath of God. ---But any of the upright are able through the merit of received innocence sometimes to meet the movements of present animadversion, but they are not able by their own virtue to expel from the human race the punishments of the death that is to follow. Let the holy man therefore consider the human race whither it has flowed down; let him behold the losses of eternal death; against which it is certainly evident that human justice by no means contradicts, let him see how perversely man has offended; let him see how strictly the Creator is angry against man, and let him seek a mediator of God and man, God and man. [Vet. XXXI, Rec. XXI.] Whom because he considers as to come long after, deploring let him say: There is none who may be able to rebuke both, and to lay his hand upon both. For the Redeemer of the human race, made a mediator of God and man through the flesh, because He alone appeared just among men, and yet reached the penalty of fault even without fault, both rebuked man lest he should offend, and withstood God lest He should strike, provided examples of innocence, and underwent the penalty of malice. By suffering therefore He rebuked both, who both corrected the fault of man, by breathing in justice, and tempered the wrath of the judge by dying; and He laid His hand on both, because He both provided examples for men which they might imitate, and showed to God in Himself works by which He might be appeased towards men. For none existed before Him, who should so intercede for the guilts of others, as not to have His own. Therefore one was not able to meet eternal death in others by so much as the guilt of his own bound him. There came therefore a new man to men, a contradictor to fault, a friend to penalty; He showed wonderful things, He bore cruel things. He therefore laid His hand on both, because whence He taught the guilty right things, thence He appeased the angry judge. Who also provided this more wonderfully than His very miracles, because He corrected the hearts of the delinquent by mildness rather than by terror. Whence also is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXIX

[Rec. XXII].

VERSE 34.---Let Him take away His rod from me, and let not His dread terrify me.

62. He corrected us by mildness rather than by terror. ---For through the law God had held a rod, when He said: If anyone shall do this or that, let him die the death. But being incarnate He took away the rod, because He showed the ways of life through mildness. Whence it is said to Him through the Psalmist: Aim, proceed prosperously, and reign, because of truth and mildness and justice (Psal. XLIV, 5). [Vet. XXXII.] For He willed not to be feared as God, but He inspired that He should be loved as a father. Which Paul clearly says: For you have not received the spirit of servitude again in fear, but you have received the spirit of adoption of sons, in which we cry, Abba Father (Rom. VIII, 15). Whence here also is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XL.

VERSE 35.---I will speak, and I will not fear Him.

63. Fear was not able to raise us from sin.---For the holy man, because he beholds the Redeemer of the human race coming mild, takes up not fear towards the Lord, but affection towards the father; and he despises fear, because through the grace of adoption he rises to love. Hence John says: Fear is not in charity, but perfect charity casteth out fear (I John IV, 18). Hence Zacharias says: That being delivered from the hand of our enemies we may serve Him without fear (Luke I, 74). Fear therefore was not able to raise us from the death of sin, but the breathed-in grace of mildness raised us to the state of life. Which is well signified by Elisha raising the son of the Sunamite (IV Kings IV, 30, 34), who when sending the boy with a staff, by no means restored life to the dead son; but coming by himself, and stretching himself upon the dead, and collecting himself to his members, walking hither and thither, and breathing seven times into the mouth of the dead, he immediately animated him to a revived light through the ministry of compassion. For God, the Author of the human race, grieved for as it were a dead boy, when He looked with pity upon us extinguished by the sting of iniquity. And because through Moses He brought forth the terror of the law, He as it were sent a rod through the boy. But the boy with the staff was not able to raise the dead, because, Paul attesting: The law brought nothing to perfection (Hebr. VII, 19). But He Himself coming by Himself, and humbly stretching Himself upon the corpse, collected Himself to equal the members of the dead to Himself: Because when He was in the form of God, He thought it not robbery to be equal to God; but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, made in the likeness of men, and found in fashion as a man (Philip. II, 6). He walks hither and thither, because He calls both Judea that is near, and the nations placed far off. He breathes seven times upon the dead, because through the opening of the divine gift He bestows the spirit of sevenfold grace upon those lying in the death of sin. And soon he is raised up living, because he, whom the rod of terror could not raise, through the spirit of love the boy returned to life. Let him say therefore from his own, let him say from the voice of the human race: Let Him take away His rod from me, and let not His dread terrify me; I will speak, and I will not fear Him. Where also is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLI.

IBID.---For I am not able to answer while fearing.

64. Fear does not render to God obedience worthy of Him for His gifts.---For we are said to answer to anyone when we repay his deeds with worthy works. To answer to God therefore is to render our obediences to His preceding gifts. Whence also certain psalms, in which holy operation is proposed to be imitated, are prenoted for answering. For God created man upright, and He has tolerated with long-suffering him flowing down to perverse things. Daily He beholds fault, and yet He does not sooner cut off the spaces of living; He bestows gifts by His benignity, and uses His patience towards the evil. Man ought to answer to so many benefits; but yet while fearing he is not able to answer, because he who still servilely dreads the Creator of the human race, beyond doubt does not love Him. For then only do we render true obediences to God, when we do not fear Him because of the confidence of love; when affection, not fear, directs us to good works; when evil no longer pleases our mind, even if it be allowed. For he who is restrained from the work of perversity out of fear, would freely do perverse things, if it were allowed. By no means therefore is he truly upright, who is not yet free from the desire of depravity. Well therefore is it said: For I am not able to answer while fearing, because we do not render true obediences to God, if we serve His commands out of fear, and not rather out of love. But when the love of His sweetness is kindled in our mind, all desire of the present life is lightened, delight is turned into weariness, and the mind tolerates with sorrow this life, which it formerly served, conquered by a reprobate love. Whence also is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLII

[Vet. XXXIII, Rec. XXIII].

BOOK X, VERSE 1.---My soul is weary of my life.

65. The love of God brings forth weariness of this life, and leads to the confession of errors. ---But when the present life begins to become vile, when the love of the Creator begins to grow sweet, the mind kindles itself against itself, that it ought to accuse itself of the faults, in which it formerly defended itself, being ignorant of heavenly things. Whence still rightly he adds:

CHAPTER XLIII.

IBID.---I will let loose my speech against myself.

66. He as it were uses his speech for himself, who endeavors to defend the evil things which he has done with excuses. But he lets loose his speech against himself, who begins to accuse in himself that in which he has erred. But often even when we offend we also judge those things which we do. The mind itself accuses what it perpetrates; but because it by no means deserts this from desire, it is ashamed to confess what it has done. But when already with its whole judgment it presses down the delight of the flesh, it raises itself with a daring voice to the confession of its own accusation. Whence rightly it is now said: I will let loose my speech against myself, because the strong mind begins to relax against itself words of detestation, which it formerly weakly retained out of shame within itself. But there are some who with open voices confess their faults, but yet know not how to groan in confession, and say things to be lamented while rejoicing. Whence still is aptly subjoined:

[Rec. XXIV].

IBID.---I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

67. Let confession be made in bitterness of soul.---He who speaks detesting his faults, it remains that it is necessary that he speak them in bitterness of soul, so that this very bitterness may punish whatever the tongue accuses through the judgment of the mind. For it is to be known that from the penalty of penitence, which the mind imposes on itself, it in some measure perceives security, and rises more confident to the interrogation of the heavenly Judge, so that it may find itself more subtly, and recognize how everything is disposed towards itself. Whence also immediately is added:

CHAPTER XLV.

VERSE 2.---I will say to God: Do not condemn me; indicate to me why thou judgest me so.

68. God judges us here and punishes in two ways.---Because he asserts himself a sinner in bitterness of soul, what else does he say to God than that he may not be condemned? because the bitterness of present penitence extinguishes the punishments of the following wrath. For in two ways in this life God judges man, because either through present evils He already begins to impose the following torments, or He extinguishes the following torments by present scourges. For unless the just Judge, the offenses requiring it, should strike some both now and afterwards, Jude would by no means have said: He destroyed the second time those who did not believe (Jude 5); and of the iniquitous the Psalmist would not say: Let them be covered with their confusion as with a double cloak (Psal. CVIII, 29). For we call a double cloak (diploide) a double garment. They therefore are clothed with confusion as with a double cloak who according to the merit of their guilt are struck with both temporal and perpetual animadversion. For only the penalty from punishment liberates those whom it changes. For those whom present evils do not correct, they lead through to following ones. But if by no means present penalty defended some from eternal punishment, Paul would by no means have said: When we are judged, we are rebuked by the Lord, that we may not be condemned with this world (I Cor. XI, 32). Hence by an angelic voice it is said to John: Those whom I love I rebuke and chastise (Apoc. III, 19). Hence also it is written: Whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth, he scourgeth every son whom he receiveth (Hebr. XII, 6):

[Vet. XXXIV.] 69. The mind of the just man trembles that it may be secure.---Therefore often the mind of the just man, that it may be more secure, trembles more deeply; and when it is girt with scourges, it is troubled by the uncertainty of the heavenly judgment. It dreads lest all that it suffers be the beginning of following damnation; and through thought it interrogates the judge, because it doubts concerning the merits of its life in the smiting. But when the virtue of life is brought back to the eyes of the mind, as it were a consolation is answered by the judge, because He by no means smites to destroy him whom He guards while smiting in the innocence of action. Well therefore is it now said: Indicate to me why thou judgest me so. As if it were openly said: Because by scourging Thou judgest me, show that which Thou renderest secure through scourges for judgment. Which however can be understood also otherwise. For very often the just man perceives scourges for testing, and discussing his life with most subtle inquisition, although he both feels and confesses himself a sinner, for what special fault however he is smitten, he by no means knows; and he trembles all the more in the smiting, as he is ignorant of the causes of his smiting. He petitions that the judge indicate himself to him, so that what he smites by noticing, this he himself also may chastise in himself by weeping. For he knows that the most equitable Avenger in no way afflicts any of us unjustly, and he is shaken by great fear, because he both grieves in the lash, and is not able to apprehend perfectly in himself what he may deplore. Whence still is subjoined:

CHAPTER XLVI

[Rec. XXV].

VERSE 3.---Doth it seem good to thee, if thou shouldst calumniate and oppress the poor man, the work of thy hands, and help the counsel of the impious?

70. The anxiety of the just man ignorant of why he is scourged.---This is certainly said through interrogation in such a way that it is denied. As if it were openly said: Thou who art supremely good, I know that Thou dost not judge it good, that Thou shouldst press the poor man through calumny. And I know therefore that it is not unjust what I suffer, and I grieve all the more as I am ignorant of the causes of justice. It is to be noted however that he does not say That thou shouldst oppress the innocent, but the poor man. For he who objects by no means innocence, but his poverty, to the strictness of the judge, no longer takes up daring from his life, but shows how weak he beholds himself. Where also he congruously subjoins: The work of thy hands. As if he should plainly say: Thou canst not impiously oppress him, whom Thou rememberest to have made gratuitously.

71. God does not permit us to be tempted above our strength.---But well is it subjoined: And help the counsel of the impious? For whom does he call impious in this place, unless the malignant spirits? Who since they are not able to return themselves to life, cruelly seek companions for death. Whose counsel certainly was that the divine rebuke should touch blessed Job, and that he who had existed just in tranquility, should at least through scourges sin. But the Lord did not help the counsel of the impious, because for their temptations He gave up the flesh of the just man, but denied his soul. This counsel the malignant spirits incessantly enter into against the good, that these whom they behold to serve God innocently in tranquility, being vexed by adversities may be snatched away to the whirlpool of fault. But the sharpness of their counsel is destroyed, because the pious Creator moderates the scourges with their strengths, lest the penalty should surpass virtue, and through the craftiness of the strong human infirmity should fail. Whence also it is well said through Paul: But God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able, but will make also with temptation a way out, that you may be able to bear it (I Cor. X, 13). For unless the merciful God should modify the temptations with their strengths, there is surely no one who should not bear the snares of the malignant spirits by falling, because if the judge does not provide a measure for temptations, by that very thing he immediately casts down him who is standing, by which he imposes burdens beyond strength. Thus however blessed Job by denying sought those things which he brought forth, as also by seeking he denies those things which he immediately subjoins, saying:

CHAPTER XLVII

[Rec. XXVI].

VERSES 4-7.---Hast thou carnal eyes, or as man seeth shalt thou also see? Are thy days as the days of man, or thy years as the times of men, that thou shouldst seek my iniquity, and search my sin? and shouldst know that I have done nothing impious.

72. The difference of human and divine sight, of our days and of eternity.---Carnal eyes recognize the deeds of times only in time, because they themselves also come forth for seeing with time, and are closed with time; and human sight follows any work, it does not precede it, because it scarcely beholds existing things, and in no way recognizes future things. [Vet. XXXV.] The days also and years of man differ from the days and years of eternity, because our life, which is begun in time, is finished in time; while it forms within the breadth of its bosom, eternity devours it. Whose immensity, because it is stretched above us on both sides, without beginning and end its eternal being is dilated; and to it neither past things pass by, nor as yet future things, as if they should not appear, are wanting, because He who has to be always, beholds all things present to Himself; and since in beholding He is not stretched after and before, He is varied by no mutation of look. Let him say therefore: Hast thou carnal eyes; or as man seeth, shalt thou also see? Are thy days as the days of man, and thy years as human times, that thou shouldst seek my iniquity, and search my sin? and shouldst know that I have done nothing impious. As if humbly inquiring, he should say: Why dost Thou examine me in time through scourges, whom Thou hast known perfectly with Thee even before times? Why dost Thou interrogate my faults with lashes, whom through the power of Thy eternity Thou art not ignorant of even before Thou shouldst create? Of which power certainly he soon expresses the weight, when he subjoins:

CHAPTER XLVIII.

IBID.---Since there is no one who can rescue from your hand.

73. The humble prayer of the scourged.---As if he should say openly: What remains for you, but to spare, whose power no one is able to oppose? For since there is no one who may restrain your animadversion by the merit of his own virtue, by so much the more easily may your piety require of itself that it spare. But because we, conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquities, either harmfully perpetrate wicked things, or even in doing right things incautiously fail, we have nothing by which the strict judge may become appeasable to us. But when we cannot exhibit our work as worthy to his sight, it remains that for his appeasement we offer to him his own work. Whence also it is subjoined:

[Rec. XXVII].

VERSE 8.---Your hands have fashioned me, and made me all together round about, and do you thus suddenly cast me down?

74. The Manichaean dogma is destroyed.---As if he should humbly say to Him: Because under a just examination what I have done is not worthy of your appeasement, weigh it mercifully, lest what You have made should perish. By which words also the perverse Manichaean dogma is destroyed, which, lying that there are two principles, endeavors to assert that the spirit was created by God, but the flesh by Satan. For the holy man, full of the grace of the prophetic spirit, considers things to come long after, and foreseeing the seeds of errors tramples on them, saying: Your hands have fashioned me, and made me all together round about. For he who asserts that he was both fashioned and made all together round about by God, leaves nothing to the nation of darkness either in his spirit or in his flesh. For he referred to himself as fashioned because of the internal image; but as made all together round about, in that which consists in the garment of the flesh, he made mention.

[Vet. XXXVI.] 75. The prerogative of man in the condition of things.---But it is to be noted that because he asserts that he was fashioned by the hands of God, he opposes the dignity of his condition to the mercy of the judge. For although all things were created through the Word coeternal with the Father, yet in that very relation of creation it is shown how much man is preferred to all animals, how much to things even celestial, but yet insensible. For He spoke all things and they were made (Psal. CXLVIII, 5). But when He decrees to make man, He premises this which is to be reverently weighed, saying: Let us make man in our image and likeness (Gen. I, 26). For it is not written of him as of other things, Let it be made, and it was made (Ibid., 3); nor did the earth bring forth man as the waters the flying things; but before he should be made, Let us make is said, so that clearly because a rational creature was being created, he might seem to be made as if with counsel. He is fashioned as if through study from the earth, and by the inspiration of the Creator is raised up in the virtue of the vital spirit, so that clearly he might exist not through the voice of command, but through the dignity of operation, who was being made in the image of the Creator. What therefore man through his condition received more elegantly than the rest of the creatures on earth, this, placed in the scourge, he opposes to the piety of his Maker, saying: Your hands have fashioned me, and made me all together round about, and do you thus suddenly cast me down? As if he should say openly: Why do you despise with such vileness him whom you created with such dignity? And him whom by reason you prefer to other things, why do you subject to pain? But yet this same dignity of ours shines through the image, and is far distant from the perfection of blessedness through the flesh, because while the spirit is mixed with the dust, it is in a certain way connected to infirmity. Which infirmity clearly blessed Job objects to the piety of the judge, when he subjoins:

[Rec. XXVIII].

VERSE 9.---Remember, I beseech you, that you have made me as the clay.

76. Why the angel sinned unpardonably, but not man.---The spirits of the angels sinned unpardonably for this reason, because they could stand so much more robustly, as the admixture of flesh did not hold them. But man for this reason merited pardon after his fault, because through the carnal body he received something by which he might be less than himself. Whence also in the sight of the judge this same infirmity of the flesh is an argument of piety; as is said by the Psalmist: But he is merciful, and will become propitious to their sins, and will not destroy them. And he multiplied so as to turn away his anger from them, and did not kindle all his wrath, and remembered that they are flesh (Psal. LXXVII, 38). Man therefore was made as clay, because he was taken from the slime for his condition. For it becomes clay, when water sprinkles itself upon the earth. As clay therefore man was created, because as it were water pours upon the dust, when the soul moistens the flesh. Which the holy man well objects to the piety of the judge, when praying he says: Remember, I beseech you, that you have made me as the clay. As if he should say openly: Consider the infirmity of the flesh, and release the guilt of iniquity. Where openly also the death of the same flesh is added, when it is immediately subjoined:

CHAPTER LI.

IBID.---And You will reduce me into dust.

77. The infirmity of the flesh excuses man.---As if he should openly pray, saying: Remember, I beseech You, that through the flesh I come from the earth, and through its destruction I tend toward the earth. Behold therefore the matter of my origin, and the penalty of my end, and spare the fault that passes away more quickly. [Vet. XXXVII, Rec. XXIX.] But because he brought forward the quality of man as created, now he subjoins the order of man as propagated, saying:

CHAPTER LII.

VERSES 10, 11.---Have you not drawn me out as milk, and curdled me like cheese? You have clothed me with skin and flesh, and have knit me together with bones and sinews.

78. A description of the origin of man.---For man, when fashioned, was made as clay, but when propagated, he is both drawn out as milk from seed, and curdled like cheese in the flesh. He is clothed with flesh and skin, and solidified with bones and sinews. Through clay, therefore, the quality of the first condition is expressed; through milk, however, the order of the following conception; because he is led through the increases of coagulation, that he may be strengthened by degrees into bones. But the description of the created body is a narrow praise of God, unless there be also subsequently expressed the wonderful aspiration of vivification. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER LIII.

VERSE 12.---You have granted me life and mercy.

79. The inspiration and preservation of life.---But in vain the Creator grants us good things, if He Himself does not keep everything He has granted. It follows,---IBID:---And Your visitation has kept my spirit. But these things which we have said about the exterior man, we like briefly to show by repeating how they can also agree with the interior man.

80. Man is clay, he becomes dust when grace is withdrawn. He suffers the wars of the flesh, but is strengthened by grace.---Remember, I beseech You, that You have made me as the clay. For our interior man exists as clay, because the grace of the Holy Spirit is infused into the earthly mind, so that it may be raised up to the understanding of its Creator. For human thought, which had dried up by the sterility of its sin, through the power of the Holy Spirit, like irrigated land, becomes green. But often while we use without interruption the virtues of the heavenly gift we have received, we are elevated to private confidence by the use of continuous prosperity. Whence it happens for the most part that the same Spirit who had lifted him up deserts him for a little while, in order to show the man himself to himself. Which the holy man immediately expresses, when he subjoins: And You will reduce me into dust. For because through the subtraction of the Spirit the mind is somewhat deserted in temptation, the earth is dried up as if from its former moisture, so that, being left behind, it may feel its own infirmity, and without the infusion of heavenly grace may know how much man has dried up. Who also is fitly said to be reduced to dust, because, being left to himself, he is carried away by the breeze of any temptation. But while, being left behind, we are shaken, we now think more subtly upon those gifts which we knew when inspired. Whence he subjoins: Have You not drawn me out as milk, and curdled me like cheese? For our mind, when through the grace of the Holy Spirit it is drawn away from the use of the old conversation, is drawn out as milk, because it is formed in a certain tenderness and subtlety of a new beginning; and it is curdled like cheese, because it is bound together in the thickening of a growing thought, so that it may no longer flow away through desires, but collecting itself in one love, it may rise to a solid reformation. [Vet. XXXVIII.] But for the most part against these same spiritual rudiments the flesh murmurs from old use, and the mind endures wars from the man whom it carries without. Whence he subjoins: You have clothed me with skin and flesh. For with skin and flesh the interior man is clothed, because in that he is raised up to heavenly things, he is hedged in by the siege of carnal motions. But the Creator in no way deserts in temptation him who tends to righteousness, He who through the infusion of grace prevents even the sinner; but he both looses the lifted-up mind to wars without, and strengthens it within. Whence still it is fitly subjoined: You have knit me together with bones and sinews. We are clothed with flesh and skin, but we are knit together with bones and sinews, because although we are shaken by temptation rushing in from without, yet within the hand of the Creator strengthens us, lest we be broken. By the motions of the flesh, therefore, He humbles us toward gifts, but through the bones of virtues He strengthens us against temptations. He says therefore: You have clothed me with flesh and skin, and have knit me together with bones and sinews. As if he should say openly: You desert me without for trial, but yet You keep me within by binding me with virtues, lest I perish. Who for this reason grants us the rectitude of living well, because He kindly spares the past things in which we have failed. Whence also still it is fitly subjoined: You have granted me life and mercy.

81. He receives and keeps life from the preventing and subsequent mercy of God.---Life indeed is granted when kindness is breathed into malignant minds. But life can in no way be received without mercy, because the Lord does not help to obtain the goods of justice, if He does not first mercifully release past iniquities. Or certainly He grants us life and mercy, because that mercy by which He prevents us for living well, He also keeps by that which is subsequent. For unless He should substitute mercy, the life which He provides cannot be kept. For by the very daily use of human life we grow old, and by the impulse of the exterior man through slippery thought we go out from interior things. And unless heavenly visitation should either vivify us by compuncting us to love, or restore us by scourging us to fear, by a sudden fall the mind is entirely destroyed from its foundation, which seemed to have been renewed by a long study of virtue. Whence he subjoins: And Your visitation has kept my spirit. For heavenly visitation keeps the human spirit, when it does not cease to either strike with a scourge or compunct with love this spirit enriched with virtues. For if He bestows gifts, but does not lift up this spirit by continually restoring it, the good is more quickly lost which is not kept by the Giver. But behold, the holy man, while he humbly acknowledges himself, discovers the secrets of divine mercy to be conferred generally; and when he truthfully confesses his infirmity, suddenly he is sublimely carried away to know the calling of the Gentiles. For he immediately adds:

CHAPTER LIV

[Rec. XXX].

VERSE 13.---Although you conceal these things in your heart, yet I know that you remember all things.

82. The calling of the Gentiles hidden in the counsel of God.---As if he should say openly: Why do I tremble for myself, I who know that You also collect all the Gentiles? Which however You conceal in Your heart, because You do not yet indicate this by open speech. But You who remember all things, undoubtedly make me certain of pardon. [Vet. XXXIX.] But it is to be known that in certain deeds we are both made certain of pardon, and after the commission of faults we are strengthened to the confidence of our absolution by subsequent correction and penitence; yet we are still touched by the memory of our perpetrated iniquities, and being turned away and unwilling, we are struck by unlawful thought. Whence also it is fitly subjoined:

CHAPTER LV

[Rec. XXXI].

VERSE 14.---If I have sinned, and You have spared me for an hour, why do You not suffer me to be clean from my iniquity?

83. How sins once deleted infect the memory and renew the war. What is then to be done.--- The Lord spares sin for an hour, when He washes away the guilt of the fault by the tears immediately granted. But He does not suffer us to be clean from our iniquity, because we indeed committed the fault willingly, but sometimes we endure its memory with delight unwillingly. For often that which has already been deleted from the sight of the judge by intervening weeping returns to the soul, and the conquered fault strives to creep in again toward delight, and is renewed in the ancient contest by a revived pulsation; so that what it did before in the body, this it afterwards revolves in the mind by importunate thought. Which that spiritual athlete knew how to cautiously behold, who said: My scars have become putrid and have deteriorated, from the face of my foolishness (Psal. XXXVII, 6). For what are scars but the healings of wounds? [Vet. XL.] He had therefore beheld released iniquities returning to the delight of memory, who was bewailing his scars. For scars to become putrid is for the already healed wounds of sins to creep again into temptation, and from their suggestions, after the skin of penitence has been drawn over, to feel again the stench and the pain of the fault. In which matter clearly nothing is done without by work, and it is sinned only within by thought; and the mind binds itself with strict guilt, unless it wipes this away by solicitous laments.

84. Whence it is well said by Moses: If there shall be among you a man who is polluted by a nocturnal dream, he shall go out without the camp; and he shall not return before he is washed with water at evening, and after the setting of the sun he shall return into the camp (Deut. XXIII, 10). For a nocturnal dream is an occult temptation, through which by a dark thought something base is conceived in the heart, which however is not fulfilled by the work of the body. But he who is polluted by a nocturnal dream is commanded to go out without the camp, because clearly it is worthy that he who is polluted by an unclean thought should judge himself unworthy of the societies of all the faithful, should place the merit of his fault before his eyes, and should despise himself from the estimation of the good. Therefore, for the polluted one to go out without the camp is for one laboring under a base impulse to despise himself from the comparison of the continent. He who is washed with water at evening, when beholding his defect he is converted to the laments of penitence, so that by tears he may wash away everything which the occult pollution accuses in his soul. But let him return to the camp after the setting of the sun, because, the heat of temptation cooling down, it is necessary that he again take up confidence toward the society of the good. For after the washing of water, the sun setting, he returns to the camp, who after the laments of penitence, the flame of unlawful thought growing cold, is restored to presume the merits of the faithful; so that he may no longer estimate himself to be far from the rest, who rejoices that he is clean through the death of the inward heat. But among these things it is to be known that for this reason we are sometimes afflicted by the impulse of unlawful thought, because in certain acts of earthly conversation, although lawful, we are willingly occupied. And when even in the least things an earthly action is touched through desire, the strength of the ancient enemy growing against us, our mind is polluted by no small importunity of temptation. Whence also the priest of the law is commanded to burn with fires the members of the victim cut into pieces, the head and those things which are about the liver, but first to wash with water the feet and the intestines of the victim (Levit. I, 7, 12). For we ourselves offer a sacrifice to God when we dedicate our life to divine worship. We who place the members of the victim cut into pieces upon the fire, when distinguishing the works of our life in virtues we offer them. We burn the head and those things which are contained near the liver, when in our sense, by which the whole body is ruled, and in occult desires we burn with the flame of divine love. And yet it is commanded that the feet and the intestines of the victim be washed. For by the feet the earth is touched, but in the intestines dung is carried, because for the most part we are already kindled toward eternity from desire, already with our whole sense of devotion we pant for the appetite of our mortification; but because we still do something earthly because of infirmity, we tolerate in the heart some unlawful things even which we have already subdued. And when an unclean temptation pollutes our thoughts, what else do the intestines of the victim carry but dung? But so that they ought to be burned, let them be washed, because certainly it is necessary that the weeping of fear should wash away the unclean thoughts, which heavenly love may kindle in the acceptance of the sacrifice. And whatever the mind suffers either from an unexperienced contest or from the memory of its former conversation, let it be washed, that it may burn so much more sweetly in the sight of its Beholder, as when it has begun to assist Him it places nothing earthly with itself, nothing slippery on the altar of its prayer. Let the holy man therefore behold the losses of the human mind, that for the most part it pollutes itself by unlawful thought; and after the judge releases the guilt of the work, let him, bewailing his own, open ours which we should bewail, saying: If I have sinned, and You have spared me for an hour, why do You not suffer me to be clean from my iniquity? As if he should say openly: If pardon has taken away the fault, why does it not also wipe it from the memory? [Vet. XLI, Rec. XXXII.] But often the mind is so shaken in the record of a fault, that it is urged toward the commission of it far more heavily than it had been captured before; and being caught it trembles, and being impelled by various motions it disturbs itself. It fears indeed lest it be overcome by temptations, but resisting it dreads this very thing that it is afflicted by the long labor of the contest. Whence also it is fitly subjoined:

CHAPTER LVI.

VERSE 15.---And if I be impious, woe is me; and if just, I shall not lift up my head, filled with affliction and misery.

85. The distinction between one resisting and one yielding to vices.---For the impious has woe, the just misery, because both eternal damnation follows the reprobate, and every elect person is expiated by the pains of transitory adversity. The impious raises his head, but being elated he is not able to escape the woe which follows. The just, afflicted by the labor of his contest, is not permitted to lift up his head, but being pressed down he is delivered from perpetual affliction. The former lifts himself up in pleasures, but is submerged by the following punishments. The latter depresses himself in pain, but yet hides himself from the weight of eternal animadversion. Let the holy man therefore consider that either a man resisting vices is affected by present labor, or succumbing he is delivered over to perpetual affliction, and let him say: And if I be impious, woe is me; and if just, I shall not lift up my head, filled with affliction and misery. As if he should openly deplore, saying: Either prostrate under the desires of the flesh, I am subjected to eternal punishment; or repugnant to unlawful motions, I am tortured by present penalty, because I am not free from the labor of the contest. But the heavenly dispensation for this reason permits us, serving it with our whole intention, to be shaken by the impulses of our flesh, lest our mind should dare to be lifted up into pride by the presumption of its own security, so that while being struck it trembles, it may fix the foot of hope more robustly in the aid of its Author alone. Whence also it is still fitly subjoined:

CHAPTER LVII

[Rec. XXXIII].

VERSE 16.---And on account of pride You shall catch me as a lioness.

86. By what art a lioness may be caught. In the same way we also have fallen and been restored.---For a lioness, when she seeks food for her cubs, rushes greedily into the pit of capture. For as it is reported from certain regions, a pit is made in her path, in which a beast is placed, so that the lioness may be provoked to cast herself thither by the appetite for it: which is prepared narrow and at the same time deep, so that she may be able to fall into it by going around, but may by no means escape it by leaping. Another pit also, which coexists with the former, is dug out, which however is joined to that in which the beast is, by the opening of the extreme part. In which indeed a cage is placed, so that the falling lioness, because she is urged from above by terrors, when she desires to hide herself as if in a more secret part of the pit, may enter the cage willingly; whose ferocity is now by no means feared, because she is lifted up closed in the cage. For she who of her own accord fell into the pit, returns to the upper parts surrounded by bars. Thus, thus indeed the human mind was captured, which, established in the liberty of choice, while it desired to nourish the desires of the flesh, sought food as if for a lioness's cubs, and fell into the pit of its own deception, which, at the persuasion of the enemy, stretched out its hand to the forbidden food. But in the pit it straightway found a cage, because coming spontaneously to death it soon endured the prison of its own corruption; and it is led back to the free airs, grace intervening. But when it endeavors to do many things, and is not able, it is bound by the obstacles of its own corruption as if by the bars of a cage. Already indeed it has escaped that pit of damnation into which it had fallen, because it has overcome the punishment of the following death, aided by the hand of redemption, by returning to pardon. But yet being straightened it tolerates the cage, because it is also girded by the bonds of heavenly discipline, lest it should wander through the desires of the flesh. She, therefore, who of her own accord fell into the pit, returns closed to the free airs, because both through the liberty of choice it fell into fault, and yet the grace of the Creator constrains this from its own motions, being forced and unwilling. After the pit, therefore, it suffers the cage, which, being snatched from eternal punishment, is bound from the motions of depraved liberty under the dispensation of the heavenly Artificer. Rightly therefore he says: And on account of pride You shall catch me as a lioness, because both the free man brought death upon himself through food, and being led back to pardon he lives better closed under discipline. As a lioness therefore on account of pride he was captured, because from that now the discipline of his corruption depresses him, from which not fearing the transgression of the precept, he boldly gave a leap into the pit.

[Vet. XLII.] 87. Thus also one elated by virtue is permitted to fall, that he may be healed from pride.---But if for a little while we avert the gaze of the mind from the fault of our first parent, we still daily find ourselves caught as a lioness through the vice of elation. For often a man, having received virtues, is lifted up into the audacity of his own presumption, but by a wonderful dispensation of piety any matter whatever in which he may fall is ordained before his eyes. And while he seeks something through fault, what else does he covet but the prey in the pit? Of his own accord gaping he falls, but he is not able to rise by his own strength. Who, when he considers that he is nothing of himself, learns without doubt whose aid he should seek. Whom however heavenly mercy carries away when captured as if from the pit, because it leads him back to pardon, his infirmity being known. In the manner of a lioness, therefore, on account of pride he returns to the upper parts in a cage, who when he is extolled from virtue, having fallen to desires, is bound in humility. For because he had first perished by his own presumption, it is acted by wonderful piety, that he may now live closed by the knowledge of his own infirmity. Which because the holy man beholds frequently happen to men, he takes up the voice of our danger in himself; so that when we recognize his wailing, we may learn the things which are to be wailed in us. But when elation lifts up our mind, the compunction of the highest love straightway recedes from us; but when heavenly grace visits us, it straightway instigates us by tears to its own desires. Whence also it is fitly subjoined:

CHAPTER LVIII

[Rec. XXXIV].

IBID.---And returning You wonderfully torture me.

88. The hardening of the mind deserted by God, the compunction of the one visited.---When we are relinquished by our Author, we do not at all feel even the losses of our destitution. For by as much as the Creator deserts us far off, by so much our mind hardens more insensibly, loves none of the things which are of God, by no means covets heavenly things; and because it does not have the heat of inward love, it lies cold below, and in a miserable way becomes daily so much more secure as it is worse; and when it does not remember whence it has fallen, and does not fear the punishments to follow, it does not know how much it is to be bewailed. But if it is touched by the breath of the Holy Spirit, it straightway awakes to the consideration of its own perdition, shakes itself in the inquiry of celestial things, is kindled with the heats of the highest love, considers the losses which press it around, and wailing makes progress, who before was perishing joyful. Well therefore it is said to the Creator: And returning You wonderfully torture me, because the almighty God, whence visiting our mind He lifts it up to His love, thence He afflicts it more heavily through tears. As if he should openly say: By relinquishing me You by no means affect me, because You render me insensible; but when You return You torture me, because while You insinuate Yourself to me, You show me how much I am to be bewailed. Whence also he asserts that he is by no means painfully, but wonderfully tortured, because while through weeping the mind is snatched to the highest things, rejoicing it wonders at the penalty of its own compunction; and it is pleasing to be affected, because by its own affliction it beholds itself to be raised to the heights. [Vet. XLIII.] But often when the heavenly piety sees us to be sluggish from the exercise of holy desire, it objects the examples of those following it to our gazes, so that the mind relaxed through leisure, by as much as it considers in others the progress of the vigilant, by so much it may blush in itself at the laziness of its torpor. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER LIX

[Rec. XXXV].

VERSE 17.---You renew Your witnesses against me, and You multiply Your wrath, and punishments war in me.

89. By the examples of the good God recalls us to Himself.---For the witnesses of God are those who, through the exercise of holy work, testify what rewards of truth shall follow the elect. Whence also those whom we recognize to have suffered for the truth we call in the Greek eloquence martyrs, that is, witnesses. And through John, the Lord shall say by an angelic voice: In the days of Antipas my faithful witness, who was slain among you (Rev. 2:13). But the Lord renews His witnesses against us when He multiplies the life of the elect, contrary to our depravity, for our reproof and instruction. Therefore His witnesses are renewed against us, because all things which they do are adverse to the pursuits of our depravity. Whence also the word of truth is called an adversary, when it is said by the voice of the Mediator through the Gospel: Be agreeing with your adversary quickly, while you are with him in the way (Matt. 5:25). And of this same Redeemer the reprobate persecuting Him say: He is contrary to our works (Wisd. 2:12); and a little after: And his life is unlike others (Ibid., 15). Therefore the Lord renews His witnesses against us, because those good things which we ourselves neglect to do, He demonstrates to be done by others for our correction; so that we who are not kindled by precepts, may at least be excited by examples, and in the appetite for rectitude our mind may estimate nothing to be difficult for itself which it sees to be perfectly performed by others. And it happens for the most part that when we behold the good things of another's life, we more solicitously fear the losses of our own; and by so much it may be open by how great a weight of animadversion we are afterwards affected, as we now differ far from the morals of the good.

90. Their labor indicates what punishment awaits the reprobate. What motions of the mind the goods seen in others ought to excite.--- Whence also, the renewal of the witnesses being mentioned, it is straightway fitly subjoined: And You multiply Your wrath. The wrath of God is said to be multiplied to us in this, that it is indicated to be manifold, because from the very life and labor of the good we now know, if we will not be amended while there is time, with how great animadversion we shall afterwards be struck. For we behold the elect of God both to act piously and to tolerate many cruel things. From this therefore it is gathered with how great strictness the strict Judge shall there strike those whom He reprobates, if here He so tortures those whom He loves; Peter attesting, who says: It is time that judgment begin from the house of God; but if first from us, what is the end of those who do not believe the Gospel of God (1 Pet. 4:17)? The almighty God therefore, when He renews witnesses against us, multiplies wrath, because by as much as He objects the life of the good to our eyes, by so much He shows with what strictness He shall strike in judgment the hardness of the depravity committed. For when He exaggerates gifts to those alone following Him, He demonstrates that He has already relinquished the sluggish. When therefore we behold good things in others, it is very necessary that we mix both exultation with our fear, and fear with our exultation, so that both charity may rejoice at the progress of others, and conscience may tremble at its own infirmities. But when we are refreshed by fraternal progress, when we weigh the strictness of the internal Judge over us from our very sluggishness, what remains but that the soul return to discuss itself, and whatever it finds reprobate in itself, whatever depraved, it should afflict? Whence also it is fitly subjoined: And punishments war in me. For the witnesses of God being considered, punishments war in us, because while we behold their wonderful deeds, we torture our own life, which from the comparison of them displeases us, with studious affliction; so that whatever the works have polluted in us, laments may wash away; and if anything still the fault of delight pollutes, the punishment of sorrow may wipe it away. Blessed Job therefore, because he beholds the life of the preceding fathers, knows more subtly what he ought to groan for in himself. But by the mastery of great grief, while he bewails his own, he instructs us to laments: so that by as much as we behold virtues in others, by so much we may solicitously fear our own sins before the strict Judge. It follows:

CHAPTER LX.

VERSE 18.---Why did You bring me out of the womb? O that I had been consumed, that no eye might see me.

91. Which indeed he already brought forth in his first speech, saying: Why did I not die in the womb? Who also this which he here adds, subjoining,---VERSE 19.---I should have been as if I were not, translated from the uterus to the tomb, there joins by other words not otherwise, saying: As a hidden abortion I should not have subsisted, or as those who being conceived have not seen the light (Job 3:16). But because we have discussed these things extensively above (Book IV, n. 48 et seq.), for the sake of avoiding the reader's fastidiousness, we decline to repeat the things already explained. It follows:

CHAPTER LXI

[Vet. XLIV, Rec. XXXVI].

VERSE 20.---Will not the fewness of my days be ended shortly?

92. The end of life is to be especially considered. He shows that he lives cautiously and solicitously, who, considering the brevity of the present life, looks not at its use but its end, so that he may gather from the end that nothing which passes away is delightful. For hence it is said through Solomon: If a man live many years, and rejoice in them all, he must remember the dark time and the many days; which when they come, the past shall be accused of vanity (Eccles. 11:8). Hence again it is written: In all your works remember your last end, and you shall never sin (Ecclus. 7:40). Therefore when guilt tempts the soul, the mind must necessarily look at the brevity of its delight, lest iniquity snatch it away to a living death (vivacem mortem), since it is certain that mortal life runs more swiftly to its end. But often the eye of our contemplation is confounded while our grief is aggravated by multiplying scourges. It is pleasant to groan for the exile of the present life, but because of that very affliction the mind is not able to estimate the losses of its own blindness. Whence he immediately subjoins:

CHAPTER LXII.

[Rec. XXXVII].

IBID.---Spare me then, that I may lament my sorrow a little.

93. Excessive sorrow takes away tears and the sense of pain. The force of habit does not allow us to weep for our evils. For as moderate affliction expresses tears, so immoderate affliction withdraws them, because the sorrow itself becomes as it were without sorrow, which, devouring the mind of the afflicted, takes away the sense of pain.

The holy man therefore fears to be struck more than is sufficient, saying: Spare me then, that I may lament my sorrow a little.

As if he should say openly: Temper the scourges of Your striking, so that, with moderate pains, I may recover strength to estimate by weeping the evils which I suffer. Which however can be understood in another way. For often the sinner is so bound by the chains of his iniquity, that he indeed bears the weight of his sins, but yet because he bears it he is ignorant of it. Often even if he knows with how great guilt he is pressed, he tries to break out, and cannot, so as to pursue this in himself with a free mind and entire conversion. Therefore he is not able to weep for his sorrow, because he both considers the guilt of his iniquity, and yet because of the weight of earthly occupation he by no means has leisure to groan for it. He is not able to weep for his sorrow, who indeed strives to go against evil custom, but yet is still burdened by the increasing desires of the flesh. The presence of this sorrow had tortured the mind of the Prophet, when he said: My sorrow is always before me, because I will declare my iniquity, and I will think for my sin (Psal. 38:17-18). But he knew himself released, the chains of iniquity being loosed, who exulted saying: You have broken my bonds, I will sacrifice to You the host of praise (Psal. 116:16-17).

94. Unless God helps us to it. Then therefore the Lord dismisses us to bewail our sorrow, when He both shows to us the evils which we have done, and helps us to weep for these same things which we know. He places our faults before our eyes, and with the pious hand of grace looses the bonds of the heart, so that our mind may raise itself to the vacancy of penitence, and, loosed from the fetters of the flesh, may tend the step of love freely toward its Author. [Vet. XLV.] For very often we ourselves reprehend our own life, but yet we willingly do that which we rightly reprove in ourselves. The spirit raises us to justice, the flesh restricts us to custom. The mind resists its own love, but immediately being delighted is captivated. Well therefore it is said: Spare me then, that I may lament my sorrow a little, because unless we are mercifully released from the guilt of the fault with which we have bound ourselves, we cannot perfectly weep for that which we grieve in ourselves against ourselves. But then the sorrow of our guilt is truly bewailed, when that dark retribution of hell is foreseen with intent fear. Whence it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER LXIII

[Rec. XXXVIII].

VERSE 21.---Before I go, and shall not return, to the dark land and covered with the darkness of death.

95. The punishments of hell are neither transitory nor fantastical. Why hell is called a land, why a lake. For what is signified by the name of the dark land, but the foul enclosures of Tartarus? Which the darkness of eternal death covers, because it separates all the damned forever from the light of life. Nor is hell undeservedly called a land, because whoever have been captured by it are firmly held. For it is written: A generation passes away, and a generation comes, but the earth stands forever (Eccles. 1:4). Rightly therefore are the dark enclosures of hell called a land, because those whom they receive for punishment, they by no means torture with a transitory punishment or a fantastical imagination, but preserve with the solid vengeance of perpetual damnation. Which nevertheless are sometimes signified by the appellation of a lake, the prophet attesting, who says: They have borne their ignominy with those who go down into the lake (Ezek. 32:24-25). Hell therefore is both called a land, because it firmly holds those received; and is called a lake, because those whom it has once taken it always absorbs, fluctuating and trembling in the surrounding torments. But the holy man, either by his own voice or that of the human race, asks to be released before he goes, not because he who bewails his fault is about to go to the dark land, but because he who neglects to weep undoubtedly goes to it; as a creditor says to his debtor: Pay the debt before you are bound for the debt; who nevertheless is not bound, if he does not delay to pay what he owes. Where also it is rightly subjoined: And I shall not return, because the mercy of the Spreader by no means further delivers those whom the justice of the Judge once damns in the penal places [Vet. XLVI]. Which penal places are yet more subtly described, when it is said:

CHAPTER LXIV.

VERSE 22.---A land of misery and darkness.

96. Those whom it holds are tortured without and blinded within. Misery pertains to pain, darkness to blindness. That land, therefore, which holds those expelled from the sight of the strict Judge, is shown to be a land of misery and darkness, because pain tortures without those whom blindness obscures within, being divided from the true light. Although the land of misery and darkness can be understood in another way. For this land also in which we are born is indeed one of misery, but it is not one of darkness, because we suffer many evils of our corruption here, but yet we still return to the light in it through the grace of conversion, the Truth persuading us, Who says: Walk while you have the light, lest darkness overtake you (John 12:35). But that land is at once of misery and of darkness, because whoever descends to endure its evils, by no means returns further to the light. In the description of which it is further subjoined:

CHAPTER LXV.

IBID.---Where the shadow of death is, and no order.

97. It has vengeance, not light. How just these punishments are. As exterior death divides the flesh from the soul, so interior death separates the soul from God. The shadow of death, therefore, is the obscurity of division, because every damned person, while he is burned with eternal fire, is darkened from the internal light. The nature of fire indeed is such, that of itself it exhibits both light and burning; but that avenging flame of past vices has burning, and has not light. For hence it is that the Truth says to the reprobate: Depart from me, you cursed, into eternal fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. 25:41). Again, signifying the body of all these in the person of one, He says: Bind his hands and feet, and cast him into outer darkness (Matt. 22:13). If, therefore, the fire which tortures the reprobate could have had light, he who is repelled would by no means be said to be cast into darkness. Hence also the Psalmist says: Fire fell upon them and they saw not the sun (Psal. 58:8). For fire falls upon the impious, but the sun is not perceived while the fire falls, because where the flame of Gehenna devours them, it blinds them from the vision of the true light; so that both the pain of combustion tortures them without, and the punishment of blindness obscures them within; so that those who have offended their Author both with body and heart, may be punished both with body and heart together; and they may feel punishments on both sides, who while they lived here served their depraved delights from both. Whence it is well said through the prophet: They went down into hell with their weapons (Ezek. 32:27). The weapons of sinners are indeed the members of the body, with which they execute the perverse desires they conceive. Whence it is rightly said through Paul: Neither yield your members as weapons of uniquity to sin (Rom. 6:13). To go down into hell with weapons, therefore, is to endure the torments of eternal judgment with those same members with which they fulfilled the desires of pleasure, so that then pain may absorb them on every side, who now, subjected to their delights, fight on every side against the justice of the one judging justly.

[Vet. XLVII. Rec. XXXIX]. 98. They are ordered, as being commensurate with crimes by an equitable Judge.

But it is very wonderful what is said: Where there is no order. For neither does Almighty God, Who punishes evils well, allow even torments to be in any way unordered, because those same punishments which proceed from the balance of justice can by no means be inflicted without order. For how will there not be order in the punishments, while the retribution of vengeance follows each damned person according to the measure of his crime? For hence it is written: The mighty shall be mightily tormented, and a stronger torture is at hand for the stronger (Wisd. 6:6). Hence in the damnation of Babylon it is said: As much as she has glorified herself, and lived in delicacies, so much give her torment and sorrow (Apoc. 18:7). If therefore punishment is distinguished according to the measure of the fault, it is certain indeed that order is observed in the punishments. And unless the acts of merits separated the sum of torments, the coming Judge would by no means be said to say to the reapers: Gather first the tares, and bind them in bundles to be burned (Matt. 13:30). For if no order shall be observed in the punishments, why are the tares to be burned bound in bundles? But indeed to bind bundles to be burned is to associate equals with equals who are to be delivered to eternal fire, so that the same punishment may bind those whom a similar fault defiles, and those who are polluted by no unequal iniquity may be tortured by no unequal torment; so that damnation may crush at once those whom elation at once raised up; and no dissimilar affliction may straiten those whom ambition no dissimilarly dilated, and a equal flame of punishment may torture those whom a equal flame of sin kindled in the fire of luxury. For as in the Father's house there are many mansions for the diversity of virtue (John 14:2), so the disparity of crime subjects the damned to the fires of Gehenna with diverse punishment. Which Gehenna indeed, although it is one for all, yet does not burn all with one and the same quality. For as we are all touched by one sun, yet we do not all burn under it in one order, because the weight of heat is felt according to the quality of the body, so to the damned there is both one Gehenna which affects them, and yet it does not burn all with one quality, because what disparity of bodies does here, there disparity of merits exhibits. How then is there said to be no order in the punishments, in which certainly each is tortured according to the measure of his fault?

[Vet. XLVIII.] 99. But they are not ordered in the heart of the damned. But the holy man, after he introduced the shadow of death, subjoins how great is the confusion in the mind of the damned, because those same punishments, which come ordered through justice, are undoubtedly not ordered in the heart of those dying. For as we said a little above, while each damned person is burned without by flame, he is devoured within by the fire of blindness, and being placed in pain, he is confounded outwardly and inwardly, so that he may be more miserably tortured by his own confusion. In the punishment of the rejected, therefore, there will be no order, because in their death that same confusion of mind rages more fiercely. Which nevertheless the equity of the one judging orders with wonderful power, so that punishment may confound the soul as if unordered. Or certainly order is said to be absent from the punishments, because the proper quality is not preserved to whatever things rise up for punishment. Whence also it is immediately subjoined:

CHAPTER LXVI.

IBID.---And eternal horror inhabits it.

100. Description of the punishments of hell. In the torments of this life fear has pain, pain has not fear, because by no means does fear torture the mind when it has already begun to suffer what it feared. But hell is both obscured by the shadow of death, and eternal horror inhabits it, because those delivered to its fires both feel pain in the punishments, and in the anguish of pain are struck by a fear always knocking at them, so that they both endure what they fear, and again fear without ceasing what they endure. For of these it is written: Their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be extinguished (Isai. 66:24). Here the flame which burns illuminates; there, as we taught above by the words of the Psalmist, the fire which tortures obscures. Here fear is lost when what was feared has already begun to be endured; there both pain mangles and fear straitens. In a horrible way, therefore, there will then be to the reprobate pain with dread, flame with obscurity. So indeed, forsooth, the weight of the highest equity ought to be felt by the damned, that they who did not at all fear to differ from the will of the Creator while they lived, in their eventual destruction even the torments themselves may differ from their own qualities, so that by that which they fight against each other, they may increase the tortures, and as they proceed variously they may be felt manifoldly. Which punishments nevertheless both torture those immersed in them beyond their strength, and preserve in them the support of life while extinguishing it, so that thus the end may punish life; so that torture may always live without end, because it both hastens to the end through torments, and lasts without end while failing. There is made therefore to the miserable a death without death, an end without end, a failing without failing, because both death lives, and the end always begins, and failing knows not how to fail. Because therefore death both kills and does not extinguish, pain tortures but in no way puts fear to flight, flame burns but by no means dispels the darkness; as much as is gathered through the knowledge of the present life, the punishments have no order, which do not hold their own quality in all things.

[Vet. XLIX.] 101. The fire there denies light for consolation, preserves it for torment. Although the fire there does not shine for consolation, yet it shines for something so as to torture more. For the reprobate are about to see each of their followers with them in torment by the illuminating flame, for whose love they sinned, so that they who had loved their life carnally against the precepts of the Creator, the destruction of these also may afflict them unto the increase of their own damnation. Which indeed we gather by the witness of the Gospel (Luke 16:23), in which, the Truth announcing, that rich man whom it happened to descend to the torments of eternal fire is described to have remembered five brothers, who asked of Abraham that he would send to their instruction, lest a like punishment should torture them coming there some time. He therefore who for the heap of his own pain remembered absent relatives, it is certain undoubtedly that he was able also to see them present shortly after for the increase of punishment. But what wonder if he should behold the reprobate also burned with him, who, for the heap of his own pain, saw him whom he had despised, Lazarus, in the bosom of Abraham? He therefore, to whom both an elect man appeared so that pain might increase, why should it not be believed that he could see in punishment those also whom he had loved against God? From which thing it is gathered that those whom the reprobate now love inordinately, they will then see with them in torments by a wonderful order of judgment, so that that carnal relationship preferred to the Author, being damned with a like vengeance before their eyes, may exaggerate the pain of their own punishment. The fire therefore which tortures in obscurity is to be believed because it preserves light for torment. Which if we cannot approve by testimonies in its own expression, it remains therefore that we should teach from the opposite.

102. Light and obscurity can be together in fire. Indeed three boys of the Hebrew nation, by the command of the Chaldean king, the fires of the furnace being kindled, were cast in with bound hands and feet: whom nevertheless when the same king explored, pitying them in the burning of the furnace, he saw walking with unhurt garments. Where it is openly gathered that by a wonderful dispensation of the Creator the quality of the fire, tempered in diverse virtue, both did not touch the garments and burned the bonds, and for the holy men the flame was cool for inflicting torment, and flared up for the ministry of release. As therefore the fire knew how to burn for the elect unto solace, and yet knew not how to burn for punishment; so from the opposite the flame of Gehenna for the reprobate both does not shine at all for the grace of consolation, and yet shines for punishment; so that the fire of punishment may both glow with no clarity for the eyes of the damned, and, for the heap of pain, show how the beloved are tortured. But what wonder if we believe the fire of Gehenna to have punishment at once of obscurity and of light, when we know by experience that even the flame of torches shines obscurely? Then the devouring flame burns those whom carnal delight now defiles, then the infinitely open abyss of hell devours those whom vain elation now exalts; and those who from whatever vice have here fulfilled the will of the crafty persuader, then with their leader the reprobate come to torments.

[Vet. L.] 103. One punishment involves reprobate angels and men. The evil man is the sepulchre of the devil. And although the nature of angels and men is far dissimilar, yet one punishment involves those whom one guilt binds in crime. Which the prophet well and briefly insinuates, who says: There is Assyria and all her multitude, and round about her her sepulchres (Ezek. 32:22). For who is expressed by the name of the proud king Assyria but that ancient enemy falling through elation, who for that reason that he draws many to fault, descends with all his multitude to the enclosures of hell? Moreover, sepulchres cover the dead. And who else has endured death more sharply than he who, despising his Creator, left life? Whom indeed when human hearts receive him dead, they undoubtedly become his sepulchres. But round about him are his sepulchres, because in whose minds he now buries himself through desires, these he afterwards joins to himself through torments. And since now in themselves the reprobate receive malignant spirits by perpetrating unlawful things, then the sepulchres will burn with the dead.

[Rec. XL.] 104. It does not profit to foreknow the punishments of hell, but to evade them. Behold what punishment remains for the damned we have known; and sacred eloquence instructing us, how great the fire in damnation, how great the obscurity in the fire, and how great the fear in the obscurity may be, we in no way doubt. But what does it profit to foreknow these things, if it does not happen to evade them? Therefore with all intention it must be cared for that, when we receive time of leisure, by the study of living well, we may flee the avenging torments of evils. For hence it is said through Solomon: Whatever your hand can do, work instantly, because neither work, nor reason, nor science, nor wisdom will be in hell, whither you hasten (Eccles. 9:10). Hence Isaiah says: Seek the Lord while He can be found, call upon Him while He is near (Isai. 55:6). Hence Paul says: Behold now the acceptable time, behold now the day of salvation (2 Cor. 6:2). Hence again he says: While we have time, let us work good to all (Gal. 6:10).

[Vet. LI.] 105. Care of the flesh stands in the way of the mind striving for this. But very often the mind girds itself for the way of rectitude, shakes off torpor; and is snatched by so great a desire for heavenly things, that almost nothing of it seems to have remained below. And yet when it is brought back to the care of the flesh, without which the way of the present life is in no way completed, it so holds it depressed below, as if nothing of the highest things had yet happened. Having heard the words of the heavenly oracle, it is raised to the love of the heavenly country; but the study of the present life rising again, it is buried under the heap of earthly care; and the seed of heavenly hope in no way profits in the earth of the heart, because the thorn of lowest thought becomes thick. Which thorn indeed the Truth through Itself eradicates with the hand of holy exhortation, saying: Do not be solicitous for tomorrow (Matt. 6:34). Against this also it is said through Paul: Make not care for the flesh in concupiscences (Rom. 13:14). But in these words of the leader and the soldier we recognize indeed that then the mind is pricked by it with a deadly wound, when the equity of measure is not held in it.

106. This is not to be cut off entirely, but to be moderated. For neither is care of the flesh fundamentally cut off for those still living in mortal flesh, but it is tempered so that it may discreetly serve the mind. For because the Truth prohibits us to be solicitous for tomorrow, He does not deny that we should have care in some way for present things, which He forbids to be extended to the time which follows. And indeed Paul, when he does not allow care of the flesh to be made in concupiscences, undoubtedly still concedes it in necessity. By the discretion of great moderation, therefore, care of the flesh is to be bridled, so that it may serve and by no means rule, lest as a mistress it overcome the mind, but, subjected to the dominion of the mind, it may serve as a handmaid, so that being ordered it may be present, and being repulsed at the nod of the heart it may leap away, so that it may hardly appear behind the back of holy thought, and never stand against the face of one thinking right things. Which is well hinted to us by the history of the sacred reading, when Abraham is remembered to have met three angels (Gen. 18:2, seq.). He indeed met those coming outside the door, but Sarah stood behind the door, because forsooth as the man and master of the spiritual house, namely our intellect, ought to exceed the enclosures of the flesh in the knowledge of the Trinity, and as it were go out of the door of the lowest habitation; but care of the flesh, like a woman, should not appear outside, and should blush to be seen boastfully, so that as if behind the back of the man under the discretion of the spirit, intent on necessaries alone, it may in no way know how to be uncovered procaciously, but to be moderated modestly. To which nevertheless when it is often said that she should by no means presume of herself, but transfer herself entirely into the confidence of divine hope, she despises it, and, study ceasing, she distrusts that supports of life can be present to her. Whence also this same Sarah hearing the promises of God laughs, but laughing she is corrected, and being corrected she is immediately made fruitful; and she who being vigorous in youth could not be made fruitful, broken by senile years, with a withering womb, conceived, because when care of the flesh shall have ceased to have confidence in itself, against hope it receives from the divine promise what it doubted it would have from human reason. Whence also well is Isaac, that is laughter, said to be he who is generated, because when the mind conceives the confidence of heavenly hope, what else does our mind bring forth than joy? It must be cared for therefore lest either care of the flesh pass the bounds of necessity, or in that which it executes moderately, it presume of itself. But often the mind is deceived, so that what it appetites voluptuously, it suspects to be necessary, so that it thinks everything which pleases to be a due utility of life. And often because effect follows providence, the mind is lifted up in confidence of itself. And when that is present to it which it sees to be lacking to others, by silent thought it becomes cheerful concerning the magnitude of its own provision; and it becomes so far from true provision, as much as it knows not the very elation which it suffers. Whence with the intention of skillful custody it must always be weighed either what we do in work, or what we turn over in the heart, lest either impeding the mind, earthly care multiply itself without, or at least from its moderation thought exalt itself within; so that when we fear divine judgments with temporal circumspection, we may evade the punishments of eternal horror.

BOOK TEN.

With the whole eleventh chapter of the book of Job and the first five verses of the twelfth being explained, it closes the second part of this work.

CHAPTER ONE.

1. The fortitude of Job, who is not overcome even by the successive change of adversaries. As often as a strong athlete descends into the spectacle of the arena, those who exist unequal in strength subject themselves in turn to his expugnation: and one being conquered, another is immediately raised up against him; and this one being subdued, another is substituted; so that they may find the strengths of the wrestler some time softer which his own multiplying victory fatigues; so that when each new one joins battle, he who is not able to be conquered by the quality of strengths, may at least be overcome by the change of persons. So indeed in this spectacle of men and angels blessed Job came forth a strong athlete, and showed how much he is able against the changes of adversaries by the continuation of untiring strength. To whom first Eliphaz, second indeed Bildad opposed himself, and at the last Zophar subjects himself in his expugnation: who raise themselves with all efforts to inflict blows, but yet do not reach to strike the depth of the robust breast. For their very words plainly insinuate that they cast blows into the air, because since they do not rightly rebuke the holy man, they lose the expressed words of striking in a vacuum. Which is clearly shown when the response of Zophar the Naamathite is begun from contumelies, who says:

CHAPTER II.

JOB XI, VER. 2.---Shall not he that speaketh much hear also? or shall a talkative man be justified?

2. The forward always respond to things rightly said from the opposite side. Zophar's sentence is true, but badly delivered. It is usually the custom of the forward to always respond to things rightly said from the opposite side, lest if they consent to what has been put forth, they should seem to be inferior. To whom the words of the righteous, however few they may sound, are many, because in the degree that they cut away their vices, they burden their hearing. Whence also that which is brought forth by right preaching against crimes is drawn into a crime. For Zophar, rebuking him who had spoken strong sentences out of the truth, calls him talkative, because when wisdom from the mouth of the righteous rebukes faults, the superfluity of loquacity sounds in the ears of fools. For the wicked think nothing right, except what they themselves have felt; and they esteem the words of the righteous as idle, in the degree that they find these diverse from their own senses. Nor indeed did Zophar bring forth a deceptive sentence, that a talkative man (vir verbosus) can by no means be justified, because while everyone flows away through words, the gravity of silence being lost, he loses the custody of the mind. Hence indeed it is written: The work of justice, silence (Isa. XXXII, 17). Hence Solomon says: As a city that lieth open and without compass of walls, so is a man that cannot restrain his spirit in speaking (Prov. XXV, 28). Hence again he says: In loquacity (multiloquio) sin shall not be wanting (Prov. X, 19). Hence the Psalmist testifies, saying: A talkative man shall not be directed upon the earth (Psal. CXL, 11). But the virtue of a true sentence is lost, which is not brought forth under the custody of discretion (discretionis). It is certain, therefore, that a talkative man cannot be justified. But a good thing is not well said, because it is not intended for the one to whom it is said. For a true sentence against the wicked, if it attacks the rectitude of the good, loses its own [virtue], and in that degree, being blunted, it recoils, in which that which it strikes is strong. But because the wicked are unable to hear good things patiently, and while they neglect the amendment of life, they gird themselves to words of response, Zophar openly insinuates, who subjoins:

CHAPTER III.

VER. 3.---Shall men hold their peace to thee alone? and when thou hast mocked others, shalt thou be confuted by no one?

3. How differently the wicked and the righteous are affected toward correction. An unskilled mind, as we have said, tolerates the sentences of truth with difficulty, and thinks silence a punishment, and judges everything that is rightly said to be the disgrace of its own derision (irrisionis), because when the true voice moves itself to the ears of the wicked, guilt bites the memory, and in the refutation (redargutione) of vices, in the degree that the mind is touched within by knowledge, it is excited without to the study of contradiction. It is not able to bear the voice, because it grieves being touched in the wound of its own guilt, and through that which is said generally against the perverse, it suspects itself to be attacked specially. For what it remembers to have done within, it blushes to hear without. Whence it soon prepares itself for defense, that it may cover the shame of its guilt through words of perverse refutation. For as the righteous judge the voice of correction (correptionis) concerning certain things which have not been rightly done by them to be a ministry of charity, so the perverse think it a contumely (contumeliam) of derision. The former immediately prostrate themselves to obedience, the latter are raised up to the madness of their own defense. The former reckon the aid of correction to be the protection of their life, through which while the fault of the present life is corrected, the wrath of the future judge is tempered; the latter, when they see themselves attacked by refutation, believe it a sword of striking, because while through the voice of correction the fault is detected, the opinion of present glory is defiled. Hence indeed in the praise of the righteous through Solomon Truth says: Teach a righteous man, and he will hasten to receive (Prov. IX, 9). Hence he despises the contumacy of the wicked, saying: He that instructeth a scorner, doth an injury to himself (Ibid. 7). For it happens for the most part that when they are not able to defend the evils corrected in themselves, they become worse out of shame; and thus they grow proud in their defense, that they seek out certain vices against the life of the one correcting; and in that degree they do not judge themselves criminal, if they also impose crimes on others. Which when they are not able to find true, they feign, so that they also may have that which they may seem to rebuke with no unequal justice. Whence also Zophar, because he grieved as if to be mocked through rebuke, immediately subjoins by lying:

For how could he say that he was clean, who said: If I would justify myself, my own mouth shall condemn me (Job IX, 20)?

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 4.---For thou hast said, My speech is pure, and I am clean in thy sight.

4. The wicked refuse to weep for true evils in themselves, and they impinge false ones on others. He who remembers the words of blessed Job recognizes how falsely this is impinged upon his voice. But the malice of the wicked has this [trait], that when it refuses to weep for true evils in itself, it feigns those of others. For it uses as it were a solace of crime (solatio facinoris), if the life of the one correcting is also defiled by false voices. But it must be known that for the most part the perverse wish for good things in word, that they may show that those which are had in present things are evil; and as if favoring, they seek prosperous things, that they may seem benign. Whence Zophar also immediately subjoins, saying:

CHAPTER V.

VER. 5.---And would that God would speak with thee, and would open His lips to thee!

5. When God speaks to man, and when man speaks to himself. For man speaks to himself when he is by no means separated from the understanding of carnal prudence (carnalis prudentiae intellectu) by the spirit of Divinity through that which he feels; when the flesh exerts its sense, and sends the mind without, as if provoking it to intelligence. Whence also to Peter still savoring earthly things Truth says: For thou savorest not the things that are of God, but the things that are of men (Mark VIII, 33). To whom, however, confessing right things, it is said: Flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father who is in heaven (Matt. XVI, 17). But what do we take the lips of God (Dei labia) to be but His judgments (judicia)? For with closed lips the voice is suppressed, and the sense of the silent one is not known; but with open [lips], while speech is brought forth, the mind of the speaker is found. Therefore God opens His lips when He shows His will to men through open judgments. For He speaks as if with unbolted mouth, when, the obscurity of the inward disposition being removed, He refuses to hide what He wills. For as if with closed lips He does not indicate His sense to us, when through occult judgments He conceals why He does what He does. Zophar, therefore, that he may rebuke blessed Job concerning carnal understanding, and may show of how great benignity he himself is, wishes him good things, which he is ignorant of even when they are had, saying: And would that God would speak with thee, and would open His lips to thee! As if he were to say plainly: I have compassion on thy ignorance (imperitiae) rather than thy punishment, because, I recognize thee as endowed with carnal prudence alone, and void of the spirit of truth. For if thou didst know the occult judgments of God, thou wouldst not sound such forward sentences against Him. And because almighty God, when He raises us to consider His judgments, immediately puts to flight the blindness of our ignorance, what instruction may come forth to us from His open lips, he immediately manifests by adding:

VERSE 6.---That He might show thee the secrets of wisdom, and that His law is manifold.

6. The works of wisdom which are public. Which are secret.---The public works of supernal wisdom are when Almighty God rules those whom He creates, perfects the good things which He begins, and by aspiring aids those whom He illustrates with the light of His visitation. For it is clear to all that those whom He created freely He disposes kindly. And when He bestows spiritual gifts, He Himself perfects what He Himself began from the gift of His kindness. But the secret works of supernal wisdom are when God deserts those whom He created; when He by no means consummates the good things which He had begun by preventing; when He illuminates us with the clarity of His illustration, and yet, by permitted temptations of the flesh, strikes us with the darkness of blindness; when He by no means guards the gifts which He conferred; when He both excites the desires of our mind towards Himself, and yet by a hidden judgment narrows us with the difficulty of our imbecility.

[Vet. V.] 7. He finds these by not finding, who has learned that they cannot be comprehended. The law of God and the charity of Christ.---Which secrets of His wisdom namely few are able to inquire into, but none to find, because what is disposed concerning us above us by immortal wisdom not unjustly, it is surely just that it should still be ignored by us mortals. But to behold these very secrets of that wisdom in any way is already to see the power of His incomprehensibility, because although we fail in the inquiry into His counsels itself, yet by failing we more truly learn whom we should fear. To these secrets of that wisdom Paul had stretched himself, when he said: O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God, how incomprehensible are His judgments, and His ways unsearchable! For who has known the mind of the Lord? or who has been His counselor (Rom. XI, 33)? Who also above, tiring from the inquiry itself, but yet profiting by tiring to the knowledge of his own infirmity, premised saying: O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Does the thing formed say to him that formed it: Why hast thou made me thus (Rom. IX, 20)? He therefore who, not being able to reach to the hidden things of God, returned to the knowledge of his own infirmity, and recalled himself to his own instruction by failing, as I may so say, found the secrets of wisdom by not finding them, because when he tired in searching for the supernal counsels, he learned to fear more humbly; and Him whom his own infirmity repelled from intimate knowledge, humility joined to him more truly. Sophar therefore, both skilled through the study of knowledge, and ignorant through the audacity of swollen speech, because he himself has not gravity, wishes for the better man what he has, saying: And O that God would speak with thee, and would open His lips to thee, that He might show thee the secrets of wisdom! Who also shows off that wisdom, by which he esteems himself to excel above his friend, in wishing, when he immediately adds: And that His law is manifold. What should be understood by the law of God in this place but charity, through which it is always read in the mind how the precepts of life should be held in action? For concerning this law it is said by the voice of Truth: This is My commandment, that you love one another (John XV, 12). Concerning this Paul says: Love is the fulfilling of the law (Rom. XIII, 10). Concerning this he says again: Bear one another's burdens, and so you shall fulfill the law of Christ (Galat. VI, 2). For what more congruously can be understood as the law of Christ than charity, which we then truly perfect when we tolerate fraternal burdens out of love.

8. Charity begins from two precepts, and extends itself to innumerable ones. Love of neighbor avoids hurting, takes care to do good. These two are performed in how many ways.---But this same law is called manifold, because by studious solicitude charity is dilated to all the deeds of virtues. Which indeed begins from two precepts, but extends itself to innumerable ones. For the beginning of this law is the love of God and the love of neighbor. [Vet. VI.] But the love of God is distinguished by three, because the Creator is commanded to be loved with the whole heart, and with the whole soul, and with the whole strength. In which thing it is to be noted that the divine discourse, when it commands God to be loved, not only relates from what, but also informs from how much, when it subjoins "with the whole," so that namely he who desires to please God perfectly should leave nothing of himself to himself. But the love of neighbor is derived to two precepts, when also by a certain just man it is said: What thou hatest to be done to thee by another, see that thou do not to another (Tob. IV, 16). And through itself Truth says: What things you will that men should do to you, do you also to them (Matth. VII, 12). By which two mandates namely of both Testaments, by one malice is restrained, by the other kindness is reached out, so that not doing the evil which each one does not wish to suffer, he may cease from the work of hurting; and again bestowing the good which he desires to be done to himself, he may exercise himself towards the utility of his neighbor out of kindness. But these two namely, while they are thought with solicitous intention, the heart is stretched to innumerable ministries of virtues, lest the restless mind should either boil with desires for bringing in what it ought not, or grow sluggish, resolved in idleness, towards exhibiting what it ought. For when it takes care to do to another what it by no means wishes to tolerate from another, it looks around itself with solicitous intention, lest pride should elevate it, and by casting down the mind to the contempt of neighbor should exalt it; lest ambition should tear the thought, and when it dilates this to desiring alien things, should narrow it; lest luxury should pollute the heart, and corrupt the subject to desires through illicit things; lest wrath should exasperate, and inflame as far as uttering contumely; lest envy should bite, and emulous of alien happiness, should consume itself with its own torch; lest loquacity should draw the tongue immoderately, and extend it as far as the lasciviousness of detraction; lest malice should excite hatred, and irritate the mouth as far as the javelin of malediction. Again when it thinks that it should do those things to another which it expects to be done to itself by another, it weighs namely that it should answer with good things to evils, and with better things to good ones; that it should exhibit the gentleness of long-suffering towards the bold; that it should bestow the grace of kindness upon those languishing with the plague of malice; that it should unite the discordant with peace, and gird the concordant to the concupiscence of true peace; that it should give necessary things to the indigent; that it should show the way of rectitude to those erring; that it should soothe the afflicted with word and compassion; that it should extinguish with rebuke those kindled in the desires of this world; that it should mitigate the threats of the powerful with reasoning; that it should lift the narrows of the oppressed with as much help as it prevails; that it should oppose patience to those resisting from without; that it should exhibit discipline with patience to those priding themselves from within; that towards the errors of subjects gentleness should so temper zeal, as not to enervate from the study of justice; zeal should so boil for vengeance, that yet it should not transcend the limit of piety by boiling; that it should provoke the ungrateful to love by benefits; that it should keep all the grateful in love by ministries; that it should be silent when it cannot correct the evils of neighbors, and that when they can be corrected by speaking, it should fear that silence should be consent; that it should so tolerate those things which it is silent about, that yet it should not hide the poison of grief in the soul; that it should so exhibit the gift of kindness to the malevolent, that yet it should not exceed through grace from the right of rectitude; that it should bestow all things which it prevails upon neighbors, but should not swell by bestowing these; that it should so fear the precipice of tumor in the good things which it exhibits, that yet it should not grow sluggish from the exercise of good; that it should so give what it possesses, as it attends how great the largess of the remunerator is; lest when it bestows earthly things, it should think of its own want more than is necessary, and in the oblation of the gift sadness should obscure the light of hilarity.

9. Multiform charity (charitas) is shown by the examples of the saints. Well therefore is the law of God called manifold, because indeed since charity is one and the same, if it has fully taken the mind, it inflames this multiformly to innumerable works. Whose diversity we briefly express, if we number its good things in individual elect [persons] by touching upon them. For this [charity] through Abel both offered elect gifts to God, and tolerated the sword of his brother by not resisting (Gen. IV, 4, 8). This taught Enoch both to live spiritually among men, and even corporally abstracted him from men to a sublime life (Gen. V, 24). This showed Noah alone placable to God, all others being despised, and exercised him in the building of the ark by the study of long labor, and saved him as a survivor to the world by exercising him in a pious work (Gen. VII, 6). This through Shem and Japheth was humbly ashamed of the nakedness of the father, and with a cloak cast over their backs, hid what they did not see (Gen. IX, 23). This, because it lifted up the right hand of Abraham in obeying even to the death of his son, made him the father of innumerable offspring, of nations (Gen. XXII, 10). This dilated the mind of Isaac, because it always held it to purity, even with eyes dim with age, to seeing things coming long after (Gen. XXVII, 1). This compelled Jacob both to groan from his inmost heart for his lost good son, and to tolerate the presence of perverse sons under equanimity (Gen. XXXVII, 34). This taught Joseph, sold by his brothers, both to endure service with uninfracted liberty of soul, and afterwards to rule over those same brothers with a mind not elated (Gen. XLII, 33). This, the people being delinquent, both prostrated Moses in prayers even to the petition of death, and raised him up through the study of zeal even to the slaying of the people, so that he both opposed himself to death for the perishing plebs, and immediately raged against the sinning [people] in the stead of the wrathful Lord (Exod. XXXII, 33). This raised the arm of Phinehas in vengeance of the sinning, so that, the sword being snatched up, he transfixed those coming together, and being angry appeased the wrath of the Lord (Num. XXV, 8, 9). This taught Joshua (Jesum) the explorer, so that he both first defended the truth by word against false-speaking citizens, and afterwards alleged this by the sword against enemies (Josh. I, 2, seq.; Num. XIV, 6, 7, seq.). This SAMUEL both showed humble in principality, and kept whole in dejection, who since he loved the plebs persecuting him, was himself a testimony to himself, because he did not love the height from which he was cast down (I Sam. III, 4, seq.). This before an iniquitous king both moved David by humility to flight, and filled him by piety toward pardon; who both fled his persecutor by fearing him as a lord, and yet when he found the power of striking, did not recognize an enemy (I Sam. XXIV, 6, 18). This both lifted up Nathan against a sinning king into the authority of free rebuke, and when the king's guilt was wanting, prostrated him humbly in petition (II Sam. XII, 1, seq.). This through Isaiah was not ashamed of the nakedness of the flesh in preaching, and the carnal veil being withdrawn, penetrated heavenly mysteries (Isa. XX, 2). This Elijah, because it taught him to live spiritually by the zeal of fervor, also abstracted him to life corporally (IV Kings II, 11). This Elisha, because it instituted him to love his master simply, filled him doubly with the spirit of the master (Ibid. 10). Through this Jeremiah resisted lest the people should descend into Egypt; but yet also loving the disobedient, where he prohibited to descend, there he himself also descended (Jerem. XLII, 18). This Ezekiel, because it first lifted him from earthly desires, afterwards balanced him in the air by a lock of his head (Ezek. VIII, 3). This in Daniel, because it restrained the throat from royal dainties, also closed the mouths of the hungering lions for him (Dan. XIV, 40). This for the three youths, because it subjected the burnings of vices while placed in tranquility, in the time of tribulation also tempered the flames in the furnace (Dan. III, 50). This in Peter both strongly resisted the threats of terrifying princes, and in removing circumcision humbly heard the words of inferiors. This in Paul both humbly bore the hands of the persecuting, and yet in the business of circumcision boldly rebuked the sense of the prior [one] far unequal to himself (Acts XV). Therefore manifold (multiplex) is that law of God, which fits individual articles of things not being changed, and conjoins itself to varying causes without being varied.

10. The offices of charity from Paul. Whose multiplicity of the law indeed Paul well enumerates, saying: Charity (charitas) is patient, is benign; envieth not, is not puffed up, dealeth not perversely, is not ambitious, seeketh not her own, is not provoked to anger, thinketh no evil, rejoiceth not in iniquity (iniquitate), but rejoiceth with the truth (I Cor. XIII, 4). For charity is patient (patiens), because it tolerates inflicted evils with equanimity. But it is benign (benigna), because it largely ministers good for evils. It envieth not (non aemulatur), because through this that it desires nothing in the present world, it knows not how to envy earthly successes. It is not puffed up (non inflatur), because while it anxiously desires the reward of internal retribution, it does not exalt itself concerning exterior goods. It dealeth not perversely, because in that it dilates itself into the love of God and neighbor alone, it is ignorant of whatever descreps from rectitude. It is not ambitious, because in that it ardently bestirs itself within for its own things, it by no means covets those of others without. It seeketh not her own, because all things which it possesses here transitorily it neglects as if alien, since it recognizes nothing to be its own property except what remains with itself. It is not provoked to anger, because even when provoked by injuries it excites itself to no motions of its own vengeance, while for great labors it expects greater rewards afterwards. It thinketh no evil, because solidating the mind in the love of purity, while it roots out all hatred, it knows not how to revolve in the soul what defiles. It rejoiceth not in iniquity, because in that it gasps toward all with love alone, it does not exult even concerning the perdition of adversaries. But it rejoiceth with the truth, because loving others as itself, through that which it beholds right in others, it becomes hilarious as if concerning the increase of its own progress. Therefore manifold (multiplex) is this law of God, which against the dart of each one's fault, which attacks the mind to be destroyed, meets it with the muniment of its own instruction, so that because the ancient enemy besieges us with varied circumfusion, [charity] itself may multiformly expugn him from us. Which law indeed if we weigh with solicitous consideration, we recognize how much we daily delinquent to our Creator. But if we perpendicular [weigh] our faults, we surely tolerate scourges with equanimity; nor does [the mind] rush forth to impatience from grief, when the conscience adjudges itself by its own judgment. Whence Zophar, knowing what he said, but not knowing to whom he said it, after he premised saying, That he might show thee the secrets of wisdom, and that his law is manifold, immediately subjoins:

CHAPTER VII.

IBID.---And that thou shouldst understand that thou art required of God much less than thy iniquity (iniquitas) deserveth.

11. The knowledge of our faults tempers the pain of scourges (flagellorum). The pain of the scourge is indeed tempered, as we have said, when the fault is recognized, because also everyone tolerates the iron tool of the physician the more patiently, the more he sees that to be putrid which he cuts. He therefore who understands the multiplicity of the law, weighs how much less are all the things which he suffers, because through this that the weight of the fault is recognized, the punishment of the affliction is lightened.

12. They sin venially, who by the fervor of zeal exceed the mode of correction (correptionis). But among these things it must be known that it was not without great iniquity that Zophar rebuked the righteous man even to the objection of iniquity. Whence also Truth justly refutes their audacity, but benignly brings them back to grace; because with a merciful Judge a fault is by no means left without pardon, when it is sinned through the fervor of zeal (zeli) out of His love.

For it often happens to great and wonderful doctors, that in that they are fervent with high charity, they exaggerate the mode of correction, and the tongue says something which it ought not, because love inflames the mind as much as it ought. But the word of uttered contumely is the more quickly spared, the more it is weighed also from what root it comes forth. Whence well through Moses the Lord commanded, saying: If any man shall go with his friend simply into the forest (silvam) to cut wood, and the wood of the axe (securis) shall fly from his hand, and the iron slipping from the handle shall strike his friend, and kill him, he shall flee to one of the aforesaid cities, and live, lest perhaps the next of kin of him whose blood was shed, pursued by the sting of grief, should overtake him, and strike his soul (Deut. XIX, 5). For we go to the forest with a friend as often as we turn with any neighbor to behold our delicts, and we simply cut down wood when we cut away the vices of the delinquent with a pious intention. But the axe flies from the hand when the rebuke draws itself into harshness more than is necessary. And the iron leaps forth from the handle when a harder word exceeds from the correction; and striking the friend it kills him, because the uttered contumely kills its hearer from the spirit of love. For the mind of the corrected one suddenly rushes forth to hatred, if an immoderate rebuke adjudges it more than it ought. But he who incautiously strikes the wood, and extinguishes his neighbor, must flee to three cities, that he may live defended in one of them, because if, being converted to the laments of penitence, he is hidden in the unity of the sacrament under hope, faith, and charity, he is not held guilty of the perpetrated homicide; and the neighbor of the extinguished one does not kill him even when he has found him, because when the strict Judge shall come, who joined Himself to us through the consortium of our nature, He will without doubt not seek from him vengeance for the guilt of the fault whom hope, faith, and charity hide under His pardon. Therefore a fault is more quickly dismissed which is by no means perpetrated by the study of malice. Whence Zophar also calls him iniquitous whom the heavenly sentence had praised; nor yet being reprobated is he excluded from pardon, because he is moved to the words of contumely by the zeal of divine love. Who because he does not recognize the merits of blessed Job, from an unskilled derision still subjoins, saying:

CHAPTER VIII.

VER. 7.---Peradventure thou wilt comprehend the footsteps of God, and wilt find the Almighty even to perfection?

13. The footsteps of God (vestigia Dei) are His gifts by which we are provoked to heavenly things. God is not seen manifestly here. The power of contemplation. The angelic or human mind does not fully behold the essence of God. What does he call the footsteps of God but the benignity of His visitation? By which indeed we are provoked to proceed to heavenly things when we are touched by the breath of His Spirit, and, being raised up outside the straits of the flesh, we recognize through love the contemplatable species of our Author, which we may follow. For when the love of the spiritual country inflames our mind, it as it were insinuates a way to those following, and upon the substrate heart as it were a certain footstep of God walking is impressed, so that by it the way of life may be held by right steps of thoughts. For him whom we do not yet discern, it remains necessary that we track through the footsteps of His love, so that even to the species of contemplation (contemplationis) the mind may sometimes find him whom now, as if following from behind, it explores through holy desires. The Psalmist well knew how to follow these footsteps of our Author when he said: My soul hath cleaved after thee (Psal. LXIII, 8). Whom he also bestirred himself to find even to the vision of His highness, saying: My soul hath thirsted for the living God; when shall I come, and appear before the face of God (Psal. XLII, 2)? For then indeed almighty God (Omnipotens) is found by manifest thought, when, the corruption of our mortality being thoroughly trodden down, He is beheld by us being assumed into the clarity of His divinity. but now the grace of the infused Spirit raises the soul from carnal thought, and exalts it into the contempt of passing things; and the mind despises all that it desired in the lowest things, and takes fire toward heavenly desires, and by the power of its own contemplation is lifted outside the flesh, which by the weight of its own corruption is still retained in the flesh. It tries to behold the ray of the uncircumscribed light, and is not able; which the mind pressed by infirmity by no means penetrates, and yet being repelled loves. For already the Creator shows from Himself that by which He may be loved, but withdraws the species of His vision from those loving Him. Therefore we walk beholding His footsteps alone, who follow Him through the signs of His gifts, whom we do not yet see.

Which footsteps indeed cannot be comprehended, because whence, where, or in what ways the gifts of His Spirit come, is not known, Truth attesting, who says: The Spirit breatheth where he will, and thou hearest his voice, and knowest not whence he cometh, and whither he goeth (John III, 8). But in the height of retribution the Almighty (Omnipotens) can be found through the species of contemplation, but yet not to perfection, because although we sometimes behold Him in His clarity, yet we do not fully behold His essence (essentiam). For the angelic or human mind, when it gasps toward the uncircumscribed light, by that very [fact] that it is a creature, it coarcts itself; and it is indeed stretched above itself by progress, but yet even being dilated it does not suffice to comprehend His fulness, who both by transcending and by carrying and by filling concludes all things. Whence also it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER IX.

VERS. 8, 9.---It is higher than heaven, and what wilt thou do? deeper than hell, and whence wilt thou know? Its measure is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea.

14. How God transcends all things.---That God is described as being higher than heaven, deeper than hell, longer than the earth, and broader than the sea, must be understood spiritually in proportion as it is unlawful to think anything concerning Him according to bodily lineaments. But He is higher than heaven, because by the uncircumscription of His Spirit He transcends all things; deeper than hell, because by transcending He supports [them]; longer than the earth, because He exceeds the measure of the creature by the perennity of His eternity; broader than the sea, because He so possesses the waves of temporal things while ruling them, that He surrounds them by coarcting them under the all-mode presence of His power. Although by the name of heaven the angels can be designated, and by the word of hell the demons; but by the earth just men, and by the sea sinners can be understood. He is therefore higher than heaven, because even the elect spirits themselves do not perfectly penetrate the vision of so great a loftiness. He is deeper than hell, because judging He condemns the astuteness of the malignant spirits much more subtly than they themselves had thought. Longer than the earth, because the patience of divine long-suffering (longanimitatis) surpasses our long-suffering, which both tolerates us when sinning, and awaits us when converted for the rewards of remuneration. Broader than the sea, because everywhere the presence of His retribution occupies the deeds of sinners, so that even when He is not discerned as present through species, He may be felt as present through judgment.

15. Yet all things can be referred to man alone, so that he himself is heaven when he now cleaves to the highest things through desire; he himself hell, when, disturbed by the darkness of his temptations, he lies in the lowest things; he himself earth, because he bears fruit in the abundance of fixed hope in good work; he himself sea, because in some things he is shaken trembling, and is agitated by the breeze of his mutability. But God is higher than heaven, because we are overcome by the magnitude of His power, even when we are elevated above ourselves; deeper than hell, because indeed He judges more than the human mind itself investigates itself in temptations; longer than the earth, because our hope by no means now comprehends the fruits of life which He retributes in the end; broader than the sea, because the fluctuating human mind conjectures many things concerning those that are to come, but when it has already begun to discern what it had estimated, it knows that it was narrow in its own estimation.

[Vet. XI.] Therefore He becomes higher than heaven when our very contemplation of Him fails. Whence also the Psalmist had placed his heart on high, but did not yet feel that he had touched Him, saying: Thy knowledge is become wonderful to me; it is strengthened, and I cannot [reach] to it (Psal. CXXXVIII, 6). He knew Him as deeper than hell, who discussing himself, but greatly fearing His more subtle judgments, said: I am conscious to myself of nothing, yet am I not hereby justified; but he that judgeth me, is the Lord (I Cor. IV, 4). He had seen Him as longer than the earth, when he weighed that the vows of the human mind were smaller than He, saying: Who is able to do all things more abundantly than we ask or understand (Ephes. III, 20). He had beheld Him as broader than the sea, who weighing by fearing that by no means would the human mind acknowledge the immensity of His strictness, however much it might fluctuate by inquiring, saying: Who knoweth the power of thy anger, or to number thy anger for fear (Psal. LXXXIX, 11)? Whose power the excellent teacher well suggests to us, when he briefly relates: That you may be able to comprehend with all the saints, what is the breadth, and length, and loftiness, and depth (Ephes. III, 18). For God has breadth, because He stretches His love even to the gathering of those that persecute Him. He has length, because He leads us to the country of life by tolerating us longanimously. He has loftiness, because He transcends the intelligence even of those who shall have been received into the heavenly congregation. He has depth, because He incomprehensibly exerts the judgment of His strictness on those damned below. Which four things indeed He exercises for each of us placed in this life, because He exhibits both breadth by loving, and length by tolerating, and loftiness, by surpassing not only our intelligence but even our vows, and His depth, by strictly judging the hidden and illicit movements of thoughts. But how uninvestigable His loftiness and depth may be, no one acknowledges, unless he who has begun either to be carried by contemplation to the highest things, or, resisting hidden movements, to be disturbed by the importunity of temptations. Whence also it is said to blessed Job: It is higher than heaven, and what wilt thou do? deeper than hell, and whence wilt thou know? As if it were said to him in open contempt: When dost thou suffice to know His depth and excellence, who knowest not either to be carried by virtue to the highest things, or to reprove thyself in temptations. It follows:

CHAPTER X.

[Rec. VIII].

VERS. 10.---If he subvert all things, or coarct them into one, who shall contradict him? or who can say to him, Why dost thou so?

16. How God subverts heaven, hell, earth, [and] sea in us.---The Lord subverts heaven when by a terrible and hidden dispensation He destroys the loftiness of human contemplation. He subverts hell when He permits the mind of anyone, fearful in its own temptations, to fall even to worse things. He subverts the earth when He cuts off the fructification of good work by intervening adversities. He subverts the sea when He confounds the fluctuation of our wavering by a suddenly emerging fear. For by its own doubt the anxious heart greatly dreads this very [fact] that it wavers, and is as it were a subverted sea when our very trepidation toward God is disturbed, the terror of His judgment being considered. [Vet. XII.] Because therefore we have briefly said how heaven or hell, earth or sea, is subverted, it now remains that we demonstrate somewhat more laboriously how these may be able to be coarcted into one.

17. Heaven and hell together, in one mind contemplation and the temptation of the flesh.---For it often happens that the spirit already elevates the mind to the highest things, but yet the flesh impugns this with importunate temptations. And when the soul is led to contemplate heavenly things, it is reverberated by the objects of illicit action [presented to] the imaginations. For suddenly the stimulus of the flesh wounds him whom holy contemplation was snatching outside the flesh. Heaven therefore and hell are together coarcted when both the lifting up of contemplation illuminates one and the same mind, and the importunity of temptation obscures [it]; so that it both sees by intending what it may desire, and by succumbing in thought it may tolerate what it may blush at. For from heaven light arises, but hell is possessed by darkness. Heaven and hell are therefore reduced into one when the mind, which already considers the light of the heavenly country, also carries the darkness of hidden temptation from the war of the flesh.

Certainly Paul had already ascended the summit of the third heaven, already he had known the secrets of paradise, and yet he still groaned tolerating the wars of the flesh, saying: I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and leading me captive in the law of sin, which is in my members (Rom. VII, 23). What therefore in the breast of this so great a preacher had God coarcted except heaven and hell, who had both already received the light of inward vision, and yet still tolerated darkness from the flesh? He had seen above himself what he might joyfully desire, he beheld in himself what he might fearfully grieve at. Already the light of the heavenly country had irradiated [him], but still the obscurity of temptation confounded the soul. Together with heaven therefore he bore hell, because both security raised him up illuminated, and groaning prostrated him tempted.

18. Earth and sea together, certainty of faith with some little doubt.---And it often happens that faith already flourishes in the mind, but yet in some small part it withers in doubt; so that both certain it may elevate itself from visible things, and from certain [things] it may disturb itself uncertain. For mostly it raises itself to desire eternal things, and agitated by the arising stimuli of thoughts, it contradicts itself. [Vet. XIII.] Earth and sea are therefore coarcted into one when both the certainty of solid faith strengthens one and the same mind, and yet from some small mutability of perfidy the breeze of doubt turns it. Or had he not known that earth and sea were coarcted in his own breast, who both hoping through faith, and fluctuating through infidelity, said: I believe, Lord, help my unbelief (Mark IX, 23)? What is it therefore, that he both asserts that he believes, and seeks to be helped in the unbelief in himself, except that he had apprehended that earth was coarcted with sea in his thoughts, who both certain had already begun to pray through faith, and still uncertain tolerated the waves of perfidy from unbelief?

19. Why God permits the mind rising to right things to be impugned.---Which, however, is permitted to be done by a hidden dispensation, so that when the mind has already begun to rise to rectitude, it may be impugned by the remains of its own depravity; so that this very impugnation may either exercise the one resisting, or break the one seduced by delights. Rightly therefore is it now said: If he subvert all things, or coarct them into one, who shall contradict him? or who can say to him: Why dost thou so? because indeed the divine judgment can neither be diminished by adversity, nor known by inquisition, when He either withdraws the virtues which He had bestowed, or not entirely taking these away, permits [the mind] to be shaken by the impugnation of vices. For often the heart is lifted up into elation when it is strengthened in virtue by joyful successes, but while the Creator beholds the latent movements of audacity in thought, He leaves man to himself by showing [him to] himself, so that his mind, being left, may find what it is, which was wickedly rejoicing secure in itself. Whence when all things were said to be subverted, or coarcted into one, it is immediately added:

CAPUT XI

VERS. 11.---For he knoweth the vanity of men, and seeing iniquity, does he not consider?

20. The difference between vanity and iniquity.---As if by laying open the premises he subjoined, saying: Because He beholds vices increase by tolerating [them], He confounds gifts by judging [them]. But a right order is preserved in the description, since vanity is first to be known, and afterward iniquity is said to be considered. For every iniquity is vanity, but yet not all vanity is wont to be iniquity. For we act vain things as often as we think transitory things. Whence also that is said to vanish which is suddenly withdrawn from the eyes of beholders. Hence the Psalmist says: Every man living is universal vanity (Psal. XXXVIII, 6); since by this that he tends to destruction by living, he is rightly indeed called vanity, but by no means rightly also called iniquity, because even if it is from the punishment of fault that he fails, yet this very [fact] is not a fault, that he runs through life. Vain therefore are the things which pass away. Whence also it is said by Solomon: All is vanity (Eccles. I, 2).

21. Vanity leads to iniquity. Vanity clouds the mind, iniquity blinds it.---But aptly after vanity is iniquity immediately subjoined, because while we are led through certain transitory things, we are nocuously bound in certain [others]; and when the mind does not hold the state of immutability, flowing down from itself, it breaks forth to vices. Therefore it slides by vanity to iniquity, which being accustomed to mutable things, while it is always impelled from some to others, is defiled by arising faults. [Vet. XIV.] Yet vanity can also be understood as fault, and a heavier guilt be demonstrated by the name of iniquity. For if vanity were sometimes not a fault, the Psalmist would not say: Although man walks in the image of God, yet is he vainly disquieted; he treasures up, and knows not for whom he gathers them (Psal. XXXVIII, 8); because although we preserve the image of the Trinity in nature, yet perturbed by vain movements of delight, we fail in our conversation; so that a desire may shake us with always alternating modes, fear break us, joy soothe us, grief afflict us. From vanity therefore, as was also said above, we are led to iniquity when first we flow down through light offenses, so that, use levelling all things, we by no means afterward fear to commit even heavier things.

[Rec. XV, Rec. X].

VERS. 12.---A vain man is lifted up into pride.

22. Vanity makes [one] audacious from fault, and unbridled in the movements of nature.---For the end of vanity is, that when it wounds the mind with sin, it renders it audacious from fault;

so that, having forgotten its own guilt, since it does not grieve that it has lost its innocence, blinded by a just judgment, it may at the same time lose humility. And it mostly happens that, serving depraved desires, it shakes itself from the yoke of divine fear, and, as if now free for the perpetration of evils, contends to fulfill all that pleasure suggests. Whence when a vain man is said to lift himself up into pride, there is immediately subjoined:

CHAPTER XIII.

IBID.---And as the colt of a wild ass he thinks himself born free.

23. For by the colt of a wild ass every kind of wild [creatures] is expressed, which, being left to the movements of nature, is not held by the reins of those who rule [them]. For the animals of the field have it in their liberty both to go where they desire, and to rest when they are weary. And although man is far better than senseless animals; yet this is mostly not allowed to man which is allowed to brute animals. For those which are by no means kept for anything else, their movement without doubt is by no means restricted under discipline. But man who is led to the following life, it is indeed necessary that he be bound in all his movements under the disposition of discipline, and as a domestic animal serve bound by reins, and live restricted by eternal dispositions. He therefore who seeks to fulfill all things which he desires through unbridled liberty, what else does he covet than to be like the colt of a wild ass, so that the reins of discipline may not hold him, but he may run audaciously wandering through the forest of desires?

24. The reins with which God coerces and rules us.---But often divine mercy breaks those whom it beholds go forth into the unbridling of illicit liberty, by the opposition of sudden adversity, so that being struck they may learn how they had swollen with reprobate loftiness; so that now being tamed by the experiences of the scourge, they may subject the necks of the mind to the reins of the precepts as domestic beasts of burden, and proceed on the journeys of the present life at the nod of the one presiding. By which reins he well knew himself to be bound, who said: I am become as a beast of burden before thee, and I am always with thee (Psal. LXXII, 23). Whence also that savage persecutor, led from the field of perfidious pleasure to the house of faith, being pricked by the spurs of his Ruler, heard: It is hard for thee to kick against the goad (Acts IX, 5). It remains therefore that if we no longer wish to be like the colt of a wild ass, we should first seek the nod of the inward dispensation in all things which we desire, so that our mind in all that it strives for, may be held by the rein of the heavenly government; and may thence rather fulfill its vows unto life, whence it treads down the studies of its life even against its own will. Zophar brought forth many strong [things], but he knows not that he speaks these to one better than himself. Whence still rebuking he subjoins:

CHAPTER XIV.

VERS. 13.---But thou hast firmed thy heart, and hast spread out thy hands to him.

25. Zophar argues that Job is of an obdurate and proud mind. In this the wicked and heretics imitate him against the good and Catholics.--- To have firmed the heart is not said in this place for virtue, but for insensibility. For every one within who subjects himself to the consideration of inward strictness, immediately softens from the fear of it; and the arrow of divine dread penetrates him, because he carries weak vitals through humility. But whoever becomes obdurate by the pertinacity of insensibility, as it were firms his heart, lest the darts of heavenly fear should transfix it. Whence to some through the prophet the Lord mercifully says: I will take away from you the heart of stone, and I will give you a heart of flesh (Ezek. XXXVI, 26). For He takes away the heart of stone when He withdraws from us the hardness of pride, and He bestows a heart of flesh when He turns that same hardness of ours immediately to sensibility. But by the hands, as we have already frequently taught, works are designated. To spread out hands to God with fault, therefore, is to be proud of the virtue of works against the grace of the Giver. For he who, speaking in the sight of the eternal Judge, attributes to himself the good things which he does, stretches out proud hands to God. Thus indeed the reprobate are always unbridled against the elect, thus heretics against Catholics, so that when they cannot rebuke their deeds, they may strive to reprove the good concerning the elation of their deeds, so that they may accuse those whom they are not able to refute from the infirmity of action, of the crime of swelling. Whence also those good things which are done outwardly, they by no means now judge to be good, which are exhibited as it were through the study of a turgid thought. Who often being swollen rebuke the humble, and know not that they strike themselves by their words. But because Zophar has hitherto corrected the just man by rebuking [him], he now subjoins as if by teaching:

CHAPTER XV

[Vet. XVI, Rec. XI].

VERS. 14, 15.---If iniquity which is in thy hand thou shalt take away from thee, and injustice shall not remain in thy tabernacle, then thou shalt be able to lift up thy face without spot, and thou shalt be stable, and shalt not fear.

26. That the mind may be clean, first the iniquity of work, then of the heart is to be cut off.---Every sin is committed either by thought alone, or is perpetrated by thought and work together. Iniquity therefore in the hand is fault in work, but injustice in the tabernacle is iniquity in the mind. For our mind is not incongruously called a tabernacle, in which we are hidden with ourselves, when we are not seen abroad in work. Zophar therefore, because he is a friend of the just man, knows what he says; but because he rebukes the just, holding the likeness of heretics, he is ignorant of how to bring forth rightly even what he knows. But we, treading upon this which is said by him swollenly, let us weigh his words, how true they would be if they were said rightly. For he first admonishes that iniquity be withdrawn from the hand, and afterward that injustice be cut off from the tabernacle, because whoever already cuts off depraved works from himself outwardly, it is indeed necessary that, returning to himself, he should skillfully discern himself in the intention of the mind; lest fault, which he no longer has in action, should still endure in thought. Whence also it is well said by Solomon: Prepare thy work abroad, and diligently exercise thy field, that afterward thou mayest build thy house (Prov. XXIV, 27). For what is it, work being prepared, to exercise the field diligently outwardly, except, the thorns of iniquity being plucked up, to cultivate our action for the fruit of retribution? And what is it after the exercise of the field to return to the building of the house, except that we mostly learn from good works how much cleanness of life we should construct in thought? For almost all good works proceed from thought, but there are some sharpnesses of thought which are born from operation; for as work is taken up from the soul, so again the soul is instructed by work. For the mind, taking the beginnings of divine love, commands good things to be done; but after they have begun to be done as commanded, being exercised by those very actions of its own, it learns, when it had begun to command good things, how much less it saw. Abroad therefore the field is cultivated, that the house may be afterward built, because we mostly take from the exterior work how much subtlety of rectitude we may hold in the heart. Which order Zophar studied well to preserve, when he first said iniquity was to be taken away from the hands, and afterward injustice from the tabernacle, because by no means is the soul fully erected in thought, when error is still committed by it outwardly in work.

[Vet. XVII.] 27. This cleanness affords confidence in prayer; otherwise, if it be lacking.--- Which if we perfectly wipe away these two, we immediately lift up our face without spot to God. For the internal face of man is the mind, in which indeed we are recognized, that we may be directed by our Author. Which face indeed to lift up is to raise the soul to God through the studies of prayer. But a spot defiles the lifted-up face, if the consciousness of its own guilt accuses the soul while intending [to pray], because it is immediately broken from the confidence of hope, if the memory of a fault not yet overcome bites [the mind] intent on prayers. For it distrusts that it can receive what it desires, which indeed remembers that it is still unwilling to do what it has heard from heaven. Hence it is said by John: If our heart reprove us not, we have confidence toward God, and whatever we shall ask of him we shall receive (I John III, 21). Hence Solomon says: He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, his prayer shall be an abomination (Prov. XXVIII, 9). For the heart reproves us in petition when it remembers that it resists the precepts of Him whom it asks, and prayer becomes an abomination when it is turned away from the censure of the law, because it is indeed worthy that each should be a stranger to His benefits to whose commands indeed he will not be subject.

28. When [cleanness] is not present, what is to be done.---In which matter this is the salutary remedy, that when the mind reproves itself from the memory of fault, it should first bewail this in prayer, that it has erred; so that the spot of error being wiped away with tears, in its petition the face of the heart may be seen clean by its Author. But it is to be greatly cared for lest it should again break forth into that which it exults to have cleansed with tears, lest while the bewailed fault is committed again, even the lamentations themselves should be made light of in the sight of the just Judge. For we ought skillfully to remember what is said: Do not repeat a word in thy prayer (Ecclus. VII, 15). By which saying indeed the wise man by no means prohibits us to ask for pardon often, but to repeat faults. As if he should say openly: When thou hast bewailed things wickedly done, by no means do again what thou mayest again lament in prayers.

29. Before prayer, impure and earthly thoughts are to be dismissed.---Therefore, that the face may be lifted up without spot to prayer, before the times of prayer whatever can be reproved in prayer ought always to be solicitously looked into; and the mind should hasten to exhibit itself such even when it ceases from prayer, as it desires to appear to the Judge in the very time of prayer. For often we revolve certain impure or illicit things in the soul, as often as we are vacant from prayers. But when the mind has erected itself to the studies of prayer, it suffers the images of those things being reverberated, with which it was previously willingly pressed when idle; and as it were the soul no longer suffices to lift up its face to God, because indeed in its defiled mind it blushes at the spots of polluted thought. Often we are willingly occupied with the cares of the world. And when after these we intend the study of prayer, the mind by no means raises itself to heavenly things, because the weight of earthly solicitude has merged it into the depth; and in prayer the face is not shown clean, because it is spotted with the mud of the lowest thought.

[Vet. XVIII.] 30. Other's offenses against us are to be released. Who is free from fear.---But sometimes we shake out the heart from all [things], and we meet illicit motions even when it is vacant from prayer; but yet because we commit faults more rarely, we release other's offenses more sluggishly; and as much as our soul more solicitously fears to sin, so much more strictly it abhors that which is committed against itself by another. Whence it happens that everyone is found slow to pardon, in proportion as by progressing he has been made cautious against fault; and in as much as he himself fears to exceed against another, he seeks to punish more harshly that which is exceeded against himself. But what can be found worse than this spot of pain, which in the sight of the Judge does not defile charity, but kills it? For any fault indeed pollutes the life of the soul, but pain kept against a neighbor kills it. For it is fixed in the mind like a sword, and by its point the very secrets of the bowels are pierced. Which indeed from the transfixed heart, if it is not first drawn out, nothing of divine aid is obtained in prayers, because neither can the medicines of health be applied to wounded members, unless the iron is first withdrawn from the wound. For hence it is that Truth says through itself: If you will not forgive men their sins, neither will your Father who is in heaven forgive you your sins (Matt. VI, 15). Hence He admonishes, saying: When you shall stand to pray, forgive if you have anything against another (Mark XI, 25). Hence again He says: Give, and it shall be given to you; forgive, and it shall be forgiven to you (Luke VI, 38). Hence He placed the condition of piety to the constitution of postulation, saying: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors (Matt. VI, 12); so that indeed the good which we, being moved to compunction, ask from God, we may first do this, being turned, with our neighbor. Then therefore we truly lift up our face without spot, when neither do we commit prohibited evils, nor do we retain those which have been committed against us from our own zeal. For our mind is depressed by heavy confusion at the time of its prayer, if either its own operation still defiles it, or pain kept from another's malice accuses it. Which two while everyone shall have wiped away, he rises up free straightway to those things which are subjoined. And thou shalt be stable, and shalt not fear; because indeed he so much less trembles at the Judge, as much as he stands more solidly in good acts. For he overcomes fear, who keeps stability, because while he solicitously studies to perform what the Creator mildly commands, he also thinks secure of what He terribly threatens.

31. It is easier to persevere in the active life than in the contemplative. Who may be thought to persist in contemplation.---It is to be known besides that there are some goods in which we persist unwearied, and again there are some from which failing continually we fall, and to these we are reformed by great efforts through intervals of times. [Vet. XIX.] For in the active life the mind is fixed without failing, but from the contemplative, conquered by the weight of its own infirmity, it is wearied. For the former lasts so much more firmly, as much as it dilates itself towards its neighbors for their utility; the latter falls so much more quickly, as much as also transgressing the barriers of the flesh, it tries to go above itself. The former directs itself through level places, and therefore fixes the foot of work more robustly; but the latter, in proportion as it seeks high things above itself, descends more quickly exhausted to itself. Which Ezekiel well and briefly insinuates, when he relates the motions of those living creatures which he had seen, saying: They returned not when they went. And a little after he subjoins, adding: And the living creatures went and returned (Ezek. I, 9, 14). For the holy living creatures sometimes go, and by no means return; sometimes they go, and straightway return, because the minds of the elect when they desert the ways of error through the grace of the active life bestowed on them, know not how to return to the evils of the world which they have left; but when through the edge of contemplation they suspend themselves from this same active life, they go and return, because by this that they by no means suffice to persist long in contemplation, they pour themselves again into operation; so that in those things which are near to them they may refresh themselves by exercising themselves, and by contemplating they may grow strong to rise again above themselves. But while this same contemplation is repeated in the due manner through intervals of times, without failing no doubt it is also persisted in its solidity, because even if the mind conquered by the weight of its infirmity fails, yet being repaired by continual efforts it apprehends it again. Nor is it to be said to have lost its stability in it, from which even if it always fails, it always seeks it even when it has lost it. It follows:

[Rec. XII].

VERSE 16.---354 Thou shalt also forget misery, and as of waters that have passed away, thou shalt not remember.

32. The heavy evils of this life are not eternal to one thinking on good things.---The mind feels the evils of the present life so much more harshly, as much as it neglects to weigh the good which follows; and in as much as it does not wish to consider the rewards which remain, it esteems those things which it suffers to be heavy. Whence also against the stroke of the scourge the blind thought complains, and it is believed as if an infinite calamity, which by the daily course of days is finished. But if anyone once should raise himself to eternal things, and in those things which remain unchangeably should fix the eye of the heart, he perceives that whatever runs to an end is almost nothing here. He suffers the adversities of the present life, but he weighs as if almost nothing all that which passes away. For by how much more robustly he inserts himself into internal joys, by so much less he feels pains externally. Whence Zophar by no means fearing with rash daring to teach a better [man], exhorts to justice, and demonstrates how no punishment seems to be in the eyes of the just. As if he should say openly: If thou tastest the joy which remains within, all that which pains without becomes straightway light. But well he compares the miseries of the present life to waters passing away, because a passing calamity by no means overwhelms the mind of the elect by the force of its concussion, but yet it infuses it with the touch of sorrow. For it is wet indeed by the blood of the wound, even if it is not broken from the certainty of its own health. [Vet. XX.] But often not only do scourges wear [them] down, but in the mind of every just man the temptations of malignant spirits also range, so that he may pain externally from the stroke, and internally cool down to some extent from the temptation. But by no means does grace desert [him], which by how much more harshly it strikes us by dispensation, by so much more abundantly it keeps [us] by piety. For when it has begun to grow dark through temptation, the internal light enkindles itself again. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XVII.

VERSE 17.---And as the midday brightness it shall rise up to thee in the evening.

33. Virtue is renewed in temptation.---For the midday brightness in the evening is the renewal of virtue in temptation, so that the mind may flourish with sudden fervor of charity, which even now was fearing that the light of grace had set for itself. Which yet Zophar opens more subtly, when he subjoins:

CHAPTER XVIII.

IBID.---And when thou shalt think thyself consumed, thou shalt rise as the morning star.

34. Sorrow from temptation prays to God's mercy for us. The just man, a morning star.---For often so many temptations beset us, that their very number almost inclines us to the fall of despair. Whence for the most part when the mind is turned into weariness, it scarcely considers the losses of its own virtue; and being all in pain, but as if already alienated even from the sense of pain, it is broken, and is not able to enumerate with how great a tumult of thoughts it is wasted. It perceives itself about to fall by moments, and even sorrow itself more heavily contradicts it, lest it should take up the arms of repugnance. Darkness besets the eyes turned about in any direction, and since shadows always hinder the sight, the mournful mind sees nothing other than shadows. But with the merciful Judge often this itself, which also burdens the effort of prayer, more subtly prays for us as sorrow. For then the Creator perceives the darkness of our sorrow, and pours back the rays of withdrawn light, so that straightway the mind may flourish through gifts, which a little before the contending vices were depressing with the heel of pride. Soon it shakes off the weight of torpor, and breaks forth to the light of contemplation after the shadows of its own disturbance. Soon in progress it is raised into joy, which among temptations was being thought to fall worse from despair. Without the contest of thought it despises present things, without the obstacle of doubt it confides concerning future retribution. Therefore the just man when he shall think himself consumed, rises as the morning star, because as soon as he shall have begun to grow dark with the darkness of temptations, he is reformed to the light of grace, and in himself he shows the day of righteousness, who a little before feared that the night of fault was about to fall. But rightly the life of the just is compared to the morning star. [Vet. XXI.] For preceding the sun, the morning star announces the day. And what does the innocence of the saints cry to us but the brightness of the following Judge? For in the admiration of them we perceive what we should estimate concerning the majesty of the true light. We do not yet see the power of our Redeemer, but yet we admire His virtue in the morals of His elect. Because therefore the life of the good in its consideration objects the force of truth to our eyes, the bright morning star comes to us before the sun.

35. The just man suffers hard things here, but it shall be well with him in the end. Falling already from hence without, he is renewed within. ---It is to be known indeed that these things which we have discussed from the adversity of spiritual temptations, nothing hinders to be understood also according to external evils. For holy men because they love the highest things from the marrow, suffer hard things in the lowest; but in the end of joy they find the light, which they despise to have in this space of a running life. Whence it is now said through Zophar: And as the midday brightness it shall rise up to thee in the evening. For the light of the sinner in the day is darkness in the evening, because in the present life he is raised by prosperity, but is devoured by the shadows of adversity in the end. But to the just man the midday brightness rises in the evening, because he recognizes how great a brightness remains for him when he has already begun to set. For hence it is written: To him that feareth God it shall be well in the end (Ecclus. I, 13). Hence it is said through the Psalmist: When he hath given sleep to his beloved, this is the inheritance of the Lord (Psal. CXXVI, 2). Who being placed still in the contest of this life, when he shall think himself consumed, rises as the morning star, because falling without, he is renewed within; and by how much more he tolerates adversities externally, by so much more abundantly he sparkles internally with the light of virtues, Paul attesting, who says: But though our outward man is corrupted, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For that which is at present momentary and light of our tribulation worketh in us above measure exceedingly an eternal weight of glory (II Cor. IV, 16). And it is to be noted that he by no means says when thou shalt be consumed, but when thou shalt think thyself consumed, because both that which we see is in doubt, and that which we hope for is in certainty. Whence also the same Paul did not know himself consumed, but thought it, who also falling into the adversities of tribulations was resplendent as the morning star, saying: As dying, and behold we live; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as needy, yet enriching many (II Cor. VI, 9). [Vet. XXII.] It is to be known also that the mind of the good by how much harder things it tolerates for the truth, by so much more certainly it hopes for the rewards of eternity. Whence also it is fitly subjoined:

CHAPTER XIX.

VERSE 18.---And thou shalt have confidence, hope being set before thee.

36. He hopes so much more certainly in God, by how much harder things he suffers for Him.---For hope in God rises so much more solidly, as much as everyone shall have borne more heavy things for Him, because the joy of retribution is by no means gathered from eternity, which is not first sown here by pious tribulation. 356 For hence it is said through the Psalmist: Going, they went and wept, casting their seeds; but coming, they shall come in exultation, carrying their sheaves (Psal. CXXV, 6). Hence Paul says: If we die together, we shall also live together; if we sustain, we shall also reign together (II Tim. II, 11). Hence he admonishes the disciples, saying: Through many tribulations it behoves us to enter into the kingdom of God (Acts XIV, 21). Hence the angel indicating the glory of the saints to John, says: These are they who have come from great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb (Apoc. VII, 14). Because therefore it is sown now through tribulation, so that afterwards it may be reaped through the fruits of joy, so much greater confidence strengthens the mind, as much as stronger affliction for the truth straitens it. Whence it is fitly subjoined straightway:

CHAPTER XX.

IBID.---And having dug out, thou shalt sleep secure.

37. To the wicked present security brings labor, to the good present labor brings security.---For just as present security brings labor to the wicked, so present labor brings perpetual security to the good. Whence also he already knew himself, being dug out, to sleep secure, who was saying: For I am already being sacrificed, and the time of my dissolution is at hand; I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; for the rest there is laid up for me a crown of justice, which the Lord the just judge will render to me in that day (II Tim. IV, 6). For because he had fought without failing against passing evils, he was presuming without doubt concerning the remaining joys.

38. The rest and work of those free from earthly cares.---Although "dug out" can be understood also in another way. For often, being occupied with transitory things, we neglect to weigh through how great things we sin; but if, the eye of consideration being brought back, the heap of earthly thought is shaken out from the bosom of the heart, whatever was lying hidden in the mind is found. Whence holy men do not cease to search the hiding-places of souls, subtly searching themselves, they cast away the cares of earthly things, and, their thoughts being fully dug out, when they find themselves bitten by no guilt of crime, they rest as it were in the bed of the heart secure within themselves. They also desire to lie hidden from the acts of this world, they always consider their own things, and when they are by no means constrained by the thong of government, they refuse to judge those things which are another's. Being dug out therefore they sleep secure, because while they vigilantly penetrate their own internal things, they hide themselves from the laborious burdens of this world under the leisure of rest. Whence also it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER XXI.

VERSE 19.---Thou shalt rest, and there shall not be one who shall terrify thee.

39. One gasping after eternal things fears nothing from the world.---Whoever seeks present glory, certainly fears contempt. He who always gasps after gains, always forsooth dreads losses. For by the perception of which he is refreshed, by the loss of that thing no doubt he is also wounded; and by how much being bound he adheres to mutable and perishing things, by so much he lies far in the lowest things from the citadel of security. But on the contrary whoever is fixed in the sole desire of eternity, is neither raised by prosperity, nor shaken by adversity; while he has nothing in the world which he may desire, there is nothing which he may greatly fear from the world. For hence Solomon says: Whatever shall happen to the just, it shall not make him sad (Prov. XII, 21). Hence again he says: The just as a confident lion shall be without terror (Prov. XXVIII, 1). Well therefore is it now said: Thou shalt rest, and there shall not be one who shall terrify thee (Job XI, 19), because everyone so much more fully casts away from himself the fear which is from the world, by how much more truly in himself he overcomes the concupiscence of the world. Or had not 357 Paul rested without terror in the heart, who was saying: For I am certain that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor fortitude, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the charity of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord (Rom. VIII, 38)? The fortitude of whose charity indeed is praised by the true voice of the holy Church, when it is said through the Song of Songs (Cant. VIII, 6): Love is strong as death. For to the virtue of death love is compared, because no doubt the mind, which it shall have once taken, it kills thoroughly from the delight of the world; and it raises it so much more valiantly into authority, as much as it also renders it insensible against terrors. [Vet. XXIII.] But among these things it is to be known that when the wicked preach right things, it is very difficult that they should not break forth to that which they silently aim at. Whence also Zophar straightway subjoins:

CHAPTER XXII.

IBID.---And very many shall pray to thy face.

40. The upright do not aim to be seen as intercessors for others.---For neither do just men therefore keep themselves through the narrow paths of innocence, that they may be prayed to by others. But either heretics, or any perverse [men], through this that they live as if innocently among men, wish to be seen as intercessors for men; and when speaking they insinuate holy things, what they themselves aim at, this they promise to others for a great thing; and while they preach heavenly things, in their sudden promises they show what they love. But lest by promising earthly things they should for long be open as to what they are, they run back more quickly to words of rectitude. Whence it is soon subjoined.

CHAPTER XXIII

[Rec. XIII].

VERS. 20.---But the eyes of the wicked shall fail, and escape shall perish from them.

41. For the wicked there is some escape from misery here; after death, none.---That the power of intention is expressed by the name of the eyes, the Truth attests through the Gospel, saying: If thy eye be single, thy whole body shall be lightsome (Matth. VI, 22); because, namely, if a pure intention precedes our operation, however it may otherwise appear to men, yet the body of the following action is shown pure in the eyes of the internal Judge. The eyes of the wicked, therefore, are the intentions of carnal desires in them. Which therefore fail, because they neglect eternal things, and always look only for transitory things. For they think to obtain earthly glory, they long to be multiplied by temporal things, they tend daily to death by the course of sliding things; but they know not how to think of mortal things mortally. The life of the flesh fails by moments, and yet carnal desire grows. A thing possessed is shortened by an instant end, and the anxiety of having is not ended. But when death withdraws the wicked, their desires are surely terminated with life. Whose eyes, namely, then fail by heavenly vengeance, because they would not fail by their own judgment here from earthly delight. That these eyes of theirs were closed from their former pleasantness the Psalmist had beheld, when he said: In that day all their thoughts shall perish (Psal. CXLV, 4); because they both find eternal evils never thought of, and suddenly lose temporal goods which they held after long treatment. From whom also all escape perishes, because their malice finds not where it may be able to hide itself from the animadversion of the strict Judge. For now the iniquitous, when they suffer any sadness or adversities, find lurking-places of escape, because they run back straightway to the pleasure of carnal desires. For lest poverty should torture them, they soothe the mind with riches. Lest the contempt of neighbors should depress them, they exalt themselves with dignities. If the body is worn out by loathing, it is nourished by the diversities of feasts set before it. If the mind is cast down by any impulse of sadness, it is soon relieved through the soothing allurements of jests interposed. So many escapes, therefore, they have here, as they prepare delights for themselves. But sometime escape perishes to them, because their mind, having lost all things, beholds only itself and the Judge. Then pleasure is withdrawn, but the guilt of pleasure is kept, and suddenly the wretched learn by perishing because they held perishing things. Who yet as long as they live corporally do not cease to seek hurtful things. Whence it is yet subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIV.

IBID.---And their hope is the abomination of the soul.

42. What is pleasure to the iniquitous, this is punishment to the just. Whence the flesh is refreshed, thence the spirit fails.---What does the sinner here hope for with all his thoughts, except that he may surpass others in power, transcend all in the multiplicity of things, subject opponents by dominating them, become known as wonderful to those who obey, satisfy his wrath according to his wish, show himself benign when he is praised; whatever gluttony desires, he may offer; and to that which pleasure commands, he may run with the completion of work? Well, therefore, is their hope called the abomination of the soul, because those things which the carnal aim at, all the spiritual also by the judgment of rectitude are averse to. For what sinners estimate as pleasure, this the just without doubt think a punishment. [Vet. XXIV.] The hope of the wicked, therefore, is the abomination of the soul, because doubtless the spirit fails where the flesh rests. For as the flesh is nourished by soft things, so the soul by hard things: the former bland things refresh, the latter rough things exercise; the former is fed by delights, the latter is quickened by bitterness. And as hard things wound the flesh, so soft things kill the spirit; as laborious things destroy the former, so delectable things extinguish the latter. The hope of the carnal, therefore, is called the abomination of the soul, because thence the spirit perishes forever, whence for a time the flesh lives sweetly.

43. Indiscretion in the speaker often corrupts things rightly said.---But Zophar would say these things rightly, unless blessed Job had preached all things even more largely by living. But after he strives to warn the holier one about life, and endeavors to instruct the more learned one by the mastery of wisdom, he himself lightens the weight of his own words, who, by interposing indiscretion, destroys all that he speaks, because he pours the liquid of knowledge over a full vessel. For so the riches of knowledge are possessed by the indiscreet, as the riches of corporal substance are often possessed by fools. For some, who are supported by a multiplicity of earthly things, sometimes give much even to those who have, that they themselves may be seen to have these things more largely than all. So the perverse, when they know true things, speak certain right things even to the more upright; not that they may teach those who hear, but that they themselves may be known how much doctrine they possess. For they think that they precede all in wisdom, and therefore they think that they say nothing to anyone beyond the measures of their own greatness. So any perverse men, so all heretics, fear not to teach better men with a proud voice, because they think all to be inferior to themselves. [Vet. XXIV.] But holy Church recalls all the elated from the summit of their own estimation, and by the hand of discretion reforms them to the structure of equality. Whence blessed Job, who is a member of the same holy Church, seeing that the mind of his friends has swelled through the words of the instruction brought forth, immediately replied, saying:

CHAPTER XXV

[Vet. XXV].

CAP. XII, VERS. 2.---Are you then the only men, and shall wisdom die with you?

44. The fatuity of the proudly wise.---Whoever thinks that he precedes all in reason, what else does he exult in than that he is the only man? And it often happens that when the mind is led on high through tumor, it is raised up to the contempt of all and the admiration of itself. For in thought its own favors arise, and fatuity itself flatters itself about the singularity of wisdom. It weighs those things which it has heard, and the words which it brings forth; and it admires its own, it laughs at those of others. He, therefore, who estimates that he alone is wise, what else does he think than that this same wisdom will die with him? For that which he denies to be present in others, attributing it to himself alone, he surely shuts up within the times of his own brevity. But it must be considered with how great discretion the holy man uses, that the arrogance of his proud friends may be repressed, when he straightway adds:

CHAPTER XXVI.

VERS. 3.---And I have a heart, as well as you, and I am not inferior to you.

45. The arrogance of this one must be modestly repressed.---For who does not know how much the life and knowledge of blessed Job exceed the knowledge of his friends? But that he may correct their pride, he denies that he is inferior; and lest he should cross the limit of his own humility, he is silent about being superior: not by preferring himself, but by comparing himself, he indicates what those who are far unequal to him may learn from him, so that while the wisdom which is eminent is spontaneously bent, the knowledge which lies low may by no means raise itself against its powers. Whom he well recalls soon to the sense of equality, because he weighs it as great to swell as if with the singularity of greatness, when he subsequently adds:

CHAPTER XXVII.

IBID.---For who is ignorant of these things which you know?

46. By showing that those things which he glories in knowing are ignorant to no one.---As if he should openly say: Since those things which you say are known to all, why do you uniquely swell concerning the knowledge of the things said? Because, therefore, recalling the elation of the arrogant to the communion of equality, he refuted them with perfect correction, he now breaks out into the sentences of doctrine, so that his friends, being humbled, might first learn the weights of truth before they reverently heard. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVIII

[Vet. XXVI, Rec. XV].

VERS. 4.---He that is derided by his friend as I am, shall invoke God, and he will hear him.

47. How praise hurts and derision helps one who acts rightly. Derision helps where there is no merit of fault.---Often a weak mind, when it is received by the air of human favor for its good actions, is derived to exterior joys, so that it postpones what it desires within, and lies loosened willingly in that which it hears without; so that it rejoices not so much that it is blessed as that it is called so. And when it gapes for the voices of its own praise, it leaves what it had begun to be. Thence, therefore, it is disjoined from God, whence it seemed laudable in God. But sometimes the mind constantly leans upon a right work, and yet is urged by human derisions: it does wonderful things, and receives reproaches; and he who was able to go forth through praises, being repulsed by contumelies, returns to himself; and he solidifies himself the more robustly within in God, as he finds not without where he may rest. For all hope is fixed in the Author, and among the insults of derisions the internal witness alone is implored; and the mind of the afflicted becomes so much closer to God, as it is alien from the grace of human favor:

it is straightway poured forth in prayer, and being pressed externally, it is more purely refined to penetrate those things which are within. Well, therefore, is it now said: He that is derided by his friend as I am, shall invoke God, and he will hear him, because while the perverse reproach the mind of the good, they show whom they should seek as a witness of their acts. Which, while being compunct it girds itself in prayers, is joined thence within to the heavenly hearing, whence it is separated without from human praise. [Vet. XXVII.] But it must be noted how providently is interposed As I am, because there are some whom also human derisions depress, and yet they are not exaudible to divine ears. For when derision is born against a fault, surely no merit of virtue is generated in the derision. For the priests of Baal, imploring him with clamorous voices, had been derided by Elijah, when he said: Cry with a louder voice, for he is a God, and perhaps he is talking, or is in an inn (III Kings XVIII, 27). But this derision was not for them to the use of virtue, because it came through the merit of a fault. Providently, therefore, is it now said: He that is derided by his friend, as I am, shall invoke God, and he will hear him, because human derision makes him close to God, whom innocence of life keeps alien from human perversities. It follows:

CHAPTER XXIX

[Rec. XVI].

IBID.---For the simplicity of the just man is derided.

48. What is the wisdom of this world. What is the wisdom of the just. Why it is laughed at by the world.---The wisdom of this world is to cover the heart with machinations, to veil sense with words, to show things which are false as true, to demonstrate things which are true as fallacious. This prudence, forsooth, is known by use to the young, this is learned by a price by boys; those who know it, being proud, despise others; those who know it not, being subject and timid, admire it in others, because by them this same duplicity of iniquity, cloaked with a name, is loved, while perversity of mind is called urbanity. This commands those who obey it to seek the summits of honors, to rejoice in the vanity of temporal glory attained, to return in a more multiplied way the evils inflicted by others, to yield to none who resist when forces are at hand, and when the possibility of virtue is lacking, whatever it is not able to fulfill through malice, to simulate this in peaceful goodness. But on the contrary, the wisdom of the just is to feign nothing by ostentation, to open the sense with words, to love true things as they are, to avoid false things, to exhibit good things freely, to tolerate evil things more willingly than to do them; to seek no vengeance for injury, to think contumely for the truth as gain. But this simplicity of the just is derided, because by the wise of this world the virtue of purity is believed to be fatuity. For everything that is acted innocently is without doubt thought foolish by them; and whatever truth approves in work, sounds fatuous to carnal wisdom. For what seems more foolish to the world than to show the mind with words, to simulate nothing by a cunning machination, to return no contumelies for injuries, to pray for those who speak evil, to seek poverty, to leave things possessed, not to resist him who takes away, to offer the other cheek to him who strikes? Whence well to the lovers of this world that eminent wise man of God says: We will sacrifice the abominations of the Egyptians to the Lord our God (Exod. VIII, 26). For the Egyptians disdain to eat sheep; but what the Egyptians abominate, this the Israelites offer to God, because the simplicity of conscience, which all the unjust despise as if lowest and abject, this the just turn into a sacrifice of virtue; and the upright, cultivating purity and gentleness, sacrifice to God what the reprobate, abominating it, think fatuity. Which simplicity of the just, namely, is briefly but sufficiently expressed, when it is straightway subjoined.

[Vet. XXVIII, Rec. XVII].

VERS. 5.---A lamp despised in the thoughts of the rich.

49. That the possession of riches is not in crime, but cupidity.---What is signaled in this place by the name of the rich, except the elation of the proud, who have no regard for the coming Judge, while they swell with proud thoughts in themselves? For there are some whom wealth does not lift up through tumor, but exalts through works of mercy. And there are some who, while they behold themselves to abound in earthly riches, do not seek the true riches of God, and do not love the eternal country, because they think this to suffice for them, that they are supported by temporal things. Census is not, therefore, in crime, but affect. For all things which God created are good; but he who uses good things badly surely acts so that, as if through the gluttony of edacity, he dies by that bread through which he ought to live. Poor Lazarus had come to rest, but the proud rich man the torments were torturing (Luke XVI, 26). But yet rich had been Abraham, who was holding Lazarus in his bosom; who yet communing with his Author, says: I will speak to my Lord, since I am dust and ashes (Gen. XVIII, 27). What therefore did he know to estimate his riches, who weighed himself as dust and ashes? Or when would things possessed extol him, who felt such abject things of himself also, namely, the possessor of them?

50. Those are to be accounted rich who are in need, and swell with pride. To these the contemners of the world are for contempt.--- And again there are some to whom also earthly things are not supplied, and yet in themselves they are raised up through the pride of tumor. These census by no means conveys to the ostentation of power, and yet the protervity of manners adjudges them among the reprobate rich. Whomever therefore the love of the following life does not humble, in this place the sacred speech calls rich, because also in the vengeance of judgment they do not differ whether they swell with things or with manners alone. Who when they behold the life of the simple in this world humble and abject; they straightway laugh with elated contempts. For they by no means consider that to be present to them exteriorly, for which they themselves pant with all endeavors. They despise therefore as if fools those who namely have not those things which they surely either by having, or only by loving, die; and they depute as if dead those whom they by no means weigh to live carnally with them. For he who dies from the appetite of this world, by earthly minds is surely estimated extinguished in every way. Which well the miracle of our Redeemer signals, when he liberates a man from an unclean spirit, concerning whom namely it is written: Crying out, and greatly tearing him, he went out of him; and he became as dead, so that many said that he is dead. But Jesus taking him by the hand, lifted him up, and he arose (Mark IX, 25). For he is shown as if dead who is liberated from the power of the malignant spirit, because whoever now subdues earthly desires, extinguishes the life of carnal conversation in himself; and he appears dead to the world, because he lacks the perverse possessor, who was driving him through unclean desires. Whom many call dead, because those who know not how to live spiritually think him who does not follow carnal goods to be utterly extinguished.

[Vet. XXIX.] 51. The just, without light in the eyes of the carnal, burn and shine before God.--- But because these deriders of the simple are also themselves accounted by the name of Christianity, being pressed by the reverence of religion, they are ashamed to exhibit the evil of public derision. Whence it happens that being tumid and silent they deride among themselves those whom they think very abject and lowest through simplicity. Well therefore is it said: A lamp despised in the thoughts of the rich, because all the proud, while they know not how to weigh following goods, as we said above, estimate as almost nothing him whom they see not to have what they love. For it often happens that every elect, who is led to eternal happiness, is depressed here by continual adversity, the abundance of things does not support him, the glory of dignities does not show him honorable, no frequency of those obeying him is supplied to him, no pomp of garments composes him to human eyes; but he is seen as despicable by all, and is estimated unworthy of the grace of this world. But yet before the eyes of the occult Judge he flashes with virtues, he shines with the merits of life, he fears to be honored, he does not fly from being despised; he affects the body with continence, he grows fat in the soul with love alone, he always prepares the mind for patience, and being erect for justice, he exults concerning the contumelies received, he compassions the afflicted from the heart, he rejoices concerning the prosperities of the good as if concerning his own, he solicitously ruminates the foods of the sacred word in the mind, and being inquired he is doubly ignorant to speak anything. Well therefore the simplicity of the just is said both to be a lamp, and despised. A lamp, because it shines interiorly; despised, because it does not shine exteriorly. Within burns the flame of charity, without no glory of beauty resplends. He shines therefore and is despised who, flaming with virtues, is estimated abject. For the minds of the carnal are not able to weigh goods, except those which they see carnally. Hence it is that David the holy his father himself had despised, whom he refused to present to the eyes of the prophet Samuel. Who when he had led seven sons to the grace of unction, being inquired by the prophet whether he had filled the number of offspring, with great desperation replied: There is a little boy who feeds the sheep (I Kings XVI, 10, 11). Who being led and elected, he straightway heard: Man sees in the face, but God searches the heart (Ibid., 7). A lamp therefore David had been through innocence; but yet greatly despised, because he did not shine to those beholding exterior things. But it must be known that every just man either has not temporal glory, or breaks it under himself, if he has it, that he may stand out free for his own honor, lest being conquered by delight he should succumb to it. For hence it is that that eminent preacher had humbled the glory of his apostolate before human eyes, who said: We have not used this power, when we might have been a burden as the apostles of Christ, but we became little ones in the midst of you (I Thess. II, 7). But to his auditors surely the tumor of the rich had still remained in the heart, when they said: The epistles are weighty and strong, but the presence of the body weak, and the speech contemptible (II Cor. X, 10). For him whom they had known to be able to say such things, they judged not to be able to live commonly with them. And when they saw him both humble in living, and weighed him high in speech, their elation compelled them that him whom they had feared through writings they should despise through the words of his presence. What therefore was Paul, except a despised lamp in the thoughts of the rich, who whence he exhibited the mastery of humility, thence from the rude disciples he received the contumelies of pride? For in a horrendous way the languor of the proud increased whence it ought to have detumesced, while the elated mind of the carnal repelled as if disdainable this which the master showed as imitable. Or was he not a despised lamp, who, flashing with so many virtues, tolerated so many adversities from persecutors (Ephes. VI, 20)? He performs a legation in a chain, and his bonds are made manifest in every pretorium, he is beaten with rods, and is urged by many dangers from his race, from the gentiles (Philip. I, 13), he is pounded with stones at Lystra, he is dragged by the feet outside the city, because he is estimated extinguished (II Cor. XI, 26). But how long is this lamp despised? How long is it held despicable? Does it by no means exert its brightness, and never show with how great clarity it glows? It shows plainly. For when it was said a lamp despised in the thoughts of the rich, it is straightway added:

CHAPTER XXXI.

IBID.---Prepared for the set time.

52. The just here spurned will shine in the day of judgment.---The set time of the despised lamp is surely the predestined day of the extreme judgment, in which every just man, who is now despised, is shown with how great power he shines. [Vet. XXX.] For then judges come with God, who now are unjustly judged for God. Then their light flashes so much more widely, as the hand of the persecuting now narrows them more harshly. Then to the eyes of the reprobate it will lie open that those are supported by heavenly power who spontaneously left all earthly things. Whence to his elect the Truth says: You who have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the seat of his majesty, you also shall sit on twelve seats, judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matth. XIX, 28). For neither will that court of the internal session not have more than twelve judges; but doubtless in the duodenary number the quantity of the university is expressed, because whoever, excited by the stimulus of divine love, has left things possessed here, there without doubt will obtain the summit of judiciary power, so that the judge may come then together with the Judge, who now chastises himself with spontaneous poverty by the consideration of judgment. For hence it is that concerning the spouse of holy Church it is said through Solomon: Her husband is noble in the gates, when he shall sit with the senators of the earth (Prov. XXXI, 23). Hence Isaiah says: The Lord will come to judgment with the ancients of his people (Isai. III, 14). Hence the Truth announces those same ancients no longer as servants, but as friends, saying: I will no longer call you servants, but my friends (John XV, 15). Whom namely the Psalmist beholding, says: But to me thy friends are made exceedingly honorable, O God (Psal. CXXXVIII, 17). Whose highness of heart while he beheld, he straightway added the glory of the world which they would tread with the heel: Their principality is exceedingly strengthened. And lest we should believe them to be few, whom we recognize to profit as far as the sum of so great perfection, he immediately added: I will number them, and they shall be multiplied above the sand. As many therefore as now spontaneously humble themselves for the love of truth, so many lamps then flash in judgment. Let it be said therefore rightly: A lamp despised in the thoughts of the rich, prepared for the set time, because the soul of each just man is despised as if abject when living below it has not glory, but it is seen as admirable while it shines from above.

53. Christ the lamp here despised.---It is pleasing among these things to lift up the eyes of the mind to the ways of the Redeemer, and gradually to come from the members to the head. For he himself truly stood out as a lamp to us, who, dying on the cross for our redemption, poured light through the wood to our dark minds. By this lamp John had beheld us to be illuminated, when he said: He was the true light which illuminates every man coming into this world (John I, 9). Which yet he saw despised in the thoughts of the rich, when a little after he subjoined: He came into his own and his own received him not (Ibid., 11). Herod wished to explore the flames of this lamp, when he desired to see his miracles, as it is written: For he was for a long time desiring to see him, because he had heard many things of him, and he hoped to see some sign done by him (Luke XXIII, 8). But this lamp flashed with no ray of light before his eyes, because to him who had sought him not piously but curiously he showed nothing wonderful of himself. For the Redeemer being inquired was silent, being expected he despised to exhibit miracles, and retaining himself within in occult things, those whom he found to seek exterior things, he left ungrateful without: rather choosing to be openly despised by the proud, than to be praised by the non-believing with a void voice. Whence also straightway this lamp was despised, as it is subjoined there: But Herod with his army despised him, and mocked him put in a white garment (Ibid. 11).

[Vet. XXXI.] 54. In the last day it will flash forth.---But the despised lamp, which on earth endures mockeries, flashes judgment from heaven. Whence here it is aptly subjoined: Prepared for the set time. Concerning which time namely He says through the Psalmist: When I shall have received the time, I will judge justices (Psal. LXXIV, 3). Hence in the Gospel the Truth announces through itself, saying: My time has not yet come (John VII, 6). Hence Peter says: Whom heaven must receive, until the times of restitution (Acts III, 21). The lamp therefore which is now despised is prepared to come at the set time, because He Himself judges sins in the last day, who now bears the derisions of sinners. And so much more harshly does He then exert strictness (districtionem), as He now more gently spreads out His patience to the sinners who are to be called. For He who long awaits those to be converted, tortures the unconverted without retractation. Which namely He briefly hints through the prophet, saying: I have been silent, I have always been still, I have been patient, I will speak as a woman in travail (Isai. XLII, 14). For as we have already said, she that is in travail casts out with pain that which she has carried within for a long time. He therefore who has always been silent speaks as a woman in travail, because the Judge who is to come, who for a long time has borne the deeds of men without vengeance, at some time with the fervor of the examination, as if with pain of mind, shows how great a sentence of animadversion (animadversionis) He has kept within. Let no one therefore despise this lamp while it is hidden, lest it burn up its contemners when it shall have flashed from heaven. For to whom it does not now burn for pardon, then without doubt it will burn for punishment. Since therefore through heavenly grace we receive a time of vocation, while license still remains, let us flee the wrath of Him who is everywhere, by changing our ways for the better. For surely that animadversion does not find him whom correction hides.

55. Let it suffice that we, the Lord granting it, have now run through these things in two volumes (corporibus). For because we cannot compendiously explain the following parts of the sacred book, extended by the virtues of mysteries, it is necessary that we reserve them for other volumes, so that the reader may return so much more fervent to the study of reading, as he breathes again from the interruption of the reading.

THIRD PART, CONSISTING OF SIX BOOKS.

BOOK ELEVEN.

In which the twelfth chapter, from the sixth verse, the thirteenth, and the first four verses of the fourteenth, the style being changed for a while, are explained.

CHAPTER I.

1. What things are to be explained in this whole third part and in what style.---Although in a prolix work the mutability of style ought not to be blameworthy, yet lest any one should reprove me for the change of my speech, in the letter prefixed to the books I have given the reason why I have brought the third part of this work to the likeness of the others by minimal emending. Which being excluded, this also is added, that from that verse in which it is said: The tabernacles of robbers abound, the exposition of the same part begins, and reaches by discoursing as far as that which is written: Their sweetness is a worm. Which surely are so many, that they could not be comprehended in one volume (corpore), unless they were spoken under great brevity. He therefore who is free from other acts, let him read the other things spoken manifoldly. But to him who is not free to read studiously, let the brevity of this part please him, in which we do not so much say what we feel as we sign those things which are to be said. Therefore since in it many things, as they were taken down while I was speaking, so I have left them, my reader, receive with equanimity the change of style, because even to those eating the same foods, diversity of cooking is pleasing. But as often as you take the single parts to read, study to bring back always to memory that origin of the cause which I proposed, because both through blessed Job, who is called grieving, the passions of the Lord and of His body, that is, holy Church, are designated, and his friends hold the figure of heretics, who, as we have already often said (Chiefly Pref., c. 6, n. 15), while they strive to defend God, offend Him. Who while they consult feignedly, strongly afflict the mind of the holy; yet they do not fall away from the knowledge of truth through all things which they speak, but for the most part they mingle prudence with foolish things, and true things with feigned ones, so that while they arrogate something from truth, they easily draw to falsehood. Whence the friends also of blessed Job sometimes speak despicable things, sometimes wonderful ones; which yet the holy man sometimes convicts by reproving, sometimes indeed receives by approving, and draws to the use of rectitude even those things which are brought forth by them right, but not rightly. Therefore despising those who despise his poverty, and being placed in body on the dunghill, he shows in how great a summit of virtues he sits within himself, when he mentions that the riches of the present life are nothing, which he relates to abound even to the reprobate, saying:

CHAPTER II

[Vet. I, Rec. II].

CHAP. 12, VERS. 6.---The tabernacles of robbers abound, and they boldly provoke God, when He Himself has given all things into their hands.

2. How great a contempt of riches shines forth in Job.---It is easy for a man then to despise riches, when he has them; but it is difficult to esteem them as vile when he has them not. Whence it is patently shown how great a contempt of earthly things there was in the thought of blessed Job, who then says that those things which abound to the reprobate are nothing, when he has lost all. He says therefore: The tabernacles of robbers abound, and they boldly provoke God, because for the most part the wicked are so much more proud against God, as they are enriched by His largess and against merit; and they who ought to have been provoked by goods to better things, become worse by gifts.

3. What things the wicked do unjustly, God justly permits to be done.---But we must understand how they are called robbers, while it is straightway subjoined: When He Himself has given all things into their hands. For if they are robbers, they have taken away violently, and there is no doubt that God is not the helper of the violent. How therefore does He Himself give what these who are robbers wickedly take away? But it must be known that it is one thing which almighty God mercifully bestows, and another thing which being angry He suffers to be had. For what robbers do perversely, this the most equitable Dispenser permits to be done only justly; so that both he who is suffered to seize, being blinded in mind, may increase his fault, and he who suffers the rapine may now be struck in the loss of the same rapine for another fault than he perpetrated before. For behold, a certain one being placed in the throat of a mountain lies in wait for travelers; but he who makes the journey perhaps perpetrated some unjust things at some time, and almighty God retributing his evil to him in the present life, and delivering him into the hands of the waylayer, permits him either to be spoiled of his things, or even to be slain. What therefore the robber unjustly desired, this the most equitable Judge justly permitted to be done; so that both that one might receive what he had unjustly done, and this one might be struck more heavily at some time, through whose most wicked will almighty God justly vindicated the fault upon the other. He is purged who is oppressed; in this one the guilt is increased, who oppresses, so that either from the depth of wickedness he may return at some time to penitence, or not returning he may be struck so much more heavily by eternal damnation, as he has been long tolerated in his iniquity. With that one therefore it is dealt mercifully that he may end sin, with this one strictly that he may multiply it, unless he runs back to penitence. In that one evils are purged while he sustains violence, in this one they are heaped up while he does it. Almighty God therefore justly permits to be done what He prohibits to be done, so that whence He now expects, and long tolerates the unconverted, thence He may at some time strike more. Well therefore it is said: The tabernacles of robbers abound, and they boldly provoke God, when He Himself has given all things into their hands, because what the iniquitous take away, He Himself gives this to them, who could have resisted them in rapine, if He had willed to have mercy.

[Vet. II.] 4. They are robbers who are proud of the gifts conferred on them by God.---Which yet can be understood of spiritual things also. For for the most part some receive gifts of doctrine, but they swell from the same gifts, and wish to seem great before others. And to provoke almighty God is to be proud concerning His gifts among neighbors. Who also are not undeservedly called robbers, because while they speak what they do not do, they take the words of the just into the use of their speech. But because heavenly grace bestows these same words on them, whose life yet it leaves in depraved manners, through themselves indeed they are robbers, but yet they have received the good things which they have from God. It follows: VERS. 7 and 8.---Doubtless ask the beasts, and they shall teach thee; the fowls of the air, and they shall indicate to thee. Speak to the earth, and it shall answer thee, and the fishes of the sea shall tell.

CHAPTER III.

5. What is signified by the beasts and the fowls of the air, what by the earth and the fishes of the sea.---What ought we to understand by the beasts, but the slow of sense? What by the fowls of the air, but those wise in high and sublime things? Concerning the beasts namely, that is, the slow of sense, it is written: Thy animals shall dwell therein (Psal. LXVII, 11). And because those wise in sublime things fly away in the words of our Redeemer, it is written: So that the birds of the air come, and dwell in the branches thereof (Matth. XIII, 32). But what by the earth, but those wise in earthly things? Whence also it was said to the first man deserting heavenly things: Earth thou art, and unto earth thou shalt go (Gen. III, 19). What by the fishes of the sea ought we to receive, but the curious of this world? Of whom the Psalmist says: The fishes of the sea, that pass through the paths of the sea (Psal. VIII, 9). Who in great inquisitions of things lie hidden as if in secret waves. But what all these things being inquired teach, he joins, saying:

CHAPTER IV.

VERS. 9.---Who is ignorant that the hand of the Lord hath made all these things?

6. All things preach God as the creator of all.---As if he should say openly: Whether you require those slower of sense, or those wise in sublime things, or those given to earthly acts, or those occupied in the inquisitions of this world, all these confess God as the creator of all, and they feel concordantly concerning His power, although they do not live concordantly under it. For what every just man speaks even by living, this the unjust man for the most part is compelled to confess concerning God even by voice alone; and it comes to pass that the wicked serve the Author of all by attestation, whom they resist by works, because Him whom they have dared to impugn by manners, they cannot deny as the creator of all. Which yet can be understood usefully even according to the sole appearance of the letter, because every creature being respected gives as it were a voice of its own attestation, by that very appearance which it has. We require the beasts, or the fowls, the earth, or the fishes, while we consider those things which respond to us concordantly, that the Lord has made all things; because while they present their appearances to our eyes, they testify that they are not from themselves. For by that very fact that they are created, through the appearance shown they render as it were a voice of confession to their Creator, who, because He established all things, disposed also how they ought to be administered. Whence it is subjoined:

CHAPTER V

[Vet. and Rec. III].

VERS. 10.---In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the spirit of all flesh of man.

7. He who granted to be what was not, provided how that which now exists should be. The spirit of man is understood in two ways.---By the hand namely power is expressed. The soul therefore of every living thing, and the spirit of all flesh of man, is in His power from whom it is; that He Himself may provide how it should be, who granted it to be what it was not. The life of beasts indeed can be signified by the soul of every living thing. For almighty God vivifies the soul of beasts as far as the bodily senses, but He extends the spirit of men as far as spiritual intellect. In His hand therefore is the soul of every living thing, and the spirit of all flesh of man, while both in that one He grants this to the soul that it may vivify the flesh, and in this one He vivifies the soul to this end, that it may arrive at understanding eternity. But it must be known that in sacred eloquence the spirit of man is accustomed to be put in two ways. For sometimes spirit is put for the soul, sometimes for a spiritual effect. For spirit is said for the soul, as it is written of our Head Himself: Bowing His head, He gave up the spirit (John XIX, 30). For if the evangelist had called the spirit something other than the soul, surely the spirit going out, the soul would have remained. Spirit is also said for a spiritual effect, as it is written: Who makest Thy angels spirits, and Thy ministers a burning fire (Psal. CIII, 4). For angels, that is, messengers, in sacred eloquence are sometimes called preachers, as it is said through the prophet:

The lips of the priest keep knowledge, and they seek the law from his mouth, because he is the angel of the Lord of hosts (Mal. II, 7). Almighty God therefore makes His angels spirits, because He makes His preachers spiritual. But in this place, if the soul of every living thing is signified as the life of the body itself, by the spirit of all flesh of man the effect of spiritual intelligence is expressed. It follows:

[Rec. IV].

VERS. 11.---Doth not the ear judge words, and the throat of him that eateth the taste?

8. How diverse are the gifts and modes of inhabitation of one and the same Wisdom.--- It is hidden from almost no one that the five senses of our body, namely sight, hearing, taste, smell, and touch, in all that they feel and discern, draw the virtue of discretion and sense from the brain. And while the sense of the brain is the one judge which presides within, yet it discerns the five senses through their own passages, God working wonderfully, so that neither the eye hears, nor the ear sees, nor the mouth smells, nor the nostrils taste, nor the hands smell. And while all things are disposed through one sense of the brain, yet any of these senses cannot do other than that which it received from the disposition of the Creator. From these bodily and exterior things, therefore, interior and spiritual things are to be collected, that through that which is public in us we ought to pass to the secret which is in us and is hidden from ourselves. [Vet. IV.] It must be considered namely that while Wisdom is one, she inhabits one less, another more; she grants this to one, that to another, and, as if after the manner of the brain, she uses ourselves as if for certain senses, so that although she is never unlike herself, yet through us she always works diverse and dissimilar things, to the end that this one may receive the gift of wisdom, that one the gift of knowledge; this one kinds of tongues, that one the grace of healings.

9. The reprobate only hear the words of wisdom, the elect also taste them.---But in these words in which blessed Job says: The ear judges words, and the throat of him that eateth, the taste, he seems also to hint something concerning the elect and the reprobate, because the words of wisdom, which the reprobate hear, the elect not only hear, but also taste, so that that may taste in their heart which sounds not to the minds, but only to the ears of the reprobate. For it is one thing only to hear of a food named, but another thing also to taste it. The elect therefore so hear the food of wisdom, that they taste it, because this which they hear tastes to them inwardly through love. But the knowledge of the reprobate is extended as far as the cognition of the sound, so that they indeed hear virtues, but yet with a cold heart they are ignorant of how they taste. By which words namely blessed Job reproves the unskillfulness of his friends, and the arrogance of those who are puffed up concerning the doctrine of wisdom, because it is one thing to know something of God, but another thing to taste this which is known with the throat of intelligence. Rightly therefore it is said: Doth not the ear judge words, and the throat of him that eateth, the taste? As if it were said openly to the arrogant: The words of doctrine, which come as far as the ear to you, touch the throats of intelligence to me also through an intimate taste. But because weak age, even when it is rightly wise, ought not to leap forth incautiously to preaching, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER VII.

VERS. 12.---In the ancient is wisdom, and in length of days prudence. 10. Wisdom is confirmed by the use of living and by experience.---For those sayings are solidified in the root of wisdom, which through the use of living also grow strong by the experiment of acts. But because to many both a longer life is granted, and the grace of wisdom is not conferred, it is rightly still shown in whose judgment those same gifts depend, while it is subjoined:

CHAPTER VIII.

VERS. 13.---With him is wisdom and strength; he hath counsel and understanding.

11. Christ is the wisdom and strength of God.---These things we receive not incongruously concerning the Only-begotten of the supreme Father, so that we may perceive him to be the wisdom and strength of God. For Paul also bears witness to our understanding, saying: Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:24); who is always with him, because in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God (John 1:1). Moreover, God hath counsel and understanding: counsel, namely, because he disposes his own things; understanding, because he knows ours. [Vet. V.] Also, by the name of counsel, the very delay of hidden judgment may be signified, so that the fact that he sometimes strikes delinquents more slowly is not because the fault of the wicked is not seen, but so that the sentence of their damnation, which is deferred for the sake of doing penance, may seem to proceed as if slowly from counsel. What, therefore, is sometimes indicated outwardly by an open sentence, this was hidden in counsel with the Almighty Lord before the ages. It follows:

CHAPTER IX

VERS. 14.---If he break down, there is none that can build up; if he shut up a man, there is none that can open.

12. God destroys the human mind by receding from it. He who acts evilly makes a prison for himself in his conscience.---Almighty God destroys the human heart when he leaves it, he builds it up while he fills it. For he does not destroy the human mind by fighting against it, but by receding, because it is sufficient for its own perdition when left to itself. Whence it often happens that when the heart of the listener is not filled by the grace of Almighty God because of the exigency of faults, he is admonished in vain from without by the preacher, because every mouth that speaks is mute, if he who inspires the words that are heard does not cry out within in the heart. Hence the Prophet says: Unless the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it (Psal. 126:1). Hence Solomon says: Consider the works of God, that no man can correct whom he hath despised (Eccl. 7:14). Nor is it a wonder if the preacher is heard very little by a reprobate heart, while sometimes the Lord himself is also impugned in those things which he speaks by the morals of those resisting. For hence it is that Cain could be admonished even by the divine voice, and could not be changed, because the fault of malice demanding it, God had already left the heart within, to which he spoke words without for a testimony. But it is well added: If he shut up a man, there is none that can open. Because every man, through that which he acts evilly, what else does he make for himself but a prison of his own conscience, so that the guilt of his mind may press upon him, even if no one accuses him from without? Who, when he is left, God judging him, in the blindness of his malice, is as it were shut up within himself, lest he find a place of escaping, which he by no means deserves to find. For often some desire to go out from depraved acts; but because they are pressed by the weight of the same acts, shut up in the prison of evil habit, they cannot go out from themselves. And some, desiring to punish their own faults, turn that which they think they act rightly into more grievous faults; and it happens in a miserable way that what they think an exit, this they find an inclusion. Thus, namely, the reprobate Judas (Matth. 27:5), when he brought death upon himself against sin, came to the punishments of eternal death, and repented worse of the sin than he had sinned.

13. No one resists God calling, no one meets him leaving.---Let it be said, therefore: If he shut up a man, there is none that can open, because as no one resists the largess of him calling, so no one meets the justice of him leaving. To shut up, therefore, is of God not to open to those shut. Whence also it is said to Moses concerning Pharaoh: I will harden his heart (Exod. 4:21; 7:3). For God is said to harden through justice, when he does not soften a reprobate heart through grace. He shuts up, therefore, the man whom he leaves in the darkness of his own works. [Vet. VI.] For Isaac wished, as it were, to open this inclusion to his first-born son, when he endeavored to prefer him to his brother by blessing him (Gen. 27:5). But the son whom the father wished, the Lord reprobated, and whom the Lord wished, the father also blessed even against his will (Ibid., 25:34), so that he who had already sold his birthright to his brother for food should not receive the blessing of the first-born, which he had left from the greed of his belly: who, seeking earthly things, following fleeting things, desiring to inherit the blessing, was reprobated. For he found no place of repentance, although he had sought it with tears, because namely those lamentations have no fruit, which study to desire with groaning things about to perish. Isaac, therefore, could not open even to his son, whom Almighty God by a just judgment shut up in the prison of his malice. It follows:

[Rec. VI].

VERS. 15.---If he withhold the waters, all things dry up; if he send them forth, they subvert the earth.

14. When preaching or grace is withdrawn, the heart withers.---If by water is understood the knowledge of preaching, as it is written: Deep water are the words from the mouth of a man, and a bubbling brook is the fountain of wisdom (Prov. 18:4), when the water is withheld, all things dry up; because if the knowledge of preachers is withdrawn, the hearts of those who could have flourished in eternal hope immediately wither away; so that they remain in a desperate dryness, while, loving fleeting things, they know not how to hope for those that remain. But if by the name of water the grace of the Holy Spirit is designated, as it is said by the voice of the Truth in the Gospel: He that believeth in me, as the Scripture saith, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water (John 7:38, 39); where the evangelist immediately added: But this he spake of the Spirit, whom they that believe in him should receive; a suitable understanding is evident in these words, by which he says: If he withhold the waters, all things dry up, because if the grace of the Holy Spirit is withdrawn from the mind of the hearer, the understanding immediately withers, which already through hope seemed to flourish in the hearer. Moreover, that he mentions not water, but waters, by the name of plurality, he recurs to the sevenfold grace of spiritual gifts, because each one is as it were poured upon by as many waters as the gifts with which he is filled. Concerning which it is fitly subjoined: If he send them forth, they subvert the earth.

15. When grace breathes upon it, the heart that savors of earthly things is subverted and changed.---For what is understood by earth, but the sinner, to whom it was said by sentence: Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return (Gen. 3:19)? The earth, therefore, remains immovable, when the sinner contemns to obey the lordly precepts; when he raises the neck of pride, and closes the eyes of the mind from the light of truth. But because it is written: His feet stood, and the earth was moved (Habak. 3:6, according to the LXX), because when truth is fixed in the heart, the immobility of the mind is shaken, if the grace of the Holy Spirit is poured in by a heavenly gift according to the voice of the preacher, immediately the earth is subverted, because the hardness of the sinful mind is changed from the obstinacy of its own immobility 372, so that afterwards it subjects itself to the lordly precepts by weeping, as much as by being proud it formerly raised the neck of the heart against the Lord. For you may see that the earth of the human heart, when the water of the divine gift is poured in, afterwards willingly bears injuries, which before it vehemently inflicted; afterwards it even gives its own things, which before it snatched even the things of others; afterwards it torments the flesh by abstaining, which before flowed down through the deadly delights of baseness by the satiety of the flesh; afterwards it even loves its persecutors, which before was unwilling to love even those loving itself. [Vet. VII.] When therefore the human mind, poured upon by a divine gift, begins to act against that which it was accustomed to do, the earth is subverted, because that which before was eminent is sent downwards, and the face which before was pressed into the depths is raised upwards.

16. This shines forth wonderfully in the converted Paul.---It is pleasing, as an example of this matter, to call Paul from among the many to the midst; who, when he was going to Damascus, having received letters against Christ, being poured upon by the grace of the Holy Spirit on the way, was immediately changed from that cruelty of his; and afterwards he received stripes for Christ, which he was coming to inflict upon Christians; and he who before, living carnally, endeavored to deliver the saints of the Lord to death, afterwards rejoices to offer the sacrifice of his own flesh for the life of the saints (1 Tim. 1:13). Those cold thoughts of his cruelty were turned into the ardor of piety; and he who before was a blasphemer and a persecutor, afterwards became a humble and pious preacher (Acts 9:1). He who thought it the greatest gain to kill Christ in his disciples, now esteems his own life to be Christ, and to die to be gain (Phil. 1:21). The water, therefore, being sent forth, the earth was subverted, because Paul's mind, as soon as it received the grace of the Holy Spirit, changed the state of its own immobility and cruelty. On the contrary, the Lord complains through the prophet against Ephraim, saying: Ephraim is become bread baked under the ashes, which is not turned (Hosea 7:8). For bread baked under the ashes, carrying ashes upon itself, presses the cleaner part downwards, and has the upper part so much the filthier as it tolerates the ashes upon it. What else does the mind that thinks on earthly things carry upon itself but a mass of ashes? But if it wishes to be turned, it brings back to the top the clean face which it had pressed downwards, when it has shaken off the ashes which it was carrying. If, therefore, we shake off from the mind the ashes of earthly thoughts, we as it were turn the bread baked under the ashes, so that that intention of ours should now be postponed, which before the ash of the lowest thought was pressing down; and the clean face should come to the higher things, so that our right intention may no longer be pressed down by the mass of earthly desire. Which we can by no means do, unless we are poured upon by the grace of the Holy Spirit, because namely, if Almighty God sends forth the waters, they subvert the earth. It follows:

CHAPTER XI

[Vet. VIII].

VERS. 16.---With him is strength and wisdom.

17. In the judgment the reprobate will be condemned before the elect are gifted with glory.---It had been said a little above: With him is wisdom and strength; but now it is said: With him is strength and wisdom. For because Almighty God, when by the mystery of his piety he was made man, first brought forth the doctrine of gentleness, and afterwards in the judgment shows of how great strength he is, rightly above is wisdom mentioned before strength, when it is said of the Only-begotten of the Father 373: With him is wisdom and strength. But because, coming to judge, he will appear in the terror of his power, and, the reprobate being repulsed, he will indicate to his elect in the perpetual kingdom how he is the wisdom of the Father, rightly in the subsequent sentence it is said that with him is first strength, and afterwards wisdom. In the former words, therefore, in which he says: With him is wisdom and strength, he openly indicates that this which he gently taught as to how it was to be believed, he will show as terrible in the power of judgment. But in the subsequent words, in which he says: With him is strength and wisdom, he demonstrates more clearly than light that he first destroys the reprobate by power in the judgment, and afterwards shines upon the minds of the elect with the perfect light of the eternal kingdom. But because, before the day of the last judgment, he does not cease to judge daily the deeds of mortals by hidden dispositions, he returns to that which is now being done, when it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XII

[Rec. VII].

VERS. 16, 17.---He knoweth both the deceiver, and him that is deceived. He bringeth counsellors to a foolish end, and judges to astonishment.

18. God both knows the guiles of the iniquitous in his examination, and knows them not in his love.---Since every one who endeavors to deceive his neighbor is iniquitous, and the Truth says to the iniquitous: I know you not, depart from me, all ye that work iniquity (Matt. 7:23), how is it said in this place that the Lord knows the deceiver? But because God's "knowing" is sometimes said to be perceiving, sometimes approving; and he knows the iniquitous man, because by perceiving he judges him (for he would by no means have judged anyone iniquitous if he did not perceive him), and yet he knows not the iniquitous man, because he does not approve his deeds. He knows him, therefore, because he detects him; and he knows him not, because he does not recognize him in the beauty of his own wisdom: just as it is said of any truthful man that he knows not falsehood, not because he is ignorant of how to reprehend it when it is spoken by himself or others, but he knows that same fallacy in his examination, and knows it not in his love, so that, namely, he does not do it himself, though he condemns it when done by others. And it often happens that some, being at leisure for snares, spread the nets of their own perversity for the life of another; and when someone is seen being caught unknowingly in those same nets, it is perhaps doubted whether these things are seen divinely; and men wonder, if God sees these things, why he permits them to be done; but he himself knoweth the deceiver and him that is deceived. For he knows the deceiver, because he often beholds his previous deeds, and permits him by a just judgment to fall even into other sins. He knows the deceiver, because, having left him in the hand of his own works, he deserts him so that he may rush into worse things, as it is written: He that is unjust, let him be still unjust; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still (Rev. 22:11). He also knows him who is deceived, because men often commit evils which they know, and for that reason they are permitted to be deceived, so that they may fall into evils which they know not. Which, however, is accustomed to happen to the deceived sometimes for purgation, and sometimes for the beginning of vengeance.

19. The foolish end of those who do good not with a good intention.---But he bringeth counsellors to a foolish end, when they do any good thing whatever not with a good intention, but tend toward the retribution of a temporal gift. For if the Only-begotten of the supreme Father himself, because by the fact that he was made man he announced eternal things, was called the Angel of Great Counsel, we rightly understand counsellors to be preachers, who offer the counsel of life to their hearers. But when any preacher preaches eternal things for this reason, that he may obtain temporal gains, he is surely led to a foolish end 374, because he tends through labor to that place from which he ought to have fled through rectitude of mind.

[Vet. IX, rec. VIII.] 20. The astonishment of those who preside over others and do not watch.---But it is well subjoined: And judges to astonishment. For all who preside over examining the characters of others are rightly called judges. But when he who presides by no means anxiously discusses the life of his subjects, nor recognizes whom or how he should correct, the judge is led into astonishment, because he who ought to have judged evil deeds by no means detects those things which are to be judged. It follows:

CHAPTER XIII.

VERS. 18.---He looseth the belt of kings, and girdeth their loins with a rope.

21. God punishes the elation of the mind with carnal sins.---Those who know how to rule well the motions of their members are not undeservedly called kings. But when the mind is touched by elation concerning that same con-tinence, Almighty God, deserting its pride, often permits it to fall into the uncleanness of work. Therefore, he looseth the belt of kings, when in those who seemed to rule their members well, on account of the fault of elation, he destroys the girdle of chastity in them. But what is understood by the rope, except sin? As it is said by Solomon: His own iniquities shall catch the wicked, and he shall be bound with the ropes of his own sins (Prov. 5:22). And because the delight of the flesh holds sway in the loins, the strict judge of consciences, who looseth the belt of kings, girdeth their loins with a rope, so that, the girdle of chastity being loosed, the delight of sin may dominate their members, so that he may show even in public how detestable those are whom pride pollutes in secret. It follows:

CHAPTER XIV

[Rec. IX].

VERS. 19.---He leadeth priests away inglorious, and overthroweth the mighty.

22. Those who either neglect the care of their subjects, or seek after something other than eternal rewards, are inglorious.---The great glory of a priest is the rectitude of his subjects. Whence the eminent preacher well says to his disciples: For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of glory? are not even ye in the presence of the Lord? (1 Thess. 2:19). But when priests neglect the life of their disciples, and bear no fruit before the Lord from their progress, what else are they called but inglorious? because before the strict judge they will then surely not find glory, which they do not now seek in the characters of their subjects by the study of preaching. But it is well said: And he overthroweth the mighty, because when by a just judgment he deserts the mind of those ruling, it does not seek the internal reward of retribution; and it is overthrown in that by which it is deceived, so that instead of eternal glory it congratulates itself on temporal sovereignty. The mighty, therefore, are overthrown, because while they neglect the true rewards of the heavenly country, they fall here in their own pleasures. It follows:

CHAPTER XV.

VERS. 20.---He changeth the lip of the true, and taketh away the doctrine of the aged.

23. God gives the word of truth to those doing it, and takes it away from those not doing it.--- When the priest does not do the good things which he speaks, speech is also withdrawn from him, lest he dare to speak what he does not work, as it is said by the Prophet: But unto the sinner God said: Why dost thou declare my justices, and take my testament through thy mouth (Psal. 49:16)? Whence also he prays, saying: And take not away out of my mouth the word of truth utterly (Psal. 118:43). For he weighed that Almighty God gives the word of truth to those doing it, and takes it away from those not doing it. He, therefore, who sought that this should not be taken away from his mouth, what else did he seek but the grace of good operation? As if he were openly saying: Permit me not to err from good work, lest while I lose the order of living well, I lose the rectitude of speaking. [Vet. X.] And often the teacher who dares to teach what he neglects to do, when he has ceased to speak the good things which he contemned to work, begins to teach his subjects the depraved things which he does, so that by the just judgment of Almighty God, he may no longer have even a tongue in what is good, who refuses to have a good life, so that when his mind is inflamed with the love of earthly things, he may always speak of earthly things. Whence in the Gospel Truth says: Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh: A good man out of a good treasure bringeth forth good things, and an evil man out of an evil treasure bringeth forth evil things (Matth. 12:34; Luc. 6:45). Hence also John says: They are of the world, therefore of the world they speak (1 John 4:5). Well, therefore, is it said: Changing the lip of the true, and taking away the doctrine of the aged, because those who before were true in preaching celestial things, while loving temporal things they fall away to earthly things, the lip of the true is changed, and the doctrine of the aged is taken away, because loving temporal things they very little follow the precepts of their predecessors, so that they may hold the place of government as it were for the fruit of pleasure, not for the use of labor.

24. The Jews denied Christ present, whom they had said was to come.---Which, however, is more clearly understood of the Jews, who before the incarnation of the Lord were true, because they believed that he was to come, and announced it; but after he appeared in the flesh, they denied that he was he. The lip of the true, therefore, was changed, because they denied him present whom they had said was to come. And the doctrine of the aged was taken away, because they by no means followed in believing those things which they remembered their fathers had foretold. Whence also, Elias coming, it is promised that he shall turn the hearts of the children to their fathers (Mal. 4:6), so that the doctrine of the aged, which is now taken away from the heart of the Jews, may then return, the Lord pitying them, when the children shall begin to understand concerning the Lord this which the fathers preached. But if we receive as the aged those same Jews also, who, perfidy persuading them, endeavored to go against the word of Truth, the doctrine of the aged was taken away after the Church from the Gentiles, namely the young one, received it, which says through the Psalmist: I have understood more than the ancients (Psal. 118:100). Which because she held by working, she showed how she understood more than the ancients, while she immediately subjoins, saying: Because I have sought thy commandments. For because she studied to fulfill by working what she learned, she received to understand what she should teach. Whence still aptly is subjoined:

CHAPTER XVI.

VERS. 21.---He poureth contempt upon princes, and relieving those who had been oppressed.

25. The Jews despised on account of infidelity. The Gentiles raised from their fall on account of faith.---For when the people of the Jews remained in the commandment of the law, and all Gentility knew no precepts of God, both those seemed to hold princedom through faith, and these lay pressed in the depths through infidelity. But when Judea denied the mystery of the Lord's incarnation, and Gentility believed, both the princes fell into contempt, and those who had been oppressed in the fault of perfidy were raised to the liberty of true faith. Long before, Jeremiah, beholding this fall of the Israelites, said: The Lord is become as an enemy, he hath cast down Israel, he hath cast down all his walls, he hath destroyed his strongholds (Lam. 2:5). For walls in cities are for ornament, but strongholds are for defense. [Vet. XI.] And some are the gifts which defend us, others which adorn us. For prophetic doctrine, kinds of tongues, the power of healings, are as it were certain walls of the mind. Which even if one does not have, he can stand defended through faith and justice 376, although he may seem by no means to be adorned by the height of virtues. But hope, faith, and charity are not our walls, but our strongholds; which if we neglect to have, we lie open to hostile snares. From Judea, therefore, because he took away prophecy and doctrine, or the signs of miracles, he cast down the walls. But because he permitted hope, faith, and charity to be taken away on account of her hardness, he studied to destroy her strongholds. A right order, however, was preserved, so that first the walls, and afterwards the strongholds should be said to be destroyed, because when a sinful soul is deserted, first from it the gifts of virtues, which are given for the manifestation of the spirit, and afterwards the foundations of hope, faith, and charity are destroyed. All which things the Lord, having taken them from the perfidious, gave to Gentility, and from those things which he took from the infidels he adorned the minds of the faithful. Whence it is written: And to the beauty of the house to divide the spoils (Psalm 67:13). For when he took the spoils of virtues from the Jews, he gave the beauty of gifts to the house of the heart of the Gentiles, which he deigned to inhabit through faith. Which was namely done, when both the people of the Jews received the words of God according to the letter alone which killeth, and the converted Gentility penetrated them through the spirit which vivifieth. Whence it is presently subjoined:

CHAPTER XVII

[Rec. X].

VERS. 22.---Who revealeth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death.

26. Christ revealed hidden things, and changed the shadow of death into light.---For when any mystical things from the hidden words of the prophets are acknowledged by believers, what else are they than deep things revealed out of darkness? Whence also Truth itself, speaking to the disciples in parables, saith: That which I tell you in darkness, speak ye in light (Matth. 10:27). For when we loose the mystical knots of allegories through explanation, we speak in light what we heard in darkness. But the shadow of death was the hardness of the law, which ordained that every one sinning should be punished with the death of the body. But after our Redeemer tempered the asperity of the legal sanction through mildness, and no longer appointed the death of the flesh to be inflicted for fault, but indicated how much the death of the spirit was to be feared, He undoubtedly brought out the shadow of death into light. [Vet. XXII.] For that death in which the flesh is separated from the soul is the shadow of that death in which the soul is separated from God. Therefore the shadow of death is brought out into light when, the death of the spirit being understood, the death of the flesh is by no means feared. Which, however, can also be understood in another way. For they are not undeservedly called princes who always rule over their own thoughts with great judgment of counsel, and suppress all foolish motions by the power of wisdom. But it often happens that in secret the mind is raised up into the pride of elation concerning its very own wisdom, and falls under those vices over which it rejoiced to have been victor. Rightly therefore is it said: He poureth contempt upon princes. But because sometimes those who seem to lie in vices run to the lamentations of penance, and raise themselves up against the faults to which they were subject, it is aptly subjoined: And relieving those who had been oppressed. For some, enlightened by a heavenly gift, behold in how great turpitude of their sins they lie, wash the stains of their deeds with tears, and afterwards suppress under themselves the motions of their flesh, by which they were before pressed.

377 27. By a great dispensation of God all things are here held uncertain.---Which indeed is done by a great dispensation of Almighty God, namely, that in this life all things should be held uncertain, and no one should grow proud from possessed chastity, because He poureth contempt upon princes. Let no one despair from the depression of his vices, because He relieveth those who had been oppressed. And because when these things are done, an open sentence is brought out from the hidden counsels of God upon every one, it is rightly subjoined: And he revealeth deep things out of darkness.

28. God in His hidden judgments seeth all things and is not seen.---For the Lord revealeth deep things out of darkness when He indicateth an open sentence from His hidden counsels, that He may show what He feels concerning every one. For because the Creator now seeth all things, and He Himself is not seen in His counsels, it is rightly said of Him by the Psalmist: He made darkness His secret place (Psalm 18:11). But He as it were goeth out from this darkness to light when He showeth what He feels concerning the acts of each one. And because when he who was pressed by the weight of his sins is led to the state of rectitude, he first beholdeth that very death in which he had also been accustomed to fail, and knew not how to consider this, it is rightly added: And bringeth out into light the shadow of death. For the shadow of death is wicked operation, which is expressed from the imitation of the ancient enemy, as it were from the lineaments of the body. Of whom also it is said under a certain signification: And his name was Death (Rev. 6:8). And for the most part his malignant thought lies hid from the minds of men, and by this, that it is not known, it prevaileth the more. Therefore the shadow of death is brought out into light while the malignant operation of the ancient enemy is opened to the minds of the saints, that it may be able to be destroyed. It follows:

VERS. 23.---Who multiplieth the nations, and destroyeth them, and restoreth the overturned to the whole.

29. By the hidden judgments of God some fall, others rise again.---It can perhaps be understood that the Lord multiplieth the nations and destroyeth them, because those are born daily who are to die; and He restoreth the overturned to the whole, because those who have been dead shall rise again. Which, however, we receive better if we perceive how this is done in their mind. For He multiplieth the nations and destroyeth them, because He both extendeth them through the fecundity of offspring, and yet leaveth them in their own infidelity. But He restoreth the overturned to the whole, because those whom He had left in the fall of infidelity He at some time leadeth back to the state of faith. Which being restored in integrity of mind, that ancient people, who seemed to be faithful to God, being reprobated, was repulsed in heart, so that being deceived by their own perfidy, they afterwards rose up against Him whom they before preached. It follows:

CHAPTER XIX.

VERS. 24, 25.---Who changeth the heart of the princes of the people of the earth, and deceiveth them, that they walk in vain through the pathless way. They shall grope as in darkness, and not in light, and He shall make them to err like drunken men.

30. The blindness of the Jews towards Christ suffering human things indeed, but showing divine things.---For the heart of the princes of the earth was changed when in Judea the chief priests and the elders of the people endeavored to resist by their counsel Him whom they before preached was to come. And when they strove to extinguish His name by persecuting Him, being deceived by their own malice, they endeavored to walk through the pathless way in vain, because the way could not lie open to their cruelty against the Author of all; they beheld miracles, they were terrified by His power; but, refusing to believe, they still sought signs, saying: What sign 378 therefore dost Thou show, that we may see and believe Thee? what dost Thou work (John 6:30)?

Rightly therefore is it said: They shall grope as in darkness, and not in light. For he who trembles amidst so many open miracles, gropes as if in darkness, because what he touches he sees not. But every one who errs is led now hither, now thither. And because sometimes they were shown to believe, saying: Unless this man were of God, He could do nothing (John 9:33); but at other times they denied that He was from God, saying with contempt: Is not this the carpenter's son? is not His mother called Mary, and His brethren James, and Joseph, and Simon, and Jude, and His sisters are they not all with us (Matth. 13:55)? rightly is it subjoined: And He shall make them to err like drunken men. [Vet. XIV.] For they saw Him both raise the dead, and yet be mortal. Who would not believe Him God, whom they beheld raise the dead? But again, when they beheld Him mortal, they despised to believe that He was the immortal God. Therefore, by this that Almighty God exhibited Himself such to their eyes, who was able both to show divine things and to suffer human things, He made them to err like drunken men, so that their pride, which preferred to despise the mystery of His incarnation rather than to follow it, both extolled itself against His humanity, and wondered at the power of His Divinity shining within. All which things, because they were made present to the eyes of blessed Job through the spirit of prophecy, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XX

JOB CHAP. XIII. VERS. 1.---Lo, all things.

31. Job was strong in the spirit of prophecy.---For he saw in Him as present those things which were to follow, to whom neither future things come, nor past things depart, but all things stand at once before His eyes. And because he saw those very things which were to come, some to be in works, others in words, it is rightly subjoined,---IBID.:---Mine eye hath seen, and mine ear hath heard. But words have no utility if they lack understanding. Whence it is aptly subjoined,---IBID.:---And I have understood each thing. For when anything is shown or heard, if understanding is not granted, it is by no means prophecy. For Pharaoh saw in a dream those things which were to come to Egypt (Gen. 41:2, etc.); but because he was unable to understand what he saw, he was not a prophet. King Belshazzar beheld the fingers of the hand writing on the wall (Dan. 5:5); but he was not a prophet, because he received not the understanding of the thing which he had seen. Therefore, that blessed Job may testify that he has the spirit of prophecy, he asserts not only that he saw and heard, but also that he understood all things. Concerning which understanding, that he is not puffed up, his subjoined words testify when he saith:

CHAPTER XXI.

VERS. 2.---According to your knowledge I also know, nor am I inferior to you.

32. He was not puffed up by this received gift.---By which words namely it was made known of how great humility he was, who denies that he is inferior to those whose life he had far transcended by living holily. For he also confirms that he knows according to their knowledge, who, by knowing heavenly things, passed beyond their earthly thoughts by the spirit of prophecy also. It follows:

[Rec. XIII].

VERS. 3.---But yet I will speak to the Almighty, and I desire to dispute with God.

33. He who is now familiar with God in prayer, shall afterwards judge with Him.---We speak with the Almighty while we entreat His mercy; but we dispute with Him while, joining ourselves to His justice, we discuss our deeds with subtle investigation. Or certainly 379 to dispute with God is for him who here obeyed His precepts to come afterwards with Him as a judge to judge the peoples, as is said to the preachers who leave all things: Ye who have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His majesty, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matth. 19:28). Whence also the Lord saith through Isaiah: Relieve the oppressed, judge for the fatherless, and plead for the widow, and come, let us dispute (Isai. 1:17-18). For it is right that they should dispute with God concerning the fatherless in judgment, who perfectly desert the present world at the words of God. To speak, therefore, pertains to prayer, to dispute to judgment. Therefore the holy man now speaks to the Almighty, that he may afterwards dispute with the Almighty, because he afterwards comes with God as a judge, who has here been familiar with Him in prayer. But holy Church, of which we have already often said that blessed Job holds the type (especially in the Preface, ch. 6, etc.), not only then judges concerning the wicked when the day of the last judgment shall have come, but even now ceases not to judge concerning all who act wickedly, or think foolishly. Whence also it is subjoined:

[Vet. XV].

VERS. 4.---Showing you first to be fabricators of lies, and cultivators of perverse dogmas.

34. Heretics are fabricators of lies.---By which words namely it is openly shown that his friends, as if of the species of heretics, oppose the judgments of the holy man. For it is clear that they do not hold the figure of Catholics who are called cultivators of perverse dogmas. In which matter this also ought to be considered, that they are called fabricators of lies. For as an edifice is fabricated with stones, so a lie is fabricated with words. For where there is not a deceitful speech, but the sense of truth, it rises up as a fortified mass, not from fabrication, but from nature. It follows:

CHAPTER XXIV.

VERS. 5.---And would that you would be silent, that you might be thought to be wise.

35. Silence is useful for hiding folly.---As when a door is closed in a house it is unknown what members lie hid within, so for the most part a fool, if he be silent, is hidden whether he be wise or a fool, if however no other works come forth which speak the sense even of one who is silent. Therefore the holy man, beholding his friends wishing to appear what they were not, admonished them to be silent, lest they should be able to appear what they were. Whence also it is said through Solomon: A fool, if he be silent, shall be thought wise (Prov. 17:28). But because a fool, when he speaks, by this that he brings in his own things is not sufficient to weigh the words of the wise, rightly still, after he has commanded silence, he adds:

CHAPTER XXV.

VERS. 6.---Hear therefore my corrections, and attend to the judgment of my lips.

36. Correction is necessary for fools.---He rightly brought in correction first, and afterwards judgment, because unless the tumor of a fool be first depressed by correction, the judgment of a just man is by no means recognized by understanding. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVI.

VERS. 7.---Does God need your lie, that you should speak deceits for Him?

37. Truth seeks not to be supported by the aid of falsehood.---God needs not a lie, because truth seeks not to be supported by the aid of falsehood. But heretics, because they cannot defend from the truth those things which they wickedly understand concerning God, as if for the proving of a ray of light, require the shadow of falsehood. And they speak deceits for Him 380, while they deceive weak minds in the understanding of Him by foolish seduction. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVII.

VERS. 8.---Will you accept His person, and do you strive to judge for God?

38. Fools judge others the more severely, as they are the more profoundly ignorant of their own.---When fools behold the deeds of the prudent, all these things seem to them to be reprehensible; who, forgetting their own unskilfulness and infirmity, judge others the more intently, as they are the more profoundly ignorant of their own. At the same time, on the other hand, the righteous, when they rebuke the deeds of the wicked, always conscious of their own infirmity, reprove them, though by raging outwardly, yet by compassionating inwardly; because it belongs to Him alone to discuss the sins of men without compassion, Who from the omnipotence of His nature knows not how to sin. Since, therefore, the friends of blessed Job had so reproved his deeds as if they had nothing reprehensible in themselves, it is now rightly said: Will you accept His person, and do you strive to judge for God? For to accept His person is to take His authority in judgment; and he strives to judge as if for God, who, while he reproves whatever is weak in another, is not weakened within himself by compassion. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VERS. 9.---Either will it please Him Whom nothing can be hidden from; or will He be deceived, as a man, by your deceitfulness?

39. Heretics, while they pretend to defend God, offend Him.---Heretics exhibit deceit to God, because they assert those things which in no way please Him for Whom they speak; and while they strive to defend Him, as it were, they offend Him, while they fall in the adversity of Him Whom they seem to serve by their preaching. Whence also it is said by the Psalmist: That Thou mayest destroy the enemy and the defender (Psal. viii. 3). For every heretic is an enemy and a defender to Almighty God, because from whence he strives to defend Him as it were, from thence he opposes His truth. But because nothing can be hidden from God, He judges that in them which they feel within, not that which they seem to serve without. Because therefore God is not deceived by their deceitfulness as a man, it is rightly added:

CHAPTER XXIX.

VERS. 10, 11.---He will surely reprove you, because you accept His person in secret. As soon as He shall move Himself, He will trouble you, and His terror shall fall upon you.

40. What punishment they deserve who oppose the known truth.---This, which he asserts that the person of God is accepted in secret, is able to be understood in two ways. For there are some who both feel the truth in their heart, and yet speak those things which are false concerning God without. For lest they should seem to be overcome, they both know the truth within, and yet oppose it without. Whence it is now well said: He will surely reprove you, because you accept His person in secret. As if it were plainly said: You are the more reprehensible for falsehood before Him, as you see even with yourselves that which is true. And there are some who when they return to their mind, contemplate the justice and rectitude of God, and tremble with praying and weeping; but after the hour of contemplation has passed, they so return boldly to iniquities as if, being placed behind His back, they were not at all seen by the light of His justice. These therefore in secret within themselves receive the person of God as if seeing Him corporally, because they both flatter Him with weepings when they are present, and detract from Him by their manners when they recede as if from His sight. Who are to be struck the more for their evils, as they also know in the secret of their thought the right judgments of God. Whence also it is added: As soon as He shall move Himself, He will trouble you; and His terror shall fall upon you.

41. The righteous fear God before they experience Him angry.---Since Almighty God is of an unchangeable nature, in the wrath of judgment He is not perturbable. But by a human word the motion of God is called that very strictness of His rectitude, by which human depravity is struck. But righteous men fear God before His wrath is moved against them; and lest they should feel Him moved, they fear Him when tranquil. But on the contrary, the perverse only then dread being struck when they are struck; and then His terror awakens them from the sleep of their torpor, when vengeance troubles them. Whence also it is said by the prophet: And vexation alone shall give understanding to the hearing (Isai. xxviii. 19). For when they have begun to be beaten by vengeance for the precepts of God contemned and despised, then they understand what they heard. And the Psalmist says: When He slew them, then they sought Him (Psal. lxxvii. 34). It is well said therefore: As soon as He shall move Himself, He will trouble you; and His terror shall fall upon you, because to the hearts of the reprobate not fear produces rest, but punishment fear. It follows:

CHAPTER XXX.

VERS. 12.---Your memory shall be compared to ashes.

42. The memory of the proud is compared to ashes snatched by the wind, and to clay.---All who by earthly thought are conformed to this world strive by everything which they do to leave their memory to this world. Some by titles of wars, others by high walls of buildings, others by eloquent books of secular doctrines, labor instantly, and build for themselves a name of memory. But since life itself runs more swiftly to the end, what shall stand fixed in it, when it also swiftly mobile passes by? For a breeze snatches the ashes, as it is written: Not so the wicked, not so, but as the dust, which the wind casts away from the face of the earth (Psal. i. 4). Rightly therefore the memory of fools is compared to ashes, because it is placed there, where it may be snatched by a breeze. For however much anyone labors for the fulfilling of the glory of his name, he has placed his memory as if ashes, because the wind of mortality snatches it more quickly. Against which it is written of the righteous: The righteous shall be in eternal memory (Psal. cxi. 4). For by that very fact, by which he impresses his deeds on the eyes of God alone, he fixes the name of his memory in eternity. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXI.

IBID.---And your necks shall be brought to clay.

43. As by the eye sight, so by the neck pride is wont to be designated. The neck therefore is brought to clay, when every proud man is humbled in death, and the exalted flesh wastes away in rottenness. For let us behold what kind of corpses of the rich lie in the sepulchers, what image of death is in that extinguished flesh, what wasting of corruption. And certainly they were those who were extolled with honors, swelled with the things they possessed, despised others, and rejoiced as if they were alone; and while they did not weigh where they were tending, they knew not what they were. But the neck is brought to clay, because they lie despised in rottenness, who were swelled in vanity. The neck is brought into clay, because the wasting of corruption proves how much the power of the flesh is worth. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXII.

VERS. 13.---Be silent for a little while, that I may speak whatever my mind shall suggest to me.

44. Those who speak carnally are to be recalled to silence.---He indicates that those who had spoken by the sense of the flesh, whom he therefore restrains to silence, that he may say those things which his mind shall suggest to him. As if he should say plainly: I do not speak carnally, but spiritually, because by the sense of the spirit I hear what I bring forth through the ministry of the body. Whence he presently ascends to high things, and elevates himself in mysteries, and changes the rebuke which he had brought forth into mystical words, saying:

CHAPTER XXXIII.

VERS. 14.---Why do I tear my flesh with my teeth, and carry my soul in my hands?

45. The righteous punish their lighter faults in themselves with great torments.---In Sacred Scripture by teeth sometimes holy preachers, and sometimes indeed internal senses, are wont to be understood. For concerning holy preachers, it is said to the spouse: Your teeth are like flocks of shorn sheep, which have come up from the washing (Cant. iv. 2). Whence also it is said to one of them, when the Gentiles were shown in a figure: Kill and eat (Acts x. 13); that is, crush their oldness, and convert them into the body of the Church, namely into your members. Again, because teeth are wont to be understood as internal senses, the prophet Jeremiah testifies, saying: He has broken my teeth to the number (Lam. iii. 10). For by the teeth food is broken, that it may be swallowed. Whence not undeservedly do we understand internal senses by teeth, which chew and crumble, as it were, the individual things which they think, and transmit them to the belly of the memory. Which the prophet says are broken to the number, because according to the measure of each one's sin, a blindness of understanding is generated in the senses, and according to what each one has done outwardly, in that he becomes dull as to what he could understand of internal and invisible things. Whence also it is rightly written: Every man who shall eat a sour grape, his teeth shall become dull (Ezek. xviii. 2; Jer. xxxi. 30). For what is a sour grape but sin? For a sour grape is fruit before its time. For whoever desires to be satiated with the delights of the present life, hastens to eat fruit before its time, as it were. He therefore who eats a sour grape, his teeth become dull, because he who is fed with the delight of the present world, his internal senses are bound, so that they can no longer chew, that is, understand, spiritual things, because from whence they have been delighted in exterior things, from thence they become dull in the inmost things. And while the soul is fed with sin, it is not able to eat the bread of justice, because the teeth, being bound from the custom of sin, can by no means eat the just thing which tastes within. In this place, therefore, because we understand teeth, as we have said, as internal senses, we ought greatly to consider what the righteous are wont to do. Who for the most part, if they detect any carnal things in themselves however slightly, retracting these in their internal senses, vehemently pursue them in themselves, crush themselves with affliction, and with great torments judge even the least evil things in themselves, and damn these by penitence. Which they do for this reason, that in the sight of the eternal Judge they also may be found, as far as is possible, irreprehensible, and that those who behold them thus judging themselves may be inflamed to amend themselves from more grievous faults. Which indeed blessed Job had done before his friends who held temporal glory and praised passing goods; but yet he was not able to lead their sense to the knowledge of the utility of his scourge, so that namely they might be able to weigh that Almighty God would not only bestow prosperous things, but sometimes also mercifully inflict adverse things. Whence he now well says: Why do I tear my flesh with my teeth? As if he should say plainly: Why do I discuss carnal things with my internal senses, if any deeds have been done in me, if I cannot profit my spectators? Where also it is aptly added: And I carry my soul in my hands.

46. They seek not only their own progress, but the edification of their neighbor in all things.---To carry the soul in the hands is to show the intention of the heart in operation. For the righteous have this peculiar to them, that in everything they say and everything they do, they seek not only their own progress, but also the edification of their neighbors. And sometimes in certain things they judge themselves, that they may recall sluggish hearers to consider themselves. Sometimes they show good works, that those who behold them may be ashamed not to imitate what they see. For it is written: Let them see your good works, and glorify your Father, Who is in heaven (Matt. v. 16). He therefore who insinuates his intention through works, carries his soul in his hands. But when any righteous man profits neither by judging himself, nor by showing good works, for the utility of his neighbors, he returns by that which he has done to words of grief. Whence it is now rightly said: Why do I tear my flesh with my teeth, and carry my soul in my hands? That is, why do I either strictly judge myself before men, or show what I aim at in work, if I profit not the utility of my neighbors either by judging evil things, or by showing good things? But yet the righteous, even when they say these things, never fail from offering a good example to their neighbors. Whence blessed Job, still exhibiting and showing the virtue of patience before his friends, says:

CHAPTER XXVII.

VERS. 15.---Even if He shall kill me, in Him will I hope.

47. The righteous praises God even in adversities.---The virtue of patience is never in prosperous things. But he truly is patient, who is both worn by adversities, and yet is not curved from the rectitude of his hope. For concerning the sense of the reprobate it is written: And he will confess to Thee when Thou shalt do good to him (Psal. xlviii. 19). In this, therefore, the just mind is discerned from the unjust, that it confesses the praise of Almighty God even among adversities, that it is not broken with things, it falls not with the fall of exterior glory, but in this it rather demonstrates what kind of thing it was with things, which stands more robust even without things. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXV.

VERS. 15, 16.---But yet I will reprove my ways in His sight, and He shall be my savior.

48. He knows not how to spare his own faults, that God may spare him.---Since the Apostle Paul says: If we would judge ourselves, we should not indeed be judged (1 Cor. xi. 31), the Lord is then found a savior, when now for the fear of God our sin is reproved by ourselves. Whence all the elect never know how to spare their own faults, that they may be able to find the Judge of faults appeased. And they truly believe that they shall afterwards find Him a savior, Whom they now fear as a strict Judge. For he who now spares himself in fault, is not spared afterwards in punishment. Let him say therefore: But yet I will reprove my ways in His sight. And let him add what utility follows from this reproof: And He shall be my savior. It follows:

[Rec. XVIII].

IBID.---For every hypocrite shall not come into His sight.

49. The hypocrite flees the sight of God, while he desires to please human eyes.---Since it is certain that the coming Judge will place the lambs on the right hand, but the goats on the left (Matth. xxv. 33), for what reason is it now said that the hypocrite shall not come into His sight, who surely, if he be among the goats, will appear at the left hand of the Judge? [Vet. XX.] But it must be known that we come into the sight of the Lord in two ways. In one way, indeed, by which here, subtly weighing our sins, we punish them in His sight, and distinguish them by weeping. For as often as we bring the power of our Creator to our sense, so often do we stand in His sight. Whence also it is rightly said by the man of God Elijah: The Lord God of Israel lives, in whose sight I stand (1 Kings xvii. 1). In another way also we come into the sight of the Lord, when in the last judgment we assist before His tribunal. The hypocrite, therefore, through the last examination comes before the sight of the Judge; but because he now dissembles considering and bewailing his faults, he refuses to come into the sight of the Lord. For as just men, when they contemplate the strictness of the coming Judge, bring their sins to memory, bewail what they have committed, and strictly judge themselves, lest they be judged; so hypocrites, by as much as they please men outwardly, by so much do they neglect to behold themselves inwardly; and they pour themselves out entirely in the words of their neighbors, and estimate themselves to be holy, because they think they are so held by men. And when they have scattered their mind through the words of their own praise, they never bring this back to the knowledge of fault, they never consider where they offend the internal Judge, they fear nothing of His strictness, because they believe that they have pleased Him just as they have men. Who, if they brought His terror to their mind, would the more fear this very thing, that being placed in an evil intention they please men. Well, therefore, is it said: For every hypocrite shall not come into His sight, because he does not place the strictness of God before his eyes, while he covets to please human eyes. Who if, discussing his mind, he placed himself in the sight of God, he surely would not now be a hypocrite. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

VERS. 17.---Hear my speech, and receive my riddles with your ears.

50. The figurative speech of Job.---By the fact that he names riddles, he demonstrates that he has figurative speeches. Whence also it is aptly added in the voice of the faithful people:

CHAPTER XXXVIII

[Rec. XIX].

VERS. 18.---If I shall be judged, I know that I shall be found just.

51. The humility of Job even in praising himself. He attributes iniquity to himself, but his purgation to God.---Which does not disagree with the person of the same blessed Job, when he himself speaks this outwardly of himself, which the Truth had said inwardly of him to his enemy: Hast thou seen my servant Job, that there is none like him upon the earth? (Job i. 8). And indeed the same man is much lower in what he records of himself than what the Lord said of him. For it is one thing to be just, another to have none like him. He felt humbly, therefore, of himself, who while he stood forth just without comparison, did not mention that he could be found just above others, but only just. [Vet. XXI.] This, however, seems to have a question in his words, that he who said above: I will reprove my ways in His sight (Verse 15); and says below: Thou wilt consume me with the sins of my youth; and subtly acknowledging his sins, still further below adds: Thou hast sealed up my offences as in a bag; now says: If I shall be judged, I know that I shall be found just. For sin and justice cannot come together at the same time. But the holy man attributing iniquity to himself, and his purgation to the almighty Lord, both knows himself a sinner from himself, and is not ignorant that he has been made just from a gift. Who, being placed also in a right work, deserved by abundant grace to sustain scourges. And now he rejoices that he is found just in judgment, who saw himself smitten before judgment. Whence also when he says long after: Thou hast sealed up my offences as in a bag, he immediately adds: IBID.---But Thou hast healed my iniquity. He, therefore, who records that he is found just in judgment, by no means denies that he was justly scourged; although by his scourge the Lord did not study to wipe away sins, but to increase merits. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIX.

VERS. 19.---Who is he that will be judged with me? let him come.

52. No one can be devoid of the thought of sin.---Holy men so keep themselves in their works, by the author God, that there is found nothing at all of which they are accused outwardly; but inwardly in their thoughts they watch around themselves with such caution, that, if it may be done, they may always assist irreproachable in the eyes of the internal Judge. But as much as they are able to act, lest they slip outwardly in work, so much they are by no means able to act inwardly, that they never slip in thought. For the human conscience, by the very fact that it recedes from the most intimate things, is always on slippery ground. Whence it happens that even holy men frequently slip in heart. Let the blessed Job, therefore, speaking as much from his own voice as from the voice of the elect, say: Who is he that will be judged with me? let him come. For because in exterior acts he has not that for which he may be reproved, he freely seeks an accuser. But because even the hearts of the just sometimes reprove themselves of foolish thought, perhaps on account of this it is added:

CHAPTER XL.

IBID.---Why being silent am I consumed?

53. He whose penance is to be done in secret.---For he being silent is consumed who, reproving himself of foolish thought, is bitten within himself by the tooth of conscience. As if he should say openly: Just as I lived so that I feared no accuser outwardly, would that I had so lived that I had no accusing conscience within myself! For he being silent is consumed, who finds within himself that by which he is burned. It follows:

VERS. 20.---Only do not two things to me, and then I will not hide myself from Thy face.

54. No one secure from the animadversion of God.---In this place what ought we to accept as the face of God but animadversion, in which while He regards sins He punishes them? From which surely not even any just man is hidden, if the two things which he asks are not removed; concerning which he adds:

CHAPTER XLI

[Vet. XXII, Rec. XX].

VERS. 21.---Withdraw Thy hand far from me, and let not Thy dread terrify me.

55. The saints before Christ desired that law, in which they should serve not by fear, but by love.---In which two things, surely, what else does he seek through the voice of prophecy than the time of grace and redemption? For the Law held the people under the stroke of vengeance, so that whoever sinned under it was immediately punished by death. Nor did the Israelitish people serve the Lord from love, but from fear. But justice can never be fulfilled through fear, because, according to the voice of John: Perfect charity casts out fear (1 John iv. 18). And Paul also consoles the sons of adoption, saying: You have not received the spirit of bondage again in fear, but you have received the spirit of adoption of sons, in which we cry, Abba, Father (Rom. viii. 15). From the voice of the human race, therefore, desiring to pass the hardness of legal smiting, and appetising to arrive from dread to love, he prays that the almighty God may make these two things far from him, saying: Withdraw Thy hand far from me, and let not Thy dread terrify me; that is, remove the hardness of smiting from me, take away the weight of dread, but by the irradiating grace of love, infuse the spirit of security, because if I shall not be far from smiting and dread, I know that I shall not be hidden from the strictness of Thy examination, since in Thy sight he cannot be just who serves Thee not through love, but through fear. Whence also he seeks the very presence of his Creator as if familiarly and corporally, that through this he may both hear what he is ignorant of, and be heard in those things which he knows. For he immediately adds:

VERS. 22.---Call me, and I will answer Thee; or certainly I will speak, and Thou answer me.

56. Christus manifested sins which were hidden.---Who while He appeared to human eyes through the assumed flesh, opened to men their sins, which they both perpetrated and knew not. Whence it is added:

CHAPTER XLII

[Rec. XXI].

VERS. 23.---How many iniquities and sins have I, show me my crimes and offences.

57. God calls when He regards us by loving and choosing us. We answer by obeying Him. What is the difference between sin and iniquity, between crimes and offences.---Although to call and to answer can also be understood otherwise. For to call is of God, to regard us by loving and choosing us. But to answer is ours, to obey His love by good works. Where it is aptly added: Or certainly

I will speak, and Thou answer me. For we speak when we ask for His face through desire. But God answers those speaking when He appears to us who love Him. But because whoever pants for the desire of eternity, subtly reproving himself, discusses his deeds, and asks lest there be anything in him in which he may offend the face of his Creator, he rightly subjoins: How many iniquities and sins have I, show me my crimes and offences. This in this life is the labor of the just, that they may find themselves, and finding themselves by weeping and correcting lead themselves to better things. And although the Apostle John asserts that there is no difference between iniquity and sin, who says: Iniquity is sin (1 John iii. 4), yet by the very use of speaking iniquity sounds more than sin, and every man freely confesses himself a sinner, but sometimes blushes to say he is iniquitous. [Vet. XXIII.] But between crimes (scelera) and offences (delicta) this is the difference, that crime even exceeds the weight of sin, but offence does not exceed the weight of sin, because even when a sacrifice is commanded to be offered by the Law, it is certainly prescribed for offence just as for sin. And crime is never except in work, but offence is frequently in thought alone. Whence also it is said by the Psalmist: Who understands offences? (Psal. xviii. 13). Because surely sins of work are the more quickly known, as they are seen outwardly; but sins of thought are so much difficult to be understood, as they are perpetrated invisibly. Whoever therefore, anxious with the desire of eternity, desires to appear pure to the coming Judge, examines himself the more subtly now, as he surely considers, that then he may assist free from His terror, and prays that it be shown to him where he displeases, that he may punish this in himself through penance, and judging himself here he may become unjudgable.

58. We have come into that blindness through sin, that we are ignorant of ourselves.---But among these things it is necessary to behold what a great punishment of our pilgrimage has smitten us, who have come into that blindness, that we are ignorant of ourselves. We perpetrate evils, and yet we do not very quickly detect these even when perpetrated. For the mind, excluded from the light of truth, finds nothing in itself except darkness, and frequently stretches out its foot into the pit of sin, and knows it not. Which surely it suffers from the blindness of its exile alone, because, repulsed from the illumination of the Lord, it has also lost seeing itself, who did not love the face of its Creator. Whence also it is added:

CHAPTER XLIII.

VERS. 24.---Why dost Thou hide Thy face, and think me Thy enemy?

59. From penal fear we must return to love.---The human race had the contemplation of the inward light in paradise; but pleasing itself, by as much as it receded from itself, it lost the light of the Creator, and His face; it fled to the trees of paradise, because after fault it feared to see Him whom it had been accustomed to love. But behold, after fault it comes into punishment, and from punishment it returns to love, because it finds what was the fruit of fault; and that face which it feared in fault, being awakened it seeks from punishment, so that it may now flee the darkness of its blindness, and may greatly dread this very thing, that it sees not its Creator. With which desire being smitten the holy man cries out: Why dost Thou hide Thy face, and think me Thy enemy? because if Thou didst regard me as a friend, Thou wouldst not deprive me of the light of Thy vision. Who, following the mobility also of the human heart, adds:

CHAPTER XLIV.

VERS. 25.---Against a leaf, which is snatched by the wind, dost Thou show Thy power, and dost Thou pursue dry stubble?

60. Man is like a leaf and stubble, he is moved by the wind of temptation.---For what is man, but a leaf, who surely in paradise fell from the tree? What is he but a leaf, who is snatched by the wind of temptation, and is raised by the blasts of desires? [Vet. XXIV.] For as many temptations as the human mind suffers, by so many blasts it is moved. For this, for the most part, wrath disturbs; when wrath recedes, inept joy succeeds. It is urged by the stings of luxury, by the heat of avarice it is stretched far and wide to encompass things which are earthly. Sometimes pride raises this; but sometimes inordinate fear deposits it in the lowest things. Because therefore it is raised and led by so many blasts of temptations, man is rightly compared to a leaf. Whence well also is it said by Isaiah: We all have fallen as a leaf, and our iniquities as a wind have taken us away (Isai. lxiv. 6). For iniquity has taken us away as a wind, because it has raised us, fixed by no weight of virtue, into vain elation. But well after a leaf is man also called stubble. For he who was a tree in condition, became a leaf from himself in temptation, but afterwards appeared stubble in dejection. For because he fell from on high, he is a leaf; but because through the flesh he was next to the earth, even when he seemed to stand, he is recorded to be stubble. But because he has lost the greenness of intimate love, he is now dry stubble. Let the holy man, therefore, consider, both man of how great vileness he is, and God of how great strictness, and let him say: Against a leaf, which is snatched by the wind, dost Thou show Thy power, and dost Thou pursue dry stubble? As if he should openly deplore, saying: Why with such rectitude dost Thou assail him whom Thou knowest to be so weak in temptation? It follows:

CHAPTER XLV.

[Rec. XXIII].

VERS. 26.---For Thou writest bitterness against me.

61. The sentence of death written concerning the sinful man cannot be changed.---Because everything which we speak passes away, but what we write remains, God is said not to speak, but to write bitterness, when His scourges endure long over us. For once to the sinning man it was said: Earth thou art, and unto earth shalt thou go (Gen. iii. 19). And often appearing angels gave precepts to men. Moses the lawgiver through strictness coerced sins. The only-begotten of the supreme Father Himself came to redeem us, by dying He swallowed up death; He announced to us perpetual life, which He showed in Himself. But nevertheless that sentence which was given in paradise concerning the death of our flesh from the very beginning of the human race even to the end of the world is not changed. For who is the man that lives, and shall not see death? (Psal. lxxxviii. 49). Which the Psalmist again well beholding says: Thou art terrible, and who shall resist Thee? from then Thy wrath (Psal. lxxv. 8). Who surely being angry with the sinning man in paradise once fixed the sentence concerning the mortality of our flesh, which now and even to the last can in no way be changed. Let him say therefore: Thou writest bitterness against me. Whence still it is added:

CHAPTER XLVI.

[Vet. XXV, Rec. XXIV].

IBID.---And Thou wilt consume me with the sins of my youth.

62. As there are different ages of the body, so also of the mind.---Behold the just man, because he finds not that he has sinned in his youth, dreads the deeds of his adolescence. But it must be known that just as in the body, so there are also increments of age in the mind. For the first age of man is infancy, when although he lives innocently, he knows not how to speak the innocence which he has. And then childhood follows, in which he is already able to say what he wishes; to which succeeds adolescence, which is clearly the first age in operation; which youth follows, namely fit for fortitude; and afterwards old age, also by time now suitable for maturity. Because therefore we called the first age fit for good acts adolescence, and just men, when they profit in great maturity of mind, sometimes bring back to memory the beginning of their actions, and reprehend themselves for their beginnings as much as they have profited more deeply from the gravity of their mind, because they find themselves to have been so much indiscreet as they afterwards more fully attain the citadel of discretion, rightly now through the voice of the holy man the sins of adolescence are dreaded. But if it is to be held to the letter itself, hence it must be considered how grave are the sins of youths and old men, if even that which they committed in a weak age the just thus fear. It follows:

CHAPTER XLVII

[Rec. XXV].

VERS. 27.---Thou hast put my foot in the stocks, and hast watched all my paths, and hast considered the steps of my feet.

63. The severity of Divine judgment in punishing even evil thoughts.---In the stocks God has put the foot of man, because He has bound his crookedness with the strong sentence of His strictness. All whose paths He watches, because He subtly judges each of his individual acts. For a path is wont to be narrower than a way. But because we take ways as actions, not unworthily we receive the paths themselves as the thoughts of actions. God therefore watches all paths, because in each and every one of our acts He also weighs the thoughts. And He considers the steps of the feet, because He examines how rightly the intentions of our works are placed, lest even that which is done well be not done with a right desire. Certain evil deeds can also be signified through the steps of the feet. For the foot in the body is the track in the way. For the most part while we do certain crooked things, to the brethren beholding this, we provide an evil example; and, as if with the foot turned outside the way, we leave distorted tracks to those following, while through our works we provoke other hearts to scandal. But it is very laborious to guard lest a man dare to do evil things, lest in good acts he waver through intention, and among right works a sinister thought mock him. All which things nevertheless the Almighty God subtly examines, and in judgment repays each one. But when can a man, who is constrained by the infirmity of his flesh, subtly rise up against all things, and hold rectitude with an unshaken thought? Whence fitly it is added:

CHAPTER XLVIII.

VERS. 28.---Who am to be consumed as rottenness, and as a garment that is eaten by the moth.

64. Man is consumed by the rottenness innate in him.---For as a garment is eaten by a moth arising from itself, so man has in himself rottenness, by which he may be consumed; and this is what he is from which he is consumed so as not to be. Which can also be understood otherwise, if it is said from the voice of a tempted man: Who am to be consumed as rottenness, and as a garment that is eaten by the moth. For man is consumed as rottenness, while he is worn away by the corruption of his flesh. To whom, because unclean temptation arises not from elsewhere, but from himself, after the manner of a moth temptation consumes the flesh, as it were the garment from which it goes out. For man has in himself that from which he may be tempted. As therefore a moth consumes a garment, which proceeded from the same garment. It must also be known that the moth pierces the garment without sound; and for the most part thought so transfixes the mind, that the mind itself does not feel it, except after it has been transfixed by its sting. Well therefore it is said, that man is consumed as a garment by the moth, because sometimes we do not know the wounds of our temptations, except after we have been pierced by them in the mind. Which clearly our infirmity the holy man still well considering, adds:

[Vet. et Rec. XXVI].

CHAP. XIV, VERS. 1.---Man born of a woman, living for a short time, is filled with many miseries.

65. Man born of infirmity, because sprung from a woman.---In sacred eloquence a woman is put either for the sex, or for infirmity. For the sex, indeed, as it is written: God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law (Gal. iv. 4). But for infirmity, as it is said by a certain wise man: Better is the iniquity of a man, than a woman doing a good turn (Ecclus. xlii. 14). For any strong and discreet person is called a man, but an infirm or indiscreet mind is received as a woman. And it often happens that even any discreet person suddenly falls into a fault, and another indiscreet and infirm one exhibits a good operation. But he who is indiscreet and infirm is sometimes more lifted up because of that which he has done well, and falls more gravely into a fault; but every discreet person, even from that which he understands himself to have done ill, reduces himself more closely to the rule of strictness; and thence profits more deeply unto justice, whence for a time he seemed to have fallen from justice. In which matter it is rightly said: Better is the iniquity of a man, than a woman doing a good turn, because sometimes even the fault of the strong becomes an occasion of virtue, and the virtue of the weak an occasion of sin. In this place, therefore, what is designated by the name of woman but infirmity, when it is said: Man born of a woman? As if it were more plainly said: What strength will he have in himself, who is born of infirmity?

66. He is narrowed as to life, dilated as to misery.---Living for a short time, he is filled with many miseries. Behold in the voices of the holy man the punishment of man is briefly expressed, because he is both narrowed as to life, and dilated as to misery. For if everything which is done here be subtly considered, it is punishment and misery. For to serve the very corruption of the flesh for things necessary and allowed is misery, as that against cold garments, against hunger food, against heat cold things should be sought. That the health of the body is guarded with much caution; that even when guarded it is lost, and when lost is repaired with grave labor, and yet when repaired is always in doubt; what is this other than the misery of mortal life? That we love friends, being suspicious lest they be able to be offended; we dread enemies, and clearly are not secure concerning those whom we dread; that for the most part we speak to enemies as confidently as to friends, and sometimes we receive pure words of neighbors, and perhaps those much loving us, as if words of enemies, and we who never wish to be deceived or to deceive, from our caution err more gravely; what then is this but the misery of human life? That, having lost the heavenly country, man being repulsed is delighted with exile, is weighed down with cares, and yet dissembles to think how grave it is that many things are thought; that he is deprived of internal light, and yet in this life wishes to endure his blindness for a long time; what is this other than misery born from our punishment? But although he desires to stay here for a long time, nevertheless he is impelled by the very course of mortal life to go out. Whence the holy man rightly subjoins:

VERS. 2.---Who comes forth like a flower and is crushed, and flees as a shadow, and never remains in the same state.

67. The world is filled with as many flowers soon to be dried up, as names.---For he comes forth as a flower, because he shines in the flesh; but he is crushed, because he is reduced to rottenness. For what are born men in the world, but certain flowers in the field? Let us stretch the eyes of our heart into this breadth of the present world, and behold it is full of as many flowers as men. Life therefore in the flesh, is a flower in the grass. Whence well it is said by the Psalmist: Man, as grass are his days; and as a flower of the field, so shall he flourish (Psal. cii. 15). Isaiah also says: All flesh is grass, and all the glory thereof as a flower of the field (Isa. xl. 6). For man after the manner of a flower proceeds from secret, and suddenly appears in public, who immediately from public through death is withdrawn to secret. The greenness of the flesh shows us, but the dryness of dust withdraws us from sights. As a flower we appeared, who were not; as a flower we wither, who appeared temporally.

68. Man in every single moment of life proceeds to death. Thence he fails whence he profits.---And because by moments man daily is impelled to death, rightly is subjoined: And flees as a shadow, and never remains in the same state. But when the sun also unceasingly performs its course, and never fixes itself in stability; why is the course of the life of man compared to a shadow rather than to the sun, unless because, having lost the love of the Creator, he has lost the heat of his heart, and has remained in the cold of his iniquity alone? Because according to the voice of Truth: Iniquity shall abound, and the charity of many shall wax cold (Matth. xxiv. 12). He therefore who in the love of God has not the heat of his heart, and yet does not hold the life which he loves, clearly flees as a shadow. Whence rightly also of him it is written: Because he has followed a shadow (Ecclus. xxxiv). But well it is said: And never remains in the same state, because while infancy passes to childhood, childhood to adolescence, adolescence to youth, youth to old age, old age to death, in the course of the present life by its very increments it is impelled to detriments; and thence it always fails, whence it believes itself to profit in the space of life. For we cannot have a fixed state here, where we have come about to pass away: and this itself our living, is daily to pass from life. Which clearly that lapse the first man before his fault could not have, because times, while he stood, were passing. But after he sinned, he placed himself in a certain as it were slippery state of temporal-ity; and because he ate the forbidden food, he straightway found the defect of his state. Which mutability nevertheless not only outwardly, but inwardly also man suffers, while he endeavors to rise up to better works. For the mind by the weight of its mutability is always impelled to something other than it is, and unless it be held in its state by the strict discipline of guarding, it always slips into worse things. For that which always left him standing, has lost the state which it was able to have. Whence now when it strives for better things, it endeavors as it were against the stroke of a river. But when it is relaxed from the intention of ascending, without labor it is reduced to the lowest things. For because in the ascent there is labor, in the descent ease, the Lord admonishes those about to enter through the narrow gate, saying: Strive to enter through the narrow gate (Luke xiii. 24). Clearly about to say the entrance of the narrow gate, he premised, strive, because unless the contention of the mind be fervent, the wave of the world is not overcome, through which the soul is always recalled to the lowest things. Because therefore man as a flower is born and is crushed, because as a shadow he flees, and in his state never remains, what in this consideration he subjoins let us hear. It follows:

CHAPTER LI.

VERS. 3.---And dost Thou think it worthy to open Thine eyes upon such a one, and to bring him into judgment with Thee?

69. Two extremes, man and Creator, dust and God.---For he considered above both the power of the Almighty God, and his own infirmity; he brought before his eyes himself and God, he weighed who comes with whom to judgment. He saw on this side man, on that side the Creator, that is, dust and God; and rightly he says: And dost Thou think it worthy to open Thine eyes upon such a one? To open the eyes for the Almighty God is to exercise judgments, to see whom He may strike. For as if with closed eyes He does not wish to behold whom He does not wish to strike. Whence straightway concerning that same judgment it is subjoined: And to bring him into judgment with Thee? But because he has contemplated God coming to judgment, again he considers his own infirmity. He sees that the world cannot be through itself, which that it might be, proceeded from uncleanness, and subjoins:

CHAPTER LII.

VERS. 4.---Who can make clean a thing conceived of unclean seed? Is it not Thou, who alone art?

70. Man on account of a vitiated origin suffers unclean things even unwillingly.---He who through Himself alone is clean is able to cleanse unclean things. For man living in corruptible flesh has uncleannesses of temptations impressed in himself, because forsooth he drew them from his origin. For his very conception on account of the delight of the flesh is uncleanness. Whence also the Psalmist says: For behold I was conceived in iniquities, and in sins did my mother conceive me (Psal. l. 7). Hence it is therefore that for the most part he is tempted even unwillingly. Hence it is that he suffers certain unclean things in the mind, although he resists from judgment, because conceived of uncleanness, while he tends to cleanness, he endeavors to overcome this which he is. But whoever shall have overcome the motions of secret temptation and the uncleanness of thought, let him by no means attribute his cleanness to himself, because no one can make clean a thing conceived of unclean seed, except He who alone is clean through Himself. He therefore who has already come in mind to the place of cleanness, let him look back at the way of his conception, through which he came, and thence let him gather that he has not from his own virtue cleanness of living, to whom there was made a beginning of subsisting from uncleanness. But this can truly be understood in this place, because blessed Job having intuited the incarnation of the Redeemer, saw that He alone in the world was not conceived of unclean seed, who so came into the world from the Virgin, that He had nothing of unclean conception. For He proceeded not from man and woman, but from the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary. He alone therefore in His flesh stood truly clean, who could not be touched by the delight of the flesh, because neither did He come hither through carnal delight.

BOOK TWELVE.

In which, Chapter XIV of the book of Job being explained from the fifth verse, Chapter XV is for the most part morally explained in its entirety.

[Vet. et Rec. I.] It is the custom of the just to think so much more solicitously how fleeting the present life is, as they more studiously know how to weigh the eternal goods of the heavenly country. For from those things which they behold as remaining within, they more subtly attend to the flight of falling things without. Whence blessed Job, when he had brought forth a sentence concerning the lapse of human time, saying: Man born of a woman, living for a short time. And again: And he flees as a shadow, and never remains in the same state, still adds concerning the brevity of his life:

CAPUT PRIMUM.

CHAP. XIV, VERS. 5.---Short are the days of man, the number of his months is with Thee.

1. That which passes with such velocity is as if it were not.---For he considers that as if it were not with us, which passes with such velocity. But because with the Almighty God even falling things stand, he declares the number of our months to be with Him. Or certainly in days the brevity of time is designated, but in months as it were the multiplied spaces of days. To us therefore the days are short. But because our life is afterwards extended, the number of our months is mentioned to be with God. Whence also it is said through Solomon: Length of days is in His right hand. It follows:

CAPUT II

[Rec. II].

IBID.---Thou hast appointed his bounds, which cannot be passed.

2. Nothing happens to men without the counsel of God, although secret. Nothing which happens to men in this world comes without the secret counsel of the Almighty God. For God prescient of all things about to follow, decreed before the worlds how they should be disposed through the worlds. For it is already appointed to man, either how much the prosperity of this world follows him, or how much adversity strikes him, lest either immoderate prosperity lift up His elect, or too much adversity weigh them down. It is also appointed how much he should temporally live in mortal life itself. For although the Almighty God added fifteen years to the life of King Hezekiah (2 Kings xx. 1), when He permitted him to die, then He foreknew him to be about to die. In which matter a question arises, how it is said to him through the prophet: Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die, and not live; to whom when the sentence of death was said, straightway at his tears life was added. But through the prophet the Lord said at what time he himself deserved to die; but through the largess of mercy at that time He deferred him to death, which He Himself foreknew before the worlds. Neither therefore was the prophet fallacious, because he made known the time of death, at which that man deserved to die; nor were the Lord's appointments convulsed, because that from the largess of God the years of life should increase, this also was prefixed before the worlds; and the space of life which unexpectedly without was added, was appointed within without increment of prescience. Well therefore it is said: [Vet. II.] Thou hast appointed his bounds, which cannot be passed.

3. God sets a limit to spiritual progress.--- Which nevertheless to be understood even according to the spirit is valid, because sometimes we endeavor to profit in virtues, and we perceive certain gifts, but from some being repulsed we lie in the lowest things. For there is no one who apprehends as much of virtue as he desires, because the Almighty God, discerning interior things, sets a limit to the spiritual progresses themselves, so that from this which a man endeavors to apprehend, and is not able, he may not lift himself up in those which he is able. Whence that also eminent preacher, who had been snatched to the third heaven, had penetrated the secrets of paradise, was not able to be tranquil and untempted after the revelation (2 Cor. xii. 3). But because the Almighty God appointed bounds to man, which cannot be passed, He both lifted him up to know sublime things, and brought him back again to tolerate infirm things, so that beholding the measure of his limit, while he endeavored to comprehend security, and was not able, lest through elation he should go outside himself, he might be compelled through humility to return always within his bounds. It follows:

[Rec. III].

VERSE 6.---Depart a little from him, that he may rest, until his longed-for day comes, like that of a hireling.

4. The saints, through weariness of the present life, always pant for eternal rest.---In this place, "depart" is said to mean "remove the force of the scourge." For who is able to rest if God departs, since He alone is rest, and from whomsoever anyone is far off, he becomes so much the more unquiet? Therefore "depart from him" is so said that you may understand "from smiting." For it is aptly subjoined: "Until his longed-for day comes, like that of a hireling." As far as a hireling (mercenarius) is from the end of his work, so far is he also from the retribution of his reward (mercedis). So every holy man placed in this life, while he beholds himself to be far from the end of the present life, groans that he is far from eternal joys. What is it, therefore, to say: "Depart a little from him, that he may rest," but: "withdraw now the scourges of the present life, and show the goods of eternal rest"? Whence also regarding that rest it is added: "Until his longed-for day comes, like that of a hireling." For then the longed-for day comes to a man like that of a hireling, when he shall have received eternal rest as the recompense for his labor. But as far as pertains to the appearance of the present life, blessed Job still suggests how despicable the human race is, filled with many miseries, and relates how much even insensible things seem to surpass it, when he says:

[Vet. III, Rec. IV].

VERSES 7-10.---A tree hath hope; if it be cut down, it groweth green again, and its branches sprout. If its root grow old in the earth, and its trunk be dead in the dust, at the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth foliage as when it was first planted. But man, when he is dead, and stripped, and consumed, where, I pray, is he?

5. By the name of a tree many things are signified: the Cross, the righteous man, the incarnate Wisdom of God. From the smiting of the righteous, men are kindled to the love of the heavenly country.---But because this is plain according to the letter, we ought to reduce the sense to interior things, and search out how these things ought to be understood according to the spirit. For in Sacred Scripture, by the name of a tree (ligni), sometimes the Cross, sometimes a righteous man, or even an unrighteous one, and sometimes the incarnate Wisdom of God is figured. For the Cross is signified by a tree, when it is said: "Let us put wood (lignum) into his bread" (Jer. xi. 19). For to put wood into bread is to apply the Cross to the Lord's body. Again, by the name of a tree, a righteous or even an unrighteous man is expressed, as the Lord says through the prophet: "I the Lord have brought down the high tree, and have exalted the low tree" (Ezek. xvii. 24). Because, according to the voice of the same Truth: "Every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted" (Luke xiv. 11). Solomon also says: "If the tree fall toward the South, or toward the North, in what place soever it shall fall, there it shall be" (Eccles. xi. 3). For in the day of his death the righteous falls toward the South, the sinner toward the North, because both the righteous is led to joys through the fervor of the spirit, and the sinner is rejected in his cold heart with the apostate angel, who said: "I will sit in the mountain of the covenant, in the sides of the North" (Isa. xiv. 13). Again, by a tree the incarnate Wisdom of God is figured, as it is written of it: "It is a tree of life to them that shall lay hold upon it" (Prov. iii. 18); and as He Himself says: "If they do these things in the green wood, what shall be done in the dry?" (Luke xxiii. 31). In this place, therefore, when a tree is preferred to man, what is understood by man but every carnal person? And what is designated by the name of a tree but the life of every righteous man? "For a tree hath hope; if it be cut down, it groweth green again," because when the righteous is afflicted in the death of passion for the truth, he is recovered in the greenness of eternal life. And he who flourished here through faith, flourishes there through sight (speciem). And its branches sprout, because frequently from the passion of the righteous, the faithful are multiplied to the love of the heavenly country, and receive the greenness of spiritual life, while they rejoice that he acted bravely for God here. It follows:

VERSES 8, 9.---If its root grow old in the earth, and its trunk be dead in the dust, at the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth foliage as when it was first planted.

6. The righteous, by their death, beget abundant fruits in us.---What is the root of the righteous but holy preaching, because from it he arises, and in it he subsists? And what is understood by the name of earth or dust but the sinner? to whom it is said by the voice of the Creator: "Earth thou art, and unto earth shalt thou go," or certainly, as our translation has it: "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. iii. 19). The root of the righteous, therefore, grows old in the earth, and the trunk dies in the dust, because among the hearts of the wicked his preaching is believed to be despicable and exhausted of all strength. And the trunk dies in the dust, because between the hands of persecutors his body is deprived of life. For according to the voice of Wisdom: "They seemed in the eyes of the foolish to die, and their affliction was esteemed a departure" (Wisd. iii. 2). But he whose root grew old in the earth, and whose trunk died in the dust, buds at the scent of water, because through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit he produces the germ of virtue in the hearts of the elect by the example of his work. For by the appellation of water, the irrigation of the Holy Spirit is sometimes wont to be designated, as it is written: "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink. But whosoever shall drink of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst" (John vii. 37; iv. 13). It follows: "And it shall bring forth foliage as when it was first planted." To bring forth foliage when the trunk is cut down, is, when the righteous man is corporally extinct, to rouse the hearts of many by the very example of his passion, and to show the greenness of truth from a right faith. But it is well said: "As when it was first planted." Everything which is done here by the righteous is a second planting, because the first planting, forsooth, is not in the work of the righteous, but in the prescience of the Creator. And because all things which the elect do, as they are first seen and disposed within, so are they afterwards perfected without, it is well said: "It shall bring forth foliage as when it was first planted"; that is, it shows its greenness in the effect of the work, which it previously had in the prescience of the Creator.

[Vet. IV.] 7. Man fails of himself, but on the arrival of the Holy Spirit he is renewed.---The root of the righteous can also be understood as the very nature of humanity, from which he subsists. Which root, forsooth, grows old in the earth when the nature of the flesh fails, being reduced to dust. Whose trunk dies in the dust, because the extinct body is dissipated from its form (specie). But it buds at the scent of water, because through the arrival of the Holy Spirit it rises again: "And it shall bring forth foliage as when it was first planted," because it returns to that form (speciem) for receiving which it had been created, if, being placed in paradise, it had been unwilling to sin.

8. Christ is the tree cut down in His passion, multiplied in His resurrection.---Which perhaps can also be understood of the Lord Himself, to wit, the Head of all good men; according to that, forsooth, which we said before, because He says of Himself: "If they do these things in the green wood, what shall be done in the dry?" (Luke xxiii. 31). He said that He was the green wood, and we the dry wood, because He Himself had in Himself the force of Divinity; but we, who are pure men, are called dry wood. A tree (lignum) therefore hath hope, if it be cut down, because it groweth green again, since even if He could be slain through passion, through the glory of resurrection He came again to the greenness of life. His branches sprout, because, being multiplied by His resurrection, the faithful have grown far and wide. His root in the earth, as it were, grew old, because His preaching was despicable to the perfidy of the Jews. And the trunk died in the dust, because in the heart of the persecutors, which was lifted up by the wind of their own perfidy, He was held contemptible and despicable, because

He could be slain in the flesh. But at the scent of water He budded, because through the power of God His extinct flesh returned to life, according to that which is written: "Whom God raised from the dead" (Acts iii. 15). For because God is a Trinity, the Holy Trinity, that is, the Father, and the same Son, and the Holy Spirit, raised up the extinct flesh of the only-begotten Son. And He brought forth foliage as when He was first planted, because that weakness of the Apostles, which at His death trembled, and denied, and by denying withered, through the glory of His resurrection flourished again to faith. In comparison with which tree, what is every man but dust? Whence it is also added:

[Vet. V].

VERSE 10.---But man, when he is dead, and stripped, and consumed, where, I pray, is he?

9. The sinner man dies in guilt, is stripped of righteousness, and is consumed in punishment.---No man is without sin, except He who came not into this world from sin. And because we are all bound in guilt, we die by the very loss of righteousness (justitiae); we are stripped of the garment of innocence previously granted in paradise; we are also consumed by the subsequent destruction of the flesh. The sinner man, therefore, dies in guilt, is stripped of righteousness, and is consumed in punishment. The Father deigned to cover this nakedness of the sinning son, who upon his return said: "Bring forth quickly the first robe" (Luke xv. 22). For the first robe is the garment of innocence, which man, being well created, received, but being evilly persuaded by the serpent, lost. Against this nakedness again it is said: "Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked" (Rev. xvi. 15). For we keep our garments when we preserve the precepts of innocence in the mind, so that when guilt strips us before the Judge, penance may cover us as we return to our lost innocence. But it is well said: "Where, I pray, is he?" because the sinner man was unwilling to stand there where he was created; but here, where he fell, he is forbidden to be for long. He lost his country willingly, but from his pilgrimage which he loves he is expelled unwillingly. Where, therefore, is he, who in the love of Him is not where true being is? It follows:

CHAPTER VII.

VERSES 11, 12.---As if the waters should depart from the sea, and the river emptied should dry up, so man, when he hath fallen asleep, shall not rise again.

10. The human mind is like to the surging sea.---The sea is the mind of man, and the thoughts of the mind are as it were the waves of the sea, which sometimes swell through wrath (iram), are made tranquil through grace (gratiam), and flow away with bitterness through hatred. But when man dies, the waters of the sea depart, because, according to the voice of the Psalmist: "In that day all their thoughts shall perish" (Ps. cxlvi. 4). And again it is written of the dying: "Their love also and hatred shall perish together" (Eccles. ix. 6). Therefore the river emptied dries up, because, the soul being withdrawn, the body remains empty. For a lifeless body is as it were the empty bed of a river. In which matter it is to be vigilantly considered that the present life, to wit, as long as the soul dwells in the body, is compared to the sea and a river. For the water of the sea is bitter, that of the river sweet. And because we who live here are sometimes affected by certain bitterness (amaritudinibus), and sometimes are found tranquil and mild in sweetness, the course of the present life is expressed by the comparison of the sea and the river.

11. [Vet. VI, Rec. V.] Job does not absolutely deny the resurrection, but only that it will be before the end of the world.---But in these things it seems very hard which is subjoined: "So man, when he hath fallen asleep, shall not rise again." Why therefore do we labor, if we do not tend toward the retribution (retributionem) of resurrection? But how is it said: "He shall not rise again," when it is written: "We shall all indeed rise again, but we shall not all be changed" (1 Cor. xv. 51)? And again: "If in this life only we are hoping in Christ, we are more miserable than all men" (1 Cor. xv. 19). And Truth Himself says: "All that are in the graves shall hear His voice, and they that have done good shall come forth unto the resurrection of life" (John v. 28). But the sentence subjoined indicates what distinction lies hidden in the one premises. For it is subjoined:

CHAPTER VIII.

VERSE 12.---Until the heaven be worn away, he shall not awake, nor rise up out of his sleep.

12. For it is clear that he shall not rise, to wit, until the heaven be worn away, because unless the end of this world arrive, the human race will not awake to life from the sleep of death. He does not therefore suggest that he will not rise at all, but that the human race will by no means rise before the wearing away (contritionem) of the heaven. It is also to be noted why, after he called man dead above, below he names him not dead, but sleeping, and relates that he by no means rises from his sleep until the heaven be worn away; except that it is plainly given to be understood that, in comparison with the reviving tree, he calls the dead man a sinner, to wit, one extinct from the life of righteousness (justitiae). But where he speaks of the death of the flesh, he preferred to call this not death, but sleep, suggesting beyond doubt the hope of resurrection, because just as a man quickly awakes from sleep, so he may speedily rise from the death of the body at the nod of the Creator. For the name of death is vehemently dreaded by weak minds, but the word for sleep is not feared. Whence Paul also, admonishing the disciples, says: "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him" (1 Thess. iv. 13). What is it that the eminent preacher calls the death of the Lord "death," but the death of the servants of the Lord he names not death, but "sleep," except that, looking back at the weak hearts of the hearers, he composes the medicine of his preaching with wonderful art, and doubts not to suggest to them as "dead" Him whom they already knew to have risen; but those who had not yet risen, in order to suggest the hope of resurrection, he calls not dead, but "sleeping"? For he was not afraid to call "dead" Him whom the hearers already knew to have risen, and he was afraid to call "dead" those whom they scarcely believed would rise. Blessed Job, therefore, because he doubts not that those dead in the flesh will awake again to life, calls them sleeping rather than dead. It follows:

CHAPTER IX

[Vet. VII, Rec. VI].

VERSE 13.---Who will grant me this, that Thou mayest protect me in hell?

13. A twofold hell: one lower, for the punishment of the wicked; the other higher, destined for the reception of the righteous until the coming of Christ.---Because before the coming of the Mediator of God and man (mediatoris Dei et hominis), every man, although he were of a pure and approved life, descended to the enclosures of hell, there is no doubt, since man, who fell by himself, could not by himself return to the rest of paradise (paradisi), unless He should come who by the mystery of His incarnation might open to us the way to that same paradise. Whence also after the fault of the first man, a flaming sword (romphaea flammea) is recorded to have been placed at the entrance of paradise (Gen. iii. 24), which is also said to be turning every way, for the reason that a time would at length come when it might even be removed. Yet we do not say that the souls of the righteous so descended to hell as to be held in penal places. But it is to be believed that there are higher places of hell, and that there are others lower, so that in the higher the righteous might rest, and in the lower the unrighteous might be tormented. Whence also the Psalmist, on account of the grace of God preventing him, says: "Thou hast delivered my soul from the lower hell" (Ps. lxxxvi. 13). Blessed Job, therefore, knowing that he would descend to hell before the arrival of the Mediator, asks for the protection of his Creator there, that he may exist far from the penal places, where, while he is led to rest, he may be hidden from torments. Whence he subjoins:

CHAPTER X

[Rec. VII].

IBID.---And that Thou wouldst hide me until Thy wrath be passed.

14. The wrath of God is free from perturbation, and is consummated in the end of the world.--- The wrath also of the Almighty God daily carries out the force of His strictness (districtionis) in this, that He plunges those living unworthily into worthy punishments. Which wrath indeed passes now, but in the end it passes through, because it is now being carried out, but in the term of the world it is consummated. Which wrath nevertheless, as far as pertains to the souls of the elect, passed through in the arrival of our Redeemer, because He, the Mediator of God and men (mediator Dei et hominum), while He Himself piously descended thither, led them back from the enclosures of hell to the joys of paradise. But among these things it is to be known that the name of wrath (furoris) does not agree with the Divinity, because no perturbation confounds the simple nature of God. Whence it is said to Him: "But Thou, Lord of power, judgest with tranquillity, and with great reverence disposest of us" (Wisd. xii. 18). But because the souls of the righteous were at some time to be delivered from the places of hell, although not penal, through the arrival of the Mediator, the righteous man also foresees this, and subjoins by entreating:

CHAPTER XI

[Vet. and Rec. VIII].

IBID.---And that Thou wouldst appoint me a time, in which Thou mayest remember me?

15. Christ led out from hell only those whom He foreknew had cleaved to Him.---But when the fullness of time was come, God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law (Gal. iv. 4). The man of the Lord, therefore, foreknowing this redemption, in which many even from the Gentiles were to be delivered, as He Himself says: "Though Thou hidest these things in Thine heart, yet I know that Thou rememberest all" (Job x. 13), asks for a time to be appointed for him for his remembrance before the Almighty God. For hence it is that the Lord says in the Gospel: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all things unto Myself" (John xii. 32), to wit, all the elect things. For the Lord, returning from hell, did not draw the elect and the reprobate together, but He took away from thence all those things which He foreknew had cleaved to Him. Whence also He says through the prophet Hosea: "I will be thy death, O death; I will be thy bite, O hell" (Hos. xiii. 14). For what we kill, we act so that it may not be at all. From that which we bite, we draw away a part, and a part we leave. Because, therefore, in His elect the Lord fundamentally killed death, He became the death of death. But because He took away a part from hell, and a part He left, He did not kill hell fundamentally, but He bit it. He says therefore: "I will be thy death, O death"; that is, in My elect I fundamentally destroy thee. I will be thy bite, O hell," because, they being taken away, I transfix thee in part. Blessed Job therefore, knowing this arrival of our Redeemer to those in hell, asks for that which he foresaw as future, and says: "And that Thou wouldst appoint me a time in which Thou mayest remember me." It follows:

CHAPTER XII.

VERSE 14.---Thinkest thou a dead man shall live again?

16. Sometimes words of weakness are to be taken up by the strong.---Just men are wont, in that which they feel certain and solid, to utter something as if out of doubt, so that they may transfer the words of the weak to themselves. But again, by a strong sentence, they altogether contradict the doubt of the weak one, in order that by that which they are seen to utter doubtingly they may in some degree condescend to the weak, and by that which they utter as a certain sentence, they may draw the doubting minds of the weak to solidity. This indeed they do while they follow the example of our Head. For the Lord, approaching His Passion, took upon Himself the voice of the weak, saying: "My Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me" (Matt. xxvi. 39), and He took up their fear, that He might withdraw it; and again, showing the force of fortitude through obedience, He says: "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt" (Ibid. 39), so that when that is imminent which we do not wish to be done, we may so ask through weakness that it be not done, that through fortitude we may be ready that the will of our Creator be done even against our own will. By this example, therefore, words of weakness are sometimes to be taken up by the strong, so that through them, after strong preachings, the hearts of the weak may be more graciously strengthened. Whence blessed Job, when he brought forth words as if of one doubting, saying: "Thinkest thou a dead man shall live again?" immediately added the sentence of his certainty, in which he says:

CHAPTER XIII

[Vet. and Rec. IX].

IBID.---All the days, in which I now serve as a soldier, I wait until my change come.

17. Job, having despised the course of this life, seeks the state of immutability.---He therefore who waits for his change with such great desire, hints how certain he is of the resurrection; and he makes known how much he despises the course of this present life, who calls it warfare (militiam). For in warfare it is always tended towards the end, and daily the term of the conclusion is expected. He therefore despises the course of this life, and seeks the state of solidity, who, because he serves as a soldier changeably, hastens to arrive at his change. For to the just man in this life the very burden of his corruption is heavy. Because vigils weary him, sleep is sought, so that the labor and anxiety of the vigils may be tempered. But sometimes even sleep kills. Hunger wears away the body, and that its necessity may be repelled, foods are required; but often even foods burden, which had been sought for repelling the burden of debility. Heavy, therefore, is the burden of corruption, which if it were not so heavy, Paul would by no means say: "The creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that every creature groaneth and travaileth in pain until now" (Rom. viii. 20). The holy man, therefore, desiring the state of incorruption, let him say: "All the days, in which I now serve as a soldier, I wait until my change come." In which change what is done, he adds:

CHAPTER XIV

[Rec. X].

VERSE 15.---Thou shalt call me, and I will answer Thee.

18. We shall answer God when He calls, when at His command we shall rise again incorruptible.---We are said to answer anyone when we return works suitable in turn to his deeds. In that change, therefore, the Lord calls, and man answers, because before the brightness of the Incorrupt One, man is shown incorrupt after corruption. For now, as long as we are subject to corruption, we by no means answer our Author, because while corruption is far from incorruption, there is no suitable likeness for our answer. But of that change it is written: "When He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is" (1 John iii. 2). Then, therefore, we shall truly answer God when He calls, when at the command of the highest incorruption we shall rise again incorruptible. And because the creature cannot perceive this from itself, but it is done by the gift of the Almighty God alone, that it may be changed to such great glory of incorruption, it is rightly added:

CHAPTER XV

[Rec. XI].

IBID.---Thou wilt reach out Thy right hand to the work of Thy hands.

19. What man cannot attain of himself.---As if he were to say plainly: Therefore Thy corruptible creature can persist unto incorruption, because it is raised up by the hand of Thy power, and is held by the grace of Thy regard, that it may persist. For the human creature, by the very fact that it is a creature, has in itself a tendency to flow down beneath itself; but from his Creator man has received that he may both be snatched above himself in contemplation, and be held in incorruption in himself. Lest the creature, therefore, should flow down beneath itself, but that it may persist in incorruption, it is lifted up to the state of immutability by the right hand of its Author. Also by the name of the right hand the Son can be designated: because "all things were made by Him" (John i. 3). Almighty God, therefore, reached out His right hand to the work of His hands, because that He might raise up the human race, abject and lying in the lowest things, to the highest, He sent His only-begotten Son incarnate for this. From whose incarnation it has been given to us, that we who by our own will fell into corruption, may be able at some time to answer God when He calls us to the glory of incorruption. In which matter who can weigh the bounty of the divine mercy, that He brings man to such great glory after fault? God weighs the evils which we do, and yet through the grace of His kindness He mercifully releases them. Whence also it is added:

CHAPTER XVI

[Rec. XII].

VERSE 16.---For now Thou numberest my steps, but Thou sparest my sins.

20. Our faults, lest God punish them, are to be chastised by penance.---God numbers our steps when He marks our several works for the sake of retribution. For what is designated by steps, but our every action? Almighty God, therefore, both numbers our steps and spares our sins, because He both considers our deeds subtilely, and yet mercifully releases them to those who do penance. He also beholds hardness in those who sin, but yet, by preventing grace, He softens it to penance. He numbers our faults, therefore, when He turns us to bewailing each thing we have done. Which He mercifully releases, because while we punish them ourselves, He by no means judges them in the last examination, Paul attesting, who says: "If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged" (1 Cor. xi. 31). Whence it is still added:

[Vet. XI].

VERSE 17.---Thou hast sealed up my transgressions as in a bag, but Thou hast healed my iniquity.

21. Sins, unless they are washed away by penance, will come out from the bag of secrecy to the public of judgment.---Our transgressions are sealed up as in a bag, because that which we do outwardly, unless we wash it away by intervening penance, is kept in the secret of the judgments of God under a certain hiding, so that at some time it may even come out from the bag of secrecy to the public of judgment. Whence also it is said through Moses: "Are not these things stored up with Me, and sealed up in My treasures? In the day of vengeance I will repay them" (Deut. xxxii. 34, 35). But when for the evils which we have done we are worn away by the scourge of discipline, and bewail these through penance, He seals up and heals our iniquity, because He neither leaves them unavenged here, nor reserves them to be punished in judgment. He seals up transgressions, therefore, because He here subtilely attends to them that He may smite; but He heals them, because He fundamentally releases them through the scourge. Whence also He healed, by sealing, the iniquity of that persecutor of His whom He had prostrated on the earth, when He said of him to Ananias: "He is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel. For I will show him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake" (Acts ix. 15). For to him to whom He still threatens future passions for past excesses, He surely held that in which he had offended sealed in His heart. But without doubt He had healed his transgressions by sealing them, whom He called a chosen vessel. Or certainly our sins are sealed in a bag when we always weigh the evils we have done with a solicitous heart. For what is the heart of man but the bag of God? Where, while we carefully behold how much we offend, we carry our sins as if sealed in the bag of God. Did not David hold his sin sealed in a bag, who said: "I acknowledge my iniquity, and my sin is ever before me" (Ps. li. 5)? And because our pious Creator releases the faults which we know by looking at them and doing penance, it is rightly added after "transgressions sealed in a bag": "But Thou hast healed my iniquity." As if he were to say openly: Those things which Thou now sealest that I may see them by doing penance, Thou surely doest that they may not be seen in retribution. It follows:

CHAPTER XVIII

VERSES 18, 19.---And surely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place. The waters wear the stones, and the earth is consumed by little and little by the flood; and so Thou destroyest men likewise.

22. Some are overturned by sudden, others by slow and soft temptations.---This frequently happens that, when rocks fall, a stone is transferred to other places; that waters wear the stones, and the earth is consumed by little and little by floods. But we must discuss with great intention that which is brought in: "And so Thou destroyest men likewise." For what is this, that the destruction of man is compared to a falling mountain and a transferred rock, to a worn stone and to earth consumed by a flood, except that which is plainly given to be understood, because there are two kinds of temptations (tentationum)? One, which is acted in the mind even of a just man through a sudden event, so that he is so suddenly tempted, that it shakes and prostrates him by an unexpected issue, and he sees not his fall except after he has fallen. But the other, which comes by little and little into the mind, and infects the resisting soul with soft suggestions, and consumes all the powers of justice (justitiae) in him, not by its excess, but by its assiduity. Because, therefore, there is one temptation which for the most part prostrates the just by a sudden invasion, let it be said: "The mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place"; that is, the holy mind, whose place had been justice, is by a sudden impulse transferred to fault. Again, because there is another temptation, which softly pours itself into the heart of man, and corrupts and consumes all the hardness of fortitude (fortitudinis), let it be said: "The waters wear the stones," because namely the assiduous and soft allurements of lust absorb the hardness of the mind, and a slow and subtle vice corrupts the hard and strong purpose of the mind. Whence it is added: "And the earth is consumed by little and little by the flood." For as the earth is consumed by little and little as the water flows in, so the mind even if strong is absorbed by vice softly creeping in. Whence it is well added: "And so Thou destroyest men likewise." That is, because when by a just judgment Thou permittest a temptation suddenly to master the mind of him who is seen to stand on high, Thou makest the mountain to fall and come to nought; and when the will is changed to vice, the rock is as it were transferred to another place; but when Thou permittest a slow and subtle, but yet assiduous temptation to prevail over the minds of those who are believed to be strong, it is as if the waters wear the stones, and the earth is consumed by little and little by the flood, because surely the hardness of the mind, being subdued by soft suggestion, is softened.

23. David, a high mountain, fell by a sudden fall. Solomon by the slowly creeping allurement of sin. ---Let us see how great a high mountain that David was, who was able to contemplate such great mysteries of God with a prophetic spirit; but let us behold by how sudden a fall he flowed down, who while, walking on the solar, he lusted after and took another's wife, and slew her husband with the loss of his army (2 Sam. xi. 4, etc.), the mountain fell by a sudden fall, when that mind accustomed to heavenly mysteries was overcome by an unexpected temptation, and subdued to such an immense baseness. The rock therefore was transferred from its place, when the mind of the prophet, excluded from the mysteries of prophecy, came to think of basenesses. Let us see also how the waters wear the stones, and the earth is consumed by little and little by the flood. For Solomon was led even to this by the immoderate use and assiduity of women, that he should build a temple to idols (1 Kings xi. 7); and he who had first built a temple to God, being underlaid by the assiduity of lust, even of perfidy, feared not to build temples to idols. And so it was done that he arrived from the assiduous petulance of the flesh even to the perfidy of the mind. What else then than the waters wore the stone, and the earth was consumed by little and little by the flood, because as the infusion of sin crept in for a little while, the earth of his heart flowed down to consumption? Let blessed Job, therefore, consider both temptations, either the sudden and immense, or the slow and longer; let him consider the falls of men, and from those things which happen outwardly let him snatch contemplation inwardly, saying: "The mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place. The waters wear the stones, and the earth is consumed by little and little by the flood; and so Thou destroyest men likewise"; that is, as these insensible things are now suddenly overthrown, now consumed by the softness of waters infused for a little while, so also him whom Thou hast created rational, Thou either castest down by a sudden temptation, or permittest to be consumed by a long and slow one. And presently he explains the same rational creature in the following words, saying:

CHAPTER XIX.

VERSE 20.---Thou hast strengthened him for a little while, that he should pass away for ever.

24. Eternity succeeds a short life.---Man has been strengthened for a little while, because he has received the strength of living here for a moderate time, that he may pass away for ever to where a limit does not conclude his life. But in this brevity where he has been strengthened, he gathers from whence he may find in perpetuity, either that he may always rejoice, or that he may not escape the punishments he has received. Because he was strengthened for a little while that he might pass away for ever, it is fitly added presently:

[Rec. XIV].

IBID.---Thou shalt change his face, and send him away.

25. How great the change of man in death.---The face of man is changed when his appearance is worn away by death. But he is sent away, because he is compelled against his will to pass from those things which he held willingly to eternal things; and while he is being led to those, he knows not how these things which he held long in thought will be when they are left. Whence also it is added.

CHAPTER XXI

[Vet. XIII].

VERSE 21. Whether his children were noble, or ignoble, he does not understand.

26. The souls of the saints seeing God, ignore nothing of those things which are outside of them; otherwise others.---For as those who are still living are ignorant of the place where the souls of the dead are kept, so the dead know not how the life of those living in the flesh after them is ordered, because both the life of the spirit is far from the life of the flesh; and as corporeal and incorporeal things are diverse in kind, so also by distinct knowledge. Which, however, is not to be felt concerning holy souls, because it is by no means to be believed that those who see within the brightness of Almighty God, should be ignorant of anything that is without. But every carnal person, because they bestow chief love on their children, the blessed Job asserts that they afterwards know not this which they loved vehemently here, so that whether their children be noble, or ignoble, they know not, whom their care always wearied. Which, however, if it ought to be understood spiritually, not incongruously are works designated by the name of children; as Paul says of the woman: Because she shall be saved through the generation of children (1 Tim.

2:15). For neither will a woman who, studying continence, by no means generates children, not be saved, but she is said to be saved through the generation of children, because through the effect of good works she is joined to perpetual salvation. Noble children, therefore, are right works, but ignoble are perverse deeds. And often a man strives to do any good with a right intention; but yet for many things, which creep in, it is uncertain how his acts are held before Almighty God. Whether, therefore, his children were noble, or ignoble, he does not understand, because, having been discussed by a subtle examination, he is ignorant whether his works are approved or reproved. And here, therefore, man is placed in the pain of labor, and there he is led in the fear of suspicion. Whence still concerning the labor of the present life itself it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXII.

VERSE 22.---But his flesh, while he lives, shall have pain, and his soul shall mourn over himself.

27. They who delight in the pleasures of the flesh, experience greater tribulations from the flesh.---Of the married Paul says: Nevertheless such shall have trouble in the flesh (1 Cor. 7:28). But even those who already live spiritually can suffer trouble of the flesh here. Why then is trouble of the flesh said as if specially to be in the married, which also is not far from the life of the spiritual, unless because those frequently receive greater tribulations from the flesh who delight in the pleasures of the flesh? But it is well said: And his soul shall mourn over himself, because whoever desires to rejoice in himself, is already in mourning by that very thing by which he has departed from true joy. For the true joy of the mind is the Creator. It is worthy, therefore, that man should always find sorrows in himself, who, having forsaken the Creator, sought joy in himself. It follows.

CHAPTER XXIII

[Vet. XIV, Rec. XV].

CHAP. XV, VERS. 1, 2.---Then answered Eliphaz the Temanite, and said: Should a wise man answer as if speaking into the wind, and fill his belly with heat?

28. The wicked consider the words of the good not as sentences of reason, but as goads of fury.---We have frequently said already that the blessed Job holds the type of the holy universal Church, but his friends that of heretics, who, as if in defense of the Lord, find occasion for foolish speech, and hurl contumelious words against the good. To whom all things which are felt by the faithful displease as if uttered into the wind. Whence it is now said: Should a wise man answer as if speaking into the wind? Nor do they think the words of the good to be sayings of reason, but goads of fury. Whence also it is added: And he shall fill his belly with heat. Because even those things which they know they say contumeliously, they always study, as has been said, to cloak from the defense of the Lord. Whence Eliphaz adds:

CHAPTER XXIV.

VERSE 3.---Thou arguest with words him who is not equal to thee, and speakest that which is not expedient for thee.

29. While heretics do not find true things to reproach, they feign false ones.---They think no one to have the fear of the Lord, unless him whom they could draw to the folly of their own confession. Whence he adds:---VERSE 4---As much as in thee is, thou hast made void fear, and hast taken away prayers before God. 'Tulisti' is said for 'abstulisti' (taken away), as if he said openly: Presuming on thy own justice, thou despisest to deprecate the grace of thy Creator. For when heretics do not find true evils against the good, they feign what they may redargue, so that they may seem to be just, and it happens for the most part that they arrive at open words of contumelies. Whence still it is added:

CHAPTER XXV.

VERSE 5.---For thy iniquity has taught thy mouth, and thou imitatest the tongue of blasphemers.

30. Caring in appearance for the honor of God, they detract from His goodness. ---Iniquity teaches the mouth when from an evil life that which is worse is conceived to be said. But because the blessed Job was as free in mouth as he was just in work, he is reproved by his friends holding the type of heretics, both for an iniquitous life and for an audacious mouth, so that it is said: For thy iniquity has taught thy mouth. As if it were said openly to him: What thou speakest perversely, thou hast learned from a more perverse life. For often heretics, while as it were they venerate God, contradict His mysteries, and think it humility if they deny the truth. For there are some who think they bring an injury upon God if they confess that He assumed true flesh, or if they should believe that He could truly die for us in the flesh. And while they try to bestow as it were more honor on God, they are compelled to deny the true praises of His goodness. For what is more powerful in the praise of His charity than that He should make those things worthy for His own reception for us, which to Him seem unworthy? But the Holy Church confesses His true flesh, His true death; but saying these things, she is believed by heretics to bring contumely upon God. Whence it is now said: And thou imitatest the tongue of blasphemers. To whom if any adversity should happen in this world, they say that this happens to her from this very injury of her confession. Whence still it is added:

CHAPTER XXVI.

VERSE 6.---Thy own mouth shall condemn thee, and not I, and thy lips shall answer thee.

31. They dote that the confession of the right faith is punished by the scourges of adversity.--- For because they think that the evils of adversity burst forth from the error of confession, they assert that his own lips answer him, so that the fault of eloquence should be the cause of the scourge. But sometimes they wish to restrain it as if by reasoning. [Vet. XV.] Whence Eliphaz strives to reprove the blessed Job as if from reason, saying:

CHAPTER XXVII.

VERSE 7, 8.---Art thou the first man born, and wast thou formed before the hills? Hast thou heard the counsel of God, and will His wisdom be inferior to thee?

32. While they seem to defend the divine glory, they look to their own.---As if he should say in plainer words: Thou who speakest of the Eternal, consider that thou art temporal; thou who disputest of His wisdom, consider that thou art ignorant of His counsel. But because heretics assume the words of the defense of the Lord for this purpose, so that they may seem to be learned, and while they seem to defend the divine glory, they may make known their own knowledge to men, these subjoined words of Eliphaz testify this, who indeed began to speak of the wisdom of God, but immediately fell to his own elation, saying:

VERSE 9.---What knowest thou that we ignore? what understandest thou that we know not?

Which sayings indeed plainly show from what elation of mind whatever sounds as if for the defense of the Lord proceeds. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VERSE 10.---Both the aged and the ancient are with us, much older than thy fathers.

33. They falsely flatter themselves with the mastery and consensus of the ancient fathers.---Because all heretics have gone out from the holy universal Church, John testifies, who says: They went out from us, but they were not of us (1 John 2:19). But so that they may commend those things which they assert to the foolish minds of men as if from antiquity, they testify that they have the ancient fathers, and they call those doctors of the Church masters of their own profession. And while they despise the present preachers, they glory with a false presumption in the mastery of the ancient Fathers, so that they may confess that the ancient fathers also held those things which they themselves speak, in order that what they are unable to build up by rectitude they may confirm as if by their authority. But because it is written: Whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth, but scourgeth every son whom he receiveth (Heb. 12:6). Often the Holy Church labors in many adversities in this life, and the life of the reprobate is dismissed so much without a scourge, as it is reserved for no rewards. But the heretics seeing the afflictions of the Holy Church, despise her, and suspect that she is worn away by so many scourges from the merit of a depraved profession. Whence still it is added:

CHAPTER XXIX.

VERSE 11.---Is it a great thing for God to comfort thee? but thy depraved words forbid this.

34. They despise the afflicted Church.---As if he should plainly say to him: If thou shouldst correct thy profession of faith, thou wouldst long since have been able to have comfort from the scourges. It follows:

CHAPTER XXX.

VERSE 12.---Why does thy heart lift thee up, and, as if thinking of great things, hast thou astonished eyes?

35. They mock the contemplation of the saints, having never experienced it.---Often the mind of the just is so suspended to contemplate higher things, that externally their face seems to have been astonished. But because heretics are ignorant that this force of contemplation acts in secret, they think this is done by the just and the rightly wise more by hypocrisy than by truth, because they do not suspect that this which they themselves cannot have truly exists in others. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXI.

VERSE 13.---Why does thy spirit swell against God, that thou shouldest let such words go out of thy mouth?

36. The words of the just and the wicked are often similar, but the heart is dissimilar. Heretics mix certain truths with falsehoods, which are not to be rejected.---Mostly the just, afflicted by some necessities, are compelled to confess their own works, which blessed Job had done, whom after his righteousness the scourges were depressing; but when the unjust hear their sayings, they think these were brought forth by elation rather than by truth. For they weigh the words of the just from their own hearts, and they do not think that good words can be said humbly. For as it is a grave fault for a man to arrogate to himself that which he is not, so mostly there is no fault if he humbly says the good which he is. Whence it often happens that the just and the unjust have similar words, but yet the heart is always far dissimilar, and by which sayings the Lord is offended by the unjust, in the same also he is appeased by the just. For the Pharisee having entered the temple, said: I fast twice in the Sabbath, I give tithes of all that I possess (Luke 18:12); but the publican went out justified rather than he. King Hezekiah also when, afflicted by trouble of body, he had come to the extremity of life, being compunct in prayer said: I beseech thee, O Lord, remember, I pray, how I have walked before thee in truth and with a perfect heart (Isai. 38:3). Nor yet did the Lord despise or refuse this confession of his perfection, whom he soon heard in his prayers. Behold the Pharisee justified himself in work, and Hezekiah asserted himself to be just even in thought, and whence that one offended, thence this one appeased the Lord. Why therefore this, unless because Almighty God weighs the words of each from the thoughts, and in his ears those are not proud which are brought forth with a humble heart? Whence blessed Job, when he brought forth his works, in no way swelled against God, because he said humbly those things which he had truly done. But heretics are wont to mix some truths with the sayings of their errors, and the friends of blessed Job, although in their reproof of him they are in every way deceived, can yet also say some true things, which they learned from his constancy. If all their sayings were to be refuted, the Apostle Paul would by no means have brought forth the sentence of Eliphaz, saying: He taketh the wise in their own craftiness (1 Cor. 3:19). Because therefore even those things which they say rightly they do not say rightly against blessed Job, let us in their sayings both tread upon the vice of indiscretion (indiscretionis), and discuss the strengths of rectitude. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXII.

VERSE 14.---What is man, that he should be without spot?

37. Man having arisen from the ground (humus) and from a woman, who can he be without stain?---For by the very fact that he is called man (homo), he is expressed as earthly and weak: for man (homo) was named from the ground (humo). And how is he able to be without spot, who of his own accord fell to weakness having been made from the earth? Where also it is added,---IBID.---And that he should appear just, who is born of a woman. For the woman first offered injustice to the man in paradise. How therefore will he appear just, who is born of her who existed as the prompter of injustice? It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIII.

VERSE 15.---Behold among his saints no one is immutable, and the heavens are not clean in his sight.

38. God alone is without mutability.---By this name of the heavens he repeated what he previously signified by the appellation of the saints. For of the same saints it is written: The heavens declare the glory of God (Psal. 19:1). Who by nature all have in themselves their own mutability; but while they always desire to cleave studiously to the immutable truth, by cleaving they act so that they become immutable. And when they hold themselves to this with all affection, at some time they receive that, being led above themselves, they overcome this which they existed as mutable in themselves. For what is mutability but a kind of death? Which while it changes any thing into another, as it were kills that which it had been, that it may begin to be that which it was not. And of the author of all it is written: Who alone hath immutability (1 Tim. 6:16), because namely in himself he alone is immutable. Of whom it is said by James: With whom there is no change, nor shadow of vicissitude (James 1:17). For mutability itself is a shadow, which would as it were obscure the light, if it changed it by some vicissitudes. But because in God mutability does not come, no shadow of vicissitude cuts off his light. But it is well said: The heavens are not clean in his sight, because by themselves before the strict judgment of God not even they themselves can be clean to perfection who become preachers of cleanness, John attesting, who says: If we shall say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves (1 John 1:8). If therefore among his saints no one is immutable, and the heavens in his sight are not clean, who should presume in himself of the work of justice? Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXIV.

VERSE 16.---How much more abominable and useless is man, who drinketh iniquity like water?

39. Our evil works are most wicked, but our good ones are imperfect and useless.---He who had previously denied that man could be immaculate and just through himself, calls him abominable and useless: abominable namely on account of the uncleanness of his spot, but useless on account of the injustice of an imperfect life. Which abominable and useless can also be understood in another way. For sometimes a perverse man seems to do some things rightly, but through those which are iniquitous even those things of his which are right are destroyed. And because evil things greatly displease God, neither do those things please which seem good. He therefore who in his evils is abominable to God, in his good things is useless, because while he exhibits himself execrable to God through wicked works, neither does that in him which seems right please. But it is well said: Who drinketh iniquity like water. For that which is eaten is swallowed with delay, because it is chewed that it may be swallowed. But that which is drunk, has tanto less delay for swallowing, as it has no necessity even for chewing. Guilt therefore, because it is perpetrated by a foolish man without any retraction, is drunk like water iniquity. For because he does unlawful things without fear, he swallows as it were a draught of injustice without obstacle. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXV.

VERSE 17.---I will show thee, hear me, what I have seen I will tell thee.

40. The proud, the higher they rise by understanding, the more grievously they fall by elation.---All the arrogant have this as their own, that when they have sensed anything right or small, they bend this into the use of elation; and whence they become higher to themselves through understanding, thence through swelling they fall into the pit of elation, and they think themselves more learned than the learned, they exact reverence to themselves from their betters, and they contend to teach the more holy as if from authority. Whence it is now said: I will show thee, hear me. And because he who speaks things heard teaches with less authority than he who speaks those things which he has seen, that Eliphaz may arrogate to himself a stronger authority, he says: What I have seen I will tell thee. But because heretics are sometimes confounded concerning their damned fathers, and yet they bring forth their sentences into the midst as if with authority, from whose folly they are justly reproved, the audacity of the heretics is rightly subjoined, when it is said:

CHAPTER XXXVI.

VERSE 18.---Wise men confess, and they do not hide their fathers.

41. How foolishly the heretics boast of wise men, whom they had as masters of error.---Into whose praise they also break forth, and they glory that those as if alone presided over the Church. Whence it is still subjoined:---VERSE 19:---To whom alone the earth was given, and no alien passed through them. They think the earth was given to their fathers alone, because they think that the masters of their errors alone truly ruled the Church. But who is called an alien but the apostate angel? Whence also it is said by the Psalmist concerning all the malignant spirits together: For aliens have risen up against me, and the strong have sought my soul (Psal. 54:3). Heretics therefore, because they think the hearts of their doctors were not subject to the apostate angel, deny that an alien passed through them. To which alien namely to pass through each one is to put iniquitous thoughts into his heart. Whence also it is said through the voice of the prophet concerning the malignant spirits against a standing soul: And they said to thy soul: Bow down that we may pass through (Isai. 51:23). But Eliphaz the Temanite, because he wishes to be heard since he is about to narrate certain things, although he knows many things which are to be said, but because he does not know that they were not to be said to blessed Job, let us hear the sentences which he brought forth against blessed Job. For we ought not to weigh to whom, but only what he said. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

VERSE 20.---All his days the wicked man is proud.

42. The elect end their life in humility, the reprobate in pride.---The elect also are wont to be proud in some of their thoughts and acts. But because they are elect, they cannot be proud all their days, because before they finish their life, they change their hearts from the elation of the heart to the fear of humility. But the wicked man is proud in all his days, because he so ends his life, that he by no means departs from elation. He looks around at that which flourishes temporally, and neglects to weigh whither he is led for eternity. He places confidence in the life of the flesh, and thinks those things will long remain which he holds for the present. The mind is solidified in elation, every neighbor is brought into contempt; he never considers how sudden death may creep up; he never weighs how uncertain his happiness may be. Who if he beheld the uncertainty of a fleeting life, would by no means hold uncertain things for certain. Whence also it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

IBID.---And the number of the years of his tyranny is uncertain.

43. Death ought to be feared, because it cannot be foreseen.---For he ought by no means to have been proud, even if he could have had the number of his years certain, so that knowing how long he would live, he might foresee when he would remove himself from elation. But after the present life is always uncertain, so much the more always should death creeping up be feared, as it can never be foreseen. But he well calls the pride of the wicked a tyranny. For properly he is called a tyrant who does not rule by right in a common republic. But it is to be known that every proud man exercises a tyranny according to his own measure. For what sometimes one does in a republic, that is, through the received power of dignity, another does in a province, another in a city, another in his own house, another through hidden wickedness exercises this within himself in his own thought. Nor does the Lord behold how much of evil each one is able to do, but how much he wishes. And when power is lacking without, he is a tyrant within himself, in whom iniquity rules within, because even if externally he does not afflict his neighbors, internally nevertheless he can desire to have power that he may afflict. And because Almighty God weighs the hearts, already in his eyes the wicked man has done what he thought. But for this our Creator willed our end to be hidden from us, that while we are uncertain when we may die, we may always be found prepared for death. Whence rightly after it was said: All his days the wicked man is proud, he joins: And the number of the years of his tyranny is uncertain. As if it were openly said: Why is he extolled as if concerning a certainty, whose life is held under the penalty of uncertainty? But Almighty God not only reserves future punishments for those who act wickedly, but he involves their hearts in punishments even here where they transgress, so that by the very fact that they sin they may strike themselves, so that always trembling and always suspicious they may fear to suffer evil things from others, which they remember they have done to others. Whence still concerning this wicked man it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXIX.

VERSE 21.---The sound of dread is always in his ears; and when there is peace, he suspecteth snares.

44. Simplicity of heart is a most fortified citadel.---But nothing is happier than a simple heart, because in that it exhibits innocence towards others, there is nothing which it may dread to suffer from others. For it has its own simplicity as it were a certain citadel of strength. Nor is it suspicious of suffering what it does not remember to have done. Whence it is well said through Solomon: In the fear of the Lord is the confidence of strength (Prov. 14:26). Who also says again: A secure mind is as a continual feast (Prov. 15:15). For the very tranquility of security is as it were a continuation of refreshment. But on the contrary a perverse mind is always in labors, because either it devises evil things which it may bring upon others, or it fears lest these be brought upon itself by others. And whatever it devises against its neighbors, this it dreads to be devised against itself by its neighbors. It becomes on every side suspicious, on every side trembling. Every one who comes to memory is believed to seek contrary things. To him therefore whom the tranquility of security is lacking, to him without doubt the sound of dread is always in his ears. And it often happens that any neighbor of his speaks to him simply, and thinks nothing adverse. But when there is peace, he suspecteth snares, because he who always acts deceitfully, does not think that it is acted simply towards him. And because it is written: The wicked man when he shall have come into the depth of sins, contemneth (Prov. 18:3), involved in the darkness of his iniquity he now despairs of the light. Whence also follows:

CHAPTER XL.

VERSE 22.---He believeth not that he may return from darkness to light, looking around on every side for the sword.

45. The impious, salvation having been despaired of, always increases to wickedness.--- Because while he believes himself to be struck on every side by snares, salvation having been despaired of, he always increases to wickedness. But sometimes that perverse man also attends to the supernal judgments, and he dreads these to come upon him. But when he seeks the reward (stipendium) of the present life, overcome by the madness of avarice he contemns these same judgments which he had begun to dread. And indeed he thinks he can die in sin, but yet he does not cease from sin. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XLI.

VERSE 23.---When he shall move himself to seek bread, he knoweth that the day of darkness is prepared in his hand.

46. Although he may dread to be struck, he always increases that by which he may be struck.---For bread is taken as the reward of the present life; but the day of darkness the time of vengeance. In his act therefore sometimes that perverse man weighs the wrath of the Supernal Judge as present; but he is not turned away from evil, so that even she also may be able to be turned away from his destruction. But his conscience accusing him he dreads to be struck, but yet he always increases that by which he may be struck. He contemns his return, he despairs of pardon, he is proud in guilt; but yet he has within fear as a witness of his wickedness. And although he may seem to act boldly perverse things without, nevertheless concerning these he is compelled to tremble within himself. Whence it is written: For since wickedness is fearful, it giveth testimony to condemnation (Wisd. 17:10), because when anyone perpetrates unlawful things, he fears what he does; and the open witness of condemnation is the fear itself of iniquity, because both what is acted is feared, and yet the evil which is feared is not overcome. Concerning which also it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER XLII

VERSE 24. --- Trouble shall make him afraid, and anguish shall hem him in, like a king who is prepared for battle.

47. With how many straits is he hemmed in, who leaves the way of truth, the companion of security. The way of truth is plain; the journey of falsehood is rough. In everything that the wicked man does, he is hemmed in by trouble and anguish, because his heart is confounded by anxiety and suspicion. One man secretly desires to seize another's property by force, and he labors in his thoughts, lest he should be able to be detected. Another, having left the truth, resolves to lie, that he may deceive the mind of his hearers. But how great a labor is it to watch solicitously lest that very fallacy of his should be able to be detected? For he sets before his eyes what might be answered to him by those who know the truth, and with great thought he treats how he may surpass the evidences of truth by the arguments of falsehood. He covers himself on every side, and against this, where he might be detected, he seeks an answer similar to the truth, who if he had wished to speak the truth, certainly could have done so without labor. For the way of truth is plain, and the journey of falsehood is heavy. Whence also it is said by the prophet: For they have taught their tongue to speak lies, they have labored to act wickedly (Jer. 9:5). Well therefore is it said: Trouble shall make him afraid, and anguish shall hem him in, because he fails within himself in the labor of fear, who leaves the way of truth, the companion of security. Who is well compared to a king prepared for battle, because in that very evil which he does, he is both terrified, and he hastens, and he trembles from conscience, and he pants from desire, he fears and is proud, he dreads with suspicions, and raises his mind through audacity. [Vet. XXI.] It must also be known that a king who is prepared for battle is so suspicious of the enemy, that he also fears for that very army which he leads, lest it should be weakened, lest through the destitution of the soldiers he should lie open to the javelins of the enemies. The wicked man therefore is hemmed in by anguish, like a king who is prepared for battle, because namely acting falsely, speaking falsely, he dreads lest he should lose his soldiers, that is, the arguments of falsehood, and lie open to the javelins of truth, if by chance that should fail him which he might oppose from fallacy. But although the mind trembles, although the conscience accuses, nevertheless the wicked man is overcome by his own cupidity, and having suppressed fear, he takes audacity from his iniquities. And often even with vengeance proposed to his mind, he raises himself against God, resolving to endure any adversities from Him, provided that here, while he is able, he may do everything that pleases him. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XLIII

VERSES 25, 26. --- For he hath stretched out his hand against God, and hath been strengthened against the Almighty. He hath run against Him with an erect neck, and is armed with a fat neck.

48. God through mercy sometimes opposes the will of the wicked, which being angry He sometimes allows to be fulfilled. These things are more clearly understood concerning that very head of the wicked, namely Antichrist, who, lifting up his hand against God, is said to be strengthened, because for a small time he is permitted to be exalted, so that in that for which he is allowed to glory for a little while, he may be punished more atrociously forever. But because all the wicked are his members, let us see now how this which one man is then to do singularly at the end of the world is done by individual bad men. For there are some who, even if they sometimes strive to do anything against the judgment of Almighty God, being broken by the very impossibility of fulfilling their will, look back to themselves, and are converted to Him whom they had wished to despise; and they who could have departed far away, if they had been able to fulfill what they wished, are sometimes saved through this, because what they wickedly wished, they were unable to fulfill. Whence brought back to themselves, they behold of what condition they are, and they bewail that they wished things contrary to the truth. And there are some who are permitted by the just judgment of God more wickedly to fulfill that which they perversely desire against God. And when malice inflames them, and power strengthens them, they are already so much the more unable to know themselves in error, as in affluent circumstances they are always drawn out of themselves through power. Concerning whose intention it is now said: For he hath stretched out his hand against God, and hath been strengthened against the Almighty. For to stretch out the hand against God is to persevere in a wicked operation, the judgments of God being despised. And because God is then more angry, when He permits to be fulfilled what at least ought not to have been conceived in thought, this wicked man is strengthened against the Almighty, because he is permitted to prosper in his bad action, so that he both does perverse things, and yet lives happily. Concerning which it is still subjoined: He hath run against Him with an erect neck.

49. How great audacity of opulent proud men in wicked works. To run against God with an erect neck is to commit with audacity those things which displease the Creator. Concerning which it is rightly said: He hath run, that is, in his bad work he had no obstacle from adversity. [Vet. XXII.] Concerning which it is still added: And he is armed with a fat neck. A fat neck is opulent pride, supported namely by affluent circumstances as if by much flesh. The powerful wicked man therefore is armed with a fat neck against God, who, swelling with temporal things against the precepts of truth, is raised up as if by the greatness of his flesh. For what is poverty but a certain leanness, and what is abundance of things but the fatness of this present life? He therefore raises himself against God with a fat neck, who assumes temporal abundance into pride. For powerful and wicked men have this as their own, that, occupied with deceitful riches, they neglect the true riches of God; and the less they seek what is true, the more they are extolled by false riches. For the manifold care of earthly things, because it occupies, blinds. Whence it is still aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLIV

VERSE 27. --- Thickness hath covered his face.

50. Abundance of earthly things closing the eyes. For sight is in the face, in which is the first and more honorable part of the body. Not therefore undeservedly is the intention of the mind designated by the face, which wherever we turn it, there we see. Thickness therefore covers the face, because the desired abundance of earthly things oppresses the eyes of the mind, and fouls before the eyes of God that which in them ought to have been honorable, because it burdens with manifold cares. For whom, however, it does not only suffice that they themselves should be proud, unless also those who are joined to them should themselves also glory in their fatness. For there are some who, aided by greater patrons, are proud, and are extolled through their power against the needy. Whence it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER XLV

IBID. --- And fat hangs from his sides.

51. Those who adhere to the powerful wicked man swell with his power. Because "arvina" is the fatness of the flesh, and we are accustomed to call the "sides" of the rich those whom we see joined to them, fat hangs from his sides, because whoever adheres to the powerful and wicked man, he himself also swells with his power, as if from the fatness of things, so that, following the iniquity of a perverse patron, he does not fear God, afflicts the poor whom he can and as much as he can, and raises his heart from temporal glory. When therefore such is he who adheres to the powerful wicked man, fat certainly hangs from his side. Concerning whom it is still subjoined:

VERSE 28. --- He shall dwell in desolate cities, and in deserted houses, which are reduced into heaps.

52. He in turn, while he is extolled by the praises of those joined to him, is more vehemently hurried to wicked works. For because a city is named from the conversation of those living together, desolate cities are the very companies of the perverse who follow him, by whose clamors this perverse man is praised when he is hurried through wickedness to wicked works. Whence it is written: The sinner is praised in the desires of his soul, and he who acts iniquitously is blessed (Ps. 10:3, sec. Heb.). Deserted houses indeed are the wicked thoughts, which this wicked man inhabits, because through everything that he does he desires to please the thoughts of wicked men. Which desolate cities and deserted houses are rightly named, because unless Almighty God had left the conversations and thoughts of such men, their preceding guilts requiring it, they would by no means have arrived at perpetrating more grievous things. But well is it said: Which are reduced into heaps. For the falling buildings of houses and cities make heaps, because while all the wicked are joined to themselves for perverse works with confused actions, they undoubtedly show that they have fallen from the building of life. It follows:

CHAPTER XLVII

VERSE 29. --- He shall not be inhabited, neither shall his substance continue, neither shall he send his root into the earth.

53. He is not enriched with virtues except him whose mind God inhabits. The proud man stands without a root, soon to be prostrated by a gentle breeze. What is said here, He shall not be inhabited, I have found in some Codices to be He shall not be enriched; but the sense does not disagree, although the word differs from itself. For he is enriched with virtues, whose mind

Almighty God inhabits. But because the thought of the proud is not inhabited by the grace of its Author, certainly through this he is not enriched with virtues. On account of this, therefore, that he is empty within, let it be said: He shall not be inhabited; but on account of this, that what is transitory swells without, he rightly subjoins: Neither shall his substance continue. As if it were openly said: This which he seems to have without passes away, and that which could not pass away he does not have within. Whence also it is aptly subjoined: Neither shall he send his root into the earth. Which if we take as said of this earth, it is clear without doubt that a tree which has not a root in the earth, falls even if moved by the thinnest breezes. And every proud man while he is strengthened against the Almighty Lord, while he runs with an erect neck, and is raised up with a fat neck against his Author, seems to stand like a tree. But his state is without a root, because as if at a gentle breeze, so at the motion of a hidden sentence his life is plucked up. But if in this place we take "earth" as the retribution of eternal life, of which the Prophet says: My portion in the land of the living (Ps. 142:5), this wicked man does not send his root into the earth, because he never plants the thoughts of his heart toward the desire of eternal life. [Vet. XXIV.] For what the root is to the tree, that his own thought is to every man, because in this which is seen without, he is held by that which is not seen without. Whence also it is said by the prophet: He shall send root downward, and bear fruit upward (Is. 37:31). For when we stretch our thought to compassionating a needy neighbor, we send as it were a root downward, that we may bear the fruit of retribution above. It follows:

CHAPTER XLVIII

VERSE 30. --- He shall not depart from darkness.

54. Because he does not seek the light of righteousness, he does not depart from darkness. If this proud man had wished to return from fault to righteousness, he would depart from darkness. But because he does not seek the light of righteousness, he does not depart from darkness. By whose example also those who adhere to him pant in earthly successes, are inflamed by the torches of avarice, and are burned by the fires of carnal desires. Whence also it is subjoined:

IBID. --- The flame shall dry up his branches.

55. He is burned with the torches of carnal desires together with those joined to him. For if he should join to himself some seeking the eternal country, he would have in himself green branches. But because those also who are joined to him glow with earthly desires, and while the flame of desires inflames the minds of his clients, it namely dries up his branches, so that they may not bear the fruit of good work, because through wickedness they pant to seek the lowest things. Well, however, it is subjoined:

IBID. --- And by the breath of his mouth shall he be taken away.

56. On account of the relaxed reins of the tongue he is to be most severely tormented. For every proud man, the more he is able in this life, the more audaciously he relaxes the reins of the tongue to himself, so that he speaks any perverse things whatever, fears no one for his words, strikes these with contumelies, and shoots those with maledictions. Not uncommonly indeed he is hurried into blasphemy against the Creator, as is said of such by the Psalmist: They have set their mouth against heaven, and their tongue has passed over the earth (Ps. 73:9). Whence also the rich man placed in the fire asks for a drop of water from the finger of Lazarus to be dropped on his tongue (Luke 16:24). From which thing it is understood that where he had sinned more, there he burned more atrociously. Rightly therefore is it now said: And by the breath of his mouth shall he be taken away, because he received the sentence of percussion in that wherein he did not restrain the breath of his mouth under divine fear. It follows:

VERSE 31. --- Let him not believe, vainly deceived, that he is to be redeemed with any price.

57. Then only do alms profit us when we bewail and abandon our sins. As often as we give alms after a fault, we give as it were a price for our wicked acts. Whence also it is said by the Prophet concerning him who does not do these things: He shall not give to God his propitiation, nor the price of the redemption of his soul (Ps. 49:7, 8). Not uncommonly indeed the elated rich oppress their inferiors, seize the things of others, and yet bestow certain things as it were on others; and when they depress many, sometimes they bring the aid of defense to some, and they seem to give a price for the iniquities which they never desert. But then the price of alms delivers us from faults, when we bewail and abandon the things perpetrated. For he who both wishes always to sin, and as it were always to bestow alms, in vain gives a price, because he does not redeem the soul, which he does not restrain from vices. Whence it is now said: Let him not believe, vainly deceived by error, that he is to be redeemed with any price. Because the alms of a proud rich man cannot redeem him, which the simultaneously perpetrated robbery of the poor man does not permit to ascend before the eyes of God. [Vet. XXV.] Which perhaps can be understood otherwise, because often proud rich men when they bestow alms, do not bestow this for the desire of eternal life, but for extending temporal life; they believe that they can defer death by donations, but let him not believe, vainly deceived by error, that he is to be redeemed with any price, because he is not able to obtain from the bestowed gift that he should escape the due end, whose wickedness also cuts short his life. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER LII.

VERSE 32. --- Before his days be fulfilled he shall perish, and his hands shall wither.

58. The days prefixed for each, can neither be increased nor diminished. He who hopes for longer ones, before they are fulfilled, perishes. --- The days prefixed for each by the internal foreknowledge of God can neither be increased nor diminished, unless it happen that they are so foreknown, that they are longer with the best works, or shorter with the worst, as Hezekiah (Ezechias) merited an increase of days by the shedding of tears; and as it is written of the perverse: Death meets the undisciplined. But often the wicked man, although in the hidden foreknowledge of God long times of his life are not predestined, yet because he desires to live carnally, proposes days to himself with a long mind. And because he is not able to arrive at that time which he expects, he perishes as it were before his days are fulfilled. Which, however, we are able to understand otherwise also. For commonly we see some both act perversely and arrive even to extreme old age. How then is it said: Before his days be fulfilled he shall perish, when in some we often see that their members already fail with long age, and yet their desires do not cease to follow their depravity?

59. He who returns to external things after conversion is eradicated from every state of good work. --- For there are some who after a lost life return to themselves, and, their conscience accusing them, leave their perverse ways, change their works, contradict their ancient depravity, flee earthly actions, and follow heavenly desires; but before they are solidified in those same holy desires, through the torpor of the mind they return to those things which they had begun to judge, and run back to the evils which they had disposed to flee. For because it often happens that even holy men serve external acts for the utility of many, and are occupied with the governments of peoples, weak men beholding this, and seeking to imitate it through the old pride still remaining, insert themselves into external actions; but the more they come to them uninstructed in spiritual things, the more carnally they execute them. For unless the heart first grows strong in heavenly desires by long study and daily conversation, when it is poured back to doing external things, it is eradicated from every state of good work. Whence also it is rightly said of this wicked man: Before his days be fulfilled he shall perish. Because even if he perhaps began to do anything good, before he grows strong in it through length of time, he slips back to external things, and perversely deserts what he seemed to have rightly begun. Whence also it is aptly subjoined: And his hands shall wither. Because while he is untimely involved in external acts, he is doubtless dried up from every good operation. Whence also it is well subjoined:

VERSES 33, 34. --- His cluster shall be harmed as a vine in its first flower, and as an olive tree casting off its flower. For the congregation of the hypocrite is barren.

60. Why the good works of the hypocrite wither. How dangerously they preside who are weak in virtue. --- It is to be noted that he speaks so generally of this wicked man, that yet the divine word is derived to his special wickedness. For he who, saying: His cluster shall be harmed as a vine in its first flower, and as an olive tree casting off its flower, immediately subjoins: For the congregation of the hypocrite is barren, plainly indicates that in this wicked man he brings a sentence of reprobation against his hypocrisy. [Vet. XXVI.] But now we must consider how the hypocrite is harmed as a vine in its first flower, or as an olive tree casting off its flower. If an immoderate cold, through inequality of the air, touches a flowering vine, it immediately withers it from all moisture of greenness. And there are some who after perverse ways desire to follow holy paths, but before good desires are strengthened in them, as we have said, a certain prosperity of the present world receives them, which involves them in external things, and while it draws back their mind from the heat of inward love, it extinguishes it as it were from cold, and kills whatever appeared to be seen in them of the flower of virtues. For the mind grows very cold in earthly acts, if it has not yet been solidified by inward gifts. Whence it is necessary that those should undertake the exercise of greater places or external works, which are to profit human necessities, who have learned to judge these things, and to press them under themselves by inward virtue. For when any weak person is drawn back either to a place of government or to doing external things, whereby he is led as it were outside of himself, he is eradicated, because also the tree which does not first send its roots deep, is more quickly laid low by the force of the winds, if it lifts itself up with its top to the height; and it falls to the depths the more quickly, the higher it grew in the air without roots. But sometimes not cold, but heat withers the flowering vine. And when it is touched by immoderate heat, the blossom being shaken off, the cluster wastes away. And it commonly happens that those who do not come to good works with a right intention, when they see themselves pleasing to men, are more vehemently kindled to exercising these same works, and anxiously study to do things pleasing to human eyes, and as it were grow fervent in holy study. Who then but heat touched these in their flower, whom the desire of human praise made strangers to fruit? Whence also it is well subjoined: And as an olive tree casting off its flower. For the olive tree, when it is in flower, if it is touched by an immoderate mist, is emptied of the fullness of fruits. And as often as any who are beginning good works begin to be praised by beholders, and to be delighted in their own praises, there is a darkness of understanding in the thought, so that they can no longer discern with what intention they do what they do, and they lose the fruit of the work, as it were from the mist of favor. Whence it is well said by Solomon: Let us rise early to the vineyards, let us see if the vineyard has flourished, if the flowers bring forth fruits (Cant. 7:12). For the vineyards flourish when the minds of the faithful propose good works. But they do not bring forth fruits, if they are weakened by some errors, being overcome from that which they had proposed.

[Vet. XXVII.] 61. In good works the beginning ought not to be attended to, but the end. --- Therefore it is not to be considered if the vineyards flourish, but if the flowers grow strong for the bringing forth of fruits; because it is not a wonder if anyone begins good things, but it is very wonderful if he endures in a good work with a right intention. Whence it happens for the most part that if a right intention is not held in a good work, even this same work which is believed to be good is lost. For often we have seen some leave the earthly things which they had possessed, and no longer seek anything transitory, and be mixed in no strifes for this life. When therefore a faithful soul shows this in itself, it has brought forth as it were the flower of the olive. But when some of such again begin to seek the glory of the world which they had contemned, and insatiably to gape for earthly things which they seemed to have despised, to be at leisure for strifes, to seek out injuries to their neighbors, doubtless the olive has cast off the flower which it put forth, because it did not lead the rudiments of good study to perfect works. But it is to be known that these things always happen to those who do not follow God with a pure and simple study. Whence it is rightly subjoined: For the congregation of the hypocrite is barren. For it would not lose the good things begun, if it had not been a hypocrite. For hypocrites also congregate good works, but that same congregation of theirs is barren, because through that which they do they do not desire to receive fruit in eternal retribution. They seem fruitful and green in their works to human eyes, but in the sight of the hidden judge they appear unfruitful and dry. But often, kindled with the heat of avarice, they show the greater works of themselves to human eyes, the more they desire more ample gifts to be offered to them by men. Whence it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER LIV

VERSE 34. --- And fire shall devour the tabernacles of those who freely receive gifts.

62. It is little not to receive a gift from the hand unless we reject a gift from the mouth. --- For as the body lives in a tabernacle, so the mind dwells in thought. But fire devours the tabernacles when the heat of avarice devastates the thoughts. And it happens for the most part that the hypocrite contemns receiving gold or any bodily goods from men, but because he does not receive these, he seeks to receive greater praises from them; and perhaps he does not estimate that he has received a gift, because he refuses to receive bodily goods. Whence it is to be known that sometimes a gift is reached out from the hand, but sometimes from the mouth. For he who bestows a coin, has given a gift from the hand; but he who spends a word of praise, has brought forth a gift from the mouth. Therefore the hypocrite, although he refuses to receive external gifts, which perhaps are suitable to earthly necessity, it is more that he desires to be repaid to himself, when, desiring to be praised beyond merit, he seeks a gift from the mouth. And because the heart is kindled with ardor in that very excessive desire of praise, let it be rightly said: And fire shall devour the tabernacles of those who freely receive gifts.

[Vet. XXVIII.] 63. Fire shall devour those delighting in these gifts. --- But if we ought to take their tabernacles as the bodies in which their souls dwell, fire devours their tabernacles, because they who here burn in the mind with the fire of avarice, there also are burned in the flesh by the fires of Gehenna; and because the mind of the hypocrite is never empty of the thought of malice; for whether he desires any earthly things or praise, he envies these to others which he pants for to be bestowed on himself; and he strives so much to show others as perverse, as he desires to seem holier than all, so that from this, that others become despicable, he himself may always appear more reverend. Whence it happens that concerning the opinion of his neighbor before human judgments, he stretches out the snares of his tongue, that he alone may catch the estimation of those whom he desires to please. Whence also it follows:

CHAPTER LV.

VERSE 35. --- He has conceived sorrow, and brought forth iniquity, and his womb prepares deceits.

64. He conceives sorrow who thinks perverse things, being about to bring forth iniquity. --- For he conceives sorrow when he thinks perverse things. He brings forth iniquity when he has begun to fulfill what he thought. By envying he conceives sorrow, by detracting he brings forth iniquity. For iniquity is heavy when he who is perverse strives to show others as perverse, so that from this he himself may appear as it were holy, because he has taught that others are not holy. For the light of grace, which comes from above, provides breath for man unto life. Which light indeed is said to search all the secrets of the belly, because it penetrates the hidden things of the mind, so that those things which were hidden from the soul concerning itself, it may bring back before its eyes with weeping. Hence Jeremiah says: I am in pain in my belly, my belly (Jer. 4:19). Who, that he might show what he had called his belly, added: The senses of my heart are troubled. Therefore by the name of the womb the mind is rightly taken, because as offspring is conceived in the womb, so thought is generated in the mind; and as foods in the belly, so thoughts are contained in the mind. Therefore the womb of the hypocrite prepares deceits, because he always conceives the greater malice against his neighbors in his mind, the more he seeks to seem more innocent than all others alone. Eliphaz brought forth these things for this reason, because he thought blessed Job was struck with so great a blow on account of hypocrisy. But his words, although they are suitable to many, are foreign to him alone for whom alone they were being said, because the holy man had nothing of duplicity in his acts, whom the Truth as witness praised for the simplicity of his heart.

BOOK THIRTEEN.

In which a brief moral and typical exposition of the sixteenth and seventeenth chapters of the book of Job is contained.

CHAPTER I.

1. The saints tolerate by suffering those whom they cannot correct by admonishing. --- This is accustomed to be proper to the perverse, that they cast their own evils upon the good by reproach, before they themselves are truly accused of them; and while they fear to be rebuked for those things which they do, they testify that the just who oppose their depravities do these things. But holy men patiently hear even those things which they do not remember ever to have done, although they know those evils which they see cast upon themselves were perpetrated by those very accusers of theirs; and when they cannot correct them by preaching, they tolerate them by suffering, so that if they are not able to have the fruit of their conversion, they may yet acquire from them the reward of long-suffering. Whence also the holy Church says in the words of the prophet David: Sinners have built upon my back (Ps. 129:3), because indeed while she tolerates heretics or any reprobates whom she cannot correct, she carries the deeds of sinners upon her back. Therefore blessed Job, seeing his friend Eliphaz complaining many things against him concerning hypocrisy, who had broken out from words of consolation to the bitterness of rebuke, and appeared a feigned comforter, by his patience preserves the type of the Church, which knows how to tolerate such things by hearing, and, when its speech is admitted, to destroy them by reasoning, and says:

CHAPTER II

[Rec II].

CHAP. XVI, VERSE 2. --- I have frequently heard such things.

2. Job is a type of the Church oppressed by feigned friends, who pretend to be comforters. The friends of Job had broken out from consolatory words to rebuking ones. --- For the elect frequently hear the evils of others as if they were their own, and a crime is fastened upon them by those by whom the fastened crimes are perpetrated. Moreover, by this response blessed Job signifies that time of the Church in which, being oppressed by adversaries, she is believed to be as it were cast down by their temporal power. Whence follows: --- IBID. --- Onerous comforters you all are. For whether heretics or any wicked persons, when they behold the good laboring in adversity, in that which they desire to console them, they endeavor to persuade them to evils. Whence not undeservedly their consolation becomes onerous to the minds of the good, because among words of sweetness they desire to administer the poison of error; and while with smooth words they as it were alleviate sorrows, they hasten to impose the burden of sin. But elect men, even when they are deprived of temporal glory, do not lose the vigor of internal judgment. For they know both how to endure adversities without, and yet, unbroken within, to defend right things without fear. Whence is subjoined:

CHAPTER III.

VERSE 3. --- Shall windy words have an end?

3. Sound words are sometimes windy on account of the elation of those by whom they are brought forth. One in mourning is not to be rebuked. --- For windy words are those which serve temporal inflation rather than rectitude. Moreover, often the wicked even say good things; but because they do not say them well, they bring forth windy words. For their sayings, even if sometimes they are sound by their sentence, are yet inflated by elation. [Vet. II.] In this indeed which was said: Onerous comforters you all are, what else are we taught by the mastery of blessed Job, except that each one should know how to weigh solicitously lest he should bring in words of rebuke in a time of mourning? For if there are certain things which ought rightly to be rebuked, they are to be postponed in affliction, lest the comforter by rebuking should increase the sorrow which he had proposed to alleviate. It follows:

CHAPTER IV.

IBID. --- Or is anything troublesome to you, if you speak?

4. The just do not return reproaches. --- Wicked men, when they bring forth reproachful words with others like themselves, they are the more quickly silent, the more they soon hear such things of themselves as they say to their hearers. But when they hurl reproachful words at good men, no trouble is born to them from the reproach, because they speak against those who are silent; nor are they compelled to hear what they are, because the just do not return reproaches, even while they are compelled to hear what they are not. Well therefore is it said: Or is anything troublesome to you, if you speak? As if it were openly said to him: You speak the more because you do not hear anything troublesome from me concerning your action. Whence also is subjoined: --- VERSE 4. --- I also could speak things like to you. [Rec III.] The just man relates what he could do; but lest he should desert justice, he declines what he could do. It follows:

CHAPTER V.

VERSES 4-6. --- And oh that your soul were for my soul! I also would comfort you with words, and would move my head over you. I would strengthen you with my mouth, and would move my lips, as if sparing you.

5. Divine scourges ought sometimes to be wished for the wicked. --- Sometimes it is necessary that for depraved minds which cannot be corrected by human preaching, divine scourges should be kindly wished. Which, when it is done with a great study of love, namely, when not the punishment of the erring but correction is sought, is shown to be a prayer rather than a curse. In these words, blessed Job is shown to intend this, that the friends, who knew not how to suffer with him through charity in his grief, might learn from experience how they ought to have pitied the affliction of another; and, being tamed by pains, might draw from their own passion how they should bring consolation to others; and then they would live more healthily within, when they felt something without from infirmity. It is to be noted that he does not say: Oh that my soul were for your soul! but Oh that your soul were for my soul! because he would surely curse himself if he wished himself to become like to them. But he wished better things for them whom he sought to become like to himself. We comfort the wicked when they are set under scourges when we indicate that from the outward smiting, an inward health gains strength in them. [Vet. III.] We move our head also when we bend our mind, which is our principal part, to compassion. And we strengthen them among the scourges when we soothe the force of their grief with mild words. For there are some who, while they know not internal things, are despairingly afflicted by outward evils, of whom it is said by the Psalmist: In miseries they shall not subsist (Psalm 139:11). For he well knows how to subsist in outward miseries, who knows how to always rejoice in inward hope.

6. Sometimes the Church, as if sparing, does not spare, and as if not sparing, spares the wicked. --- As to the fact that he does not say Sparing, but As if sparing you, I think this should by no means be passed over negligently, because holy Church, keeping the vigor of discipline with a mixture of gentleness, sometimes, as if sparing the wicked, does not spare, and sometimes, as if not sparing, spares. This we show better if we bring forward those things which frequently happen. Let us, therefore, set before the eyes of the mind two wicked men set in holy Church, of whom one is powerful and arrogant, the other mild and subject. If any fault should steal upon the mild and subject one, the preacher immediately follows and corrects this with a rebuke, and by correcting him, he frees him from fault, and reforms him to the way of rectitude. What, therefore, did he do to this man but spare him by not sparing, because while he did not delay the word of correction, he the more quickly freed him from fault? For by rebuking freely he did not spare, but in that which he corrected he spared. But, on the contrary, when a powerful and arrogant man is known to have committed anything, a time is sought that he may be rebuked for the evil he has done. For unless the preacher waits for a time when he can congruously bear correction, he increases in him the evil which he follows. For it often happens that such a one is he who receives no words of rebuke. What, therefore, is to be done by the preacher in the fault of such a one, except that in the sermon of admonition, which he makes for the common salvation of all his hearers, he should bring to light such faults as he considers him to have committed who is present, and who cannot yet be rebuked concerning himself alone, lest he become worse? And when an invective is directed generally against fault, the word of correction is willingly brought to the mind, because the wicked powerful man does not know that this is said to him specially. What, therefore, did his preacher do to him but not spare him at all while sparing, to whom he both did not bring words of correction specially, and yet smote his wound under a common admonition? Whence it often happens that he laments the committed fault the more vehemently, because he thinks his guilt is not known even while he feels himself smitten.

[Vet. IV.] 7. With what discretion the arrogant are to be rebuked. --- Therefore, it must be done with great art of preaching that they who become worse from open correction should return to salvation by a certain tempering of correction. Whence also Paul says: Those members of the body which we think to be less honorable, upon these we bestow more abundant honor; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness; but our comely parts have no need (1 Cor. 12:23). For as the uncomely members in the body, so are some in holy Church, powerful and arrogant, who while they cannot be struck by open invective, are veiled as if by the honor of a covering. But we speak these things concerning the hidden crimes of the powerful. For when they sin with others also knowing it, they are to be rebuked with others also knowing it, lest if the preacher be silent, he should seem to have approved the fault, and this growing should become an example, which the tongue of the pastor does not cut away. Holy Church, therefore, when through her preachers she rebukes certain deeds of the wicked under the dispensation of invective, moves her lips as if sparing; but yet by sparing she does not spare, because she is not silent generally from the invective of fault, which she is silent upon specially. It follows:

CAPUT VI.

VERS. 7. --- But what shall I do? If I shall speak, my grief will not rest; and if I shall hold my peace, it will not depart from me.

8. The grief of the Church when she sees the wicked corrected in vain. --- No one is ignorant how this fits the person of blessed Job. But if it be drawn to the type of holy Church, she, even when she speaks, her grief by no means rests, when she sees that by her speech the perverse are by no means corrected. And when she is silent, her grief by no means departs, because although she may have become silent in aversion, she groans the more for this very thing that she is silent, because she sees the faults of the perverse grow while she is silent. It follows:

CAPUT VII.

VERS. 8. --- But now my grief has oppressed me, and all my limbs are reduced to nothing.

9. The grief of the Church while she sees the weak drawn away by the examples of the wicked. --- Holy Church is pressed by her grief when she beholds the perverse increase in their malice. And because while the wicked increase, even the weak who are in her are provoked to follow the studies of depravity, it is rightly added: And all my limbs are reduced to nothing. For as the strong are wont to be designated by the bones, so are all the weak by the limbs (artus). The members of the Church, therefore, are reduced to nothing when, from the imitation of the wicked increasing in this world, all the weak are the more weakened. For seeing the happiness of the wicked, they often fall away from the very state of faith, they desire temporal goods, and are reduced as it were to nothing, because while they desert the remaining essence of God, loving transitory things, they tend as it were to non-existence. But it is well said: But now my grief has oppressed me, because forsooth the time of the Church's grief is now, and the time of joy will follow afterward. But it often happens that holy Church not only tolerates infidels and adversaries placed without, but also hardly bears the snares and adversity of those whom she has within. Whence it is aptly subjoined soon by the voice of the blessed man:

CAPUT VIII.

VERS. 9. --- My wrinkles bear witness against me.

10. The wrinkles of the Church are wicked Christians. --- What is designated by wrinkles but duplicity? The wrinkles of holy Church, therefore, are all who live in her with duplicity, who cry out faith with their voices, but deny it with their works. These indeed in time of peace, because they behold the same faith to be an honor to the powers of this world, lie that they are faithful. But when a sudden storm of adversity has disturbed holy Church, they immediately show what they are plotting in their treacherous mind. But holy Church does not have these wrinkles in her elect, because forsooth they know not how to show one thing without, and have another within. Whence the egregious preacher rightly says: That He might present her to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle (Ephes. 5:27). For she has not spot and wrinkle, who is free both from the foulness of work and from the duplicity of speech. But because now within the bosom of faith she holds many even reprobate, when the time of persecution has flared up, she suffers those very enemies whom she seemed before to nourish with the words of preaching. Let her say therefore that: My wrinkles bear witness against me, that is, they themselves in following me rebuke me, who now, placed in my body, do not conceal the malice of their own duplicity in themselves. Whence it is well subjoined still:

IBID. --- And a false speaker is raised up against my face, contradicting me.

11. Through the wicked the devil rages. --- Even in the time of her peace holy Church suffers false speaking, while there are many in her who distrust the promise of eternity, and yet lie that they are faithful. Who while they do not presume to contradict her preaching openly, she suffers false speaking not against her face, but as it were behind her back. But when the time of malice has broken out, he who now disparages through fear, comes before her face to contradict, because he opposes the words of true faith with open voices. But it is to be known that when we suffer these things from carnal men, it is not so much they themselves who rage in our death as the malignant spirit who rules their minds, as is said by Paul: For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against princes and powers, against the world-rulers of these darknesses (Ephes. 6:12). Whence when he here also spoke of false speaking, he aptly turned his words soon to describe the prince of that false speaking, saying:

[Rec. V].

VERS. 10. --- He has gathered his fury against me, and, threatening me, he gnashed against me with his teeth; my enemy has beheld me with terrible eyes.

12. The devil rages through the wicked, sometimes by hidden, sometimes by open persecution. --- What else are all the iniquitous but members of the devil? He therefore acts through them whatever he instills into their hearts that they ought to do. [Vet. VI]. But even now the devil has fury against holy Church, but his fury is scattered, because he moves hidden temptations through individuals. But when he has broken forth against her in open persecution, he gathers his fury against her, because in her affliction he binds himself with his whole intention. But his members in this time of peace do not have gathered fury against the elect for this reason, because they feel themselves less able to fulfill their malice than they wish. But when they have seen the license of depravity to be available to them, they strike her so much more audaciously, as they are also massed together against her out of unanimity. Rightly therefore is it now said: He has gathered his fury against me. Whose fury, that it may still be set forth more widely, is said: And threatening me, he gnashed against me with his teeth. Concerning which it is also subjoined: My enemy has beheld me with terrible eyes. For that ancient enemy of the Church gnashes with his teeth against her, and beholds her with terrible eyes, because through some he exercises cruelties, and through others he foresees what he may exercise.

13. The teeth of the devil, the persecutors; the eyes, those who rule them by their counsels. --- For the teeth of this enemy are the persecutors and executioners of the good, who tear his members while they afflict his elect with their persecutions. But the eyes of this enemy are those who foresee evils against her which they may do, and by their counsels inflame the cruelties of her persecutors. Her ancient adversary therefore gnashes against her with his teeth, while through cruel reprobates he pursues in her the life of the good. He beholds her with terrible eyes, who by the counsels of the perverse does not cease to seek out evils, in which he may always afflict her more grievously. For just as the incarnate Truth in His preaching chose poor, unlearned (idiotas) and simple men, so on the contrary that damned man, whom the apostate angel shall assume at the end of the world to preach his falsehood, is to choose the crafty and double-minded and those having the knowledge of this world. [Vet. VII]. Whence it is also said by Isaiah: Woe to the land of the cymbal of wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, which sends ambassadors in the sea, and in vessels of papyrus upon the waters (Isai. 18:1). For the land to which woe is said is principally that damned man, who is called the cymbal of wings, because those who through pride fly up into the height of thought, sound that same perverse man by preaching. Which land forsooth is rightly held to be beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. For Ethiopia sends forth a black people, and this world, because it brings forth a sinner, brings forth as it were a black people, just as Ethiopia brings forth a people. But the land to which woe is said is held to be beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, because that damned man is iniquitous with such immensity that he transcends the sins of all who sin. Who sends ambassadors in the sea, because he scatters his preachers into the world (saeculum). Concerning whom it is rightly subjoined how they are sent, when it is said: In vessels of papyrus upon the waters. For from papyrus indeed is paper. What therefore is designated by papyrus but secular knowledge? The vessels of papyrus therefore are the hearts of secular teachers. To send ambassadors in vessels of papyrus upon the waters, therefore, is to place his preaching in the senses of the carnal wise, and to call the peoples flowing down to fault. Those therefore who are there designated by vessels of papyrus, are here designated by eyes, because they see carnally. Concerning whom it is also still subjoined:

CHAPTER XI.

VERS. 11. --- They have opened their mouths upon me, reproaching.

14. The mouth of the devil, those who preach errors. --- The reprobate open their mouths reproaching when they both fear not to preach the evils of their own error, and deride the preachings of the right faith. Concerning whom it is to be known that they especially persecute those in holy Church whom they perceive to be about to be profitable to many, who bruise the life of carnal men with the word of correction, and spiritually turn them in the body of the Church. Whence also it is subjoined.

CAPUT XII

[Rec. VI].

IBID.---They have struck my cheek, they have been filled with my punishments.

15. The jaw of the Church is the holy preachers.---The jaw of the Church is indeed the holy preachers, as it is said under the species of Judea by Jeremiah: Weeping she hath wept in the night, and her tears are on her cheeks (Lam. 1:2), because in the adversities of the Church they lament more who have known how to break the life of carnal men by preaching. For through them holy Church crushes the wicked from vices, and as it were swallowing them converts them into her own members. Whence also to that first preacher, as if to the jaw of the Church, it is said: Kill and eat (Acts 10:13). [Vet. VIII.] Hence it is also that Samson held the jawbone of an ass, and destroyed the enemies (Judges 15:16), because our Redeemer, holding the simplicity and patience of preachers by the hand of his power, killed carnal men from their vices. And the jawbone cast on the ground afterwards poured out waters, because the bodies of preachers given to death showed great miracles to the people. Perverse men therefore strike the jaw of the Church, when they pursue good preachers. And because then the reprobate think they have done something great when they slay the life of preachers, after the striking of the jaw is aptly subjoined:---IBID.---They have been filled with my punishments.

For that punishment fills them which especially chastises the mind of the Church. It follows:

CHAPTER XIII.

VERS. 12. God has shut me up with the iniquitous, and has delivered me into the hands of the impious.

16. The elect permitted to the persecutions of the ancient enemy for a time. --- The people of the elect is shut up with the iniquitous when its flesh is given for a time to the persecutions of the ancient enemy. Who is delivered not to the spirit, but to the hands of the impious, because as much as they cannot capture him in mind, so much more cruelly do they burn against his flesh. But the people of holy Church, when it has begun to suffer adversities heavily, and has beheld its weak ones sliding down to worse things, recalls to mind the times of its peace, when it was feeding its faithful with the opulence of its preaching. Whence it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XIV.

VERS. 13. --- I, that once opulent one, have suddenly been bruised.

17. --- To firm minds no adversities come suddenly. --- In that he asserted himself to have been suddenly bruised, he designated the improvident mind of the weak. Who while they know not how to foresee the evils which are about to come, so much more grievous do they become to them as they are also tolerated by them as unexpected. But to firm minds adversities do not come suddenly, because they are foreseen before they come. Which however even now holy Church suffers in certain ones sliding backward, who after the opulence of doctrine are sometimes bruised by sudden vices, so that they thus collapse in certain evils, as if they had never had the food of the word. It follows:

CHAPTER XV.

IBID. --- He has held my neck, he has bruised me, he has placed me for himself as it were for a mark (signum).

18. The weak, when persecution is urgent, tremble to preach the truth. --- As in the wicked the neck signifies pride, so in the good it signifies the erection of liberty. Whence sometimes that same pride is put for the authority of erection, as through the prophet the Lord says, promising to holy Church: I will place thee for the pride of ages (Isai. 60:15). And because in time of persecution certain weak ones do not presume to preach freely the true things which they feel, it is rightly said of this enemy: He has held my neck, he has bruised me. [Vet. IX.] But perhaps those are signified by the appellation of the neck who in the time of her peace are raised up more than is becoming, and under the occasion of defending rectitude serve the vice of elation. Who in time of persecution for this reason feel adversities more, because they are extolled from prosperous things. Concerning whom it is well said: He has held my neck, he has bruised me. That is, the elation which he had in the weak, he bowed down by the strictness of his striking. And he has placed me for himself as it were for a mark. It is certain forsooth that a mark (signum) is placed for this reason, that it may be struck by the emission of arrows. The faithful people therefore is placed for a mark to its enemy, because he always assails it with his blows, and afflicts it with his persecutions. For he who in this life tolerates assiduous evils, placed as if for a mark, receives the blows of the striker. Whence also the egregious preacher, when he was tolerating the evils of persecutions, and was groaning under the persecution of adversaries, consoling the tender mind of the disciples concerning his afflictions, says: For yourselves know that we are placed in this (1 Thess. 3:3). As if he should say to them openly: Why do you wonder at our wounds in this time, who if we seek eternal joys, have come here for this, that we may be struck? It follows:

CHAPTER XVI.

VERS. 14. --- He has surrounded me with his lances, he has pierced my loins, he has not spared, and has poured out my bowels on the earth.

19. The enemy assails us from every part with the darts of temptations. --- These things according to the letter seemed to be able to agree with blessed Job, through that which is said: He has surrounded me with his lances, he has pierced my loins, he has not spared, unless there were subjoined what is read least written concerning him: He has poured out my bowels on the earth.

From which thing it is necessary that while we cannot find this according to the letter, we should seek those things which sound in his words according to history, according to the spirit. Holy Church is surrounded with lances by her enemy when she is assailed in her members by the crafty impugner with the darts of temptations. But we are well said to be surrounded with lances, because the ancient enemy assails us from every part with the wound of his temptation. For often while the throat (gula) is restrained, that lust may be subdued, the prick of vain glory beats the mind. But if the body is not worn down by the affliction of abstinence, the flame of lust excites itself against the mind. Often while we strive to keep parsimony, we slide into tenacity. And often while we give away what we possess profusely, we are led to avarice, because we seek to collect again what we may give. While therefore the darts of the ancient enemy assail us everywhere, it is rightly said: He has surrounded me with his lances. And because every sin indeed the crafty enemy persuades, but we perpetrate it by consenting to his persuasions, it is aptly subjoined: He has pierced (convulneravit) my loins. For in the loins is luxury. Whence also he who desired to extinguish the pleasure of lust from the heart, preached saying: Girded about the loins of your mind (1 Pet. 1:13). When therefore the ancient enemy draws the faithful people to luxury, he undoubtedly strikes it in the loins. Where it is also to be noted that he says not: He has wounded (vulneravit), but He has pierced (convulneravit) my loins. For as to speak is sometimes of one, but to speak together (colloqui) is of two, or perhaps of many, so the ancient enemy, because he does not snatch us to fault without our will, is said in no wise to wound, but to pierce our loins, because that which he badly suggests to us, we following fulfill from our own will, and as it were we wound ourselves together with him, because we are led to the perpetrating of evil from a free will at the same time. It follows: He has not spared. As if he should say: He did not desist. [Vet. X]. And he has poured out my bowels on the earth. What else ought we to accept as the bowels of holy Church, but the minds of those who contain in themselves certain mysteries of her, who serve at the inward sacraments? But the ancient adversary, when he draws certain faithful, who seemed to serve at the interior sacraments, to secular businesses, undoubtedly pours out her bowels on the earth, because he treads them down in the lowest things who before were hidden in secret and spiritual acts. It follows:

CHAPTER XVII.

VERS. 15. --- He has cut me with wound upon wound.

20. That he may cut us with wound upon wound. --- In her weak ones holy Church is cut with wound upon wound when sin is added to sin, that the fault may be more vehemently exaggerated. For whom avarice draws to rapine, and rapine leads to fallacy, so that, the fault having been perpetrated, it is even defended by falsehood, what is this one but cut by wound upon wound? Whence also it is well said by the prophet: Cursing, and lying, and homicide, and theft, and adultery have overflowed, and blood has touched blood (Hos. 4:2). For sin is wont to be signified by the name of blood. Whence he who desires to be freed from sins cries out through penance: Deliver me from bloods (Psalm 51:14). Blood therefore touches blood when fault has heaped up fault. And because when wound is added to wound the strengths of the ancient enemy more vehemently grow up against us, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XVIII.

IBID. He has rushed upon me as it were a giant.

21. Those who do not resist, experience him as a giant fighting with them. --- For the enemy is easily resisted if he is not consented to longer, whether in many lapses or in one. But if the soul has been accustomed to be subject to his persuasions, the more frequently it subjects itself to him, the more intolerable it makes him to itself, so that it cannot resist him, because forsooth the malignant adversary fights against this soul, conquered by bad custom, as it were after the manner of a giant. But yet for the most part holy Church even after perpetrated faults recalls the minds of the faithful to penance, and cleanses sins by the virtue of the work of spontaneous affliction. Whence it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER XIX.

VERS. 16. --- I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin, and have covered my flesh with ashes.

22. The Church teaches to cleanse sins by spontaneous affliction. What should be understood in sackcloth and ashes but penance, and what in skin and flesh but the sin of the flesh? When therefore certain ones after a lapse of the flesh return to penance, as it were sackcloth is sewed upon the skin, and the flesh is covered with ashes, because the fault of the flesh is covered by penance, lest in the examination of the strict Judge it should be seen for vengeance. But when holy Church withdraws her weak members from sins, and leads them to the remedy of penance, she undoubtedly aids these with weepings, that they may recover for receiving the grace of their Author, and through the strong she bewails what she did not do, which in her weak members she as it were did herself. Whence it is well subjoined still:

[Old Edition XI, Recent VII].

VERSE 17. --- My face is swollen with weeping.

23. She helps her penitent children with her weepings. Let prelates afflict themselves for the lapses of others as if for their own. For the faces of holy Church are those who, being placed in positions of government, appear foremost, so that from their appearance may be the honor of the faithful people, even if something deformed lies hidden in the body. These prelates indeed bewail for the peoples the faults of the weak, and so afflict themselves for the lapses of others as if for their own. And often while they see certain ones return to pardon after faults, but others persist in iniquity, they wonder at the hidden judgments of Almighty God, but are unable to penetrate them. For they are amazed at what they do not understand. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXI.

IBID. --- And my eyelids have grown dim.

24. Let them direct the ways of their subjects as if with eyes. For those are rightly called eyelids who are vigilant to foresee the journeys of the feet. But when even the vigilant superiors do not understand the hidden judgments of God, the eyelids of holy Church grow dim. But as I remember that I have already often said, blessed Job, holding the type of holy Church, sometimes uses the voice of the body, and sometimes the voice of the head; and while he speaks of its members, he is suddenly raised to the words of the head. Whence here also it is subjoined:

[Recent VIII].

VERSE 18. --- These things have I suffered without iniquity of my hand, when I had pure prayers to God.

25. Christ alone before all had pure prayers to God. For He bore them without iniquity of His hand, who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth (1 Pet. 2:22, seq.), and yet He endured the pain of the cross for our redemption. Who alone before all had pure prayers to God, because even in the very pain of the passion He prayed for His persecutors, saying: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do (Luke 23:34). For what can be said, what can be thought in prayer more pure than when even to those from whom pain is endured, the mercy of intercession is granted? Whence it came to pass that the blood of our Redeemer, which the raging persecutors had shed, the believers afterwards drank, and proclaimed Him to be the Son of God. Of which blood, indeed, it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIII.

VERSE 19. --- O earth, cover not my blood, and let not my cry find a place of hiding in thee.

26. His blood speaks better than the blood of Abel; for the latter entreats for vengeance, the former for pardon. To the sinning man it was said: Earth thou art, and unto earth shalt thou go (Gen. 3:19). Which earth indeed does not hide the blood of our Redeemer, because every sinner, taking the price of his redemption, confesses and praises it, and makes it known to those neighbors whom he can. The earth also has not covered His blood, because holy Church has already preached the mystery of her redemption in all parts of the world. [Old Edition XII.] It is to be noted what is subjoined: And let not my cry find a place of hiding in thee (Gen. 3:19). For the very blood of redemption which is received is the cry of our Redeemer. Whence also Paul says: And the sprinkling of blood speaking better than Abel (Heb. 12:24). Concerning the blood of Abel it had been said: The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the earth (Gen. 4:10). But the blood of Jesus speaks better than Abel, because the blood of Abel sought the death of the fratricidal brother, but the blood of the Lord obtained life for His persecutors. That therefore the sacrament of the Lord's passion may not be idle in us, we ought to imitate what we receive, and preach to others what we venerate. For His cry finds a place of hiding in us if the tongue is silent about that which the mind has believed. But lest His cry be hidden in us, it remains that each one, according to his small measure, make known the mystery of his vivification to his neighbors. It is pleasing to lead back the eyes of the mind to the hour of the Lord's passion, when the Jews were raging in persecution, and the disciples were fleeing in fear. For He who seemed to die in the flesh was by no means believed to be God. Whence here it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIV

[Recent IX.].

VERSE 20. --- For behold, my witness is in heaven, and my conscious one is on high.

27. When men were ignorant of Christ, He had the Father as witness and conscious one in heaven. For when the Son was being brought low on earth, He had a witness in heaven. For the witness of the Son is the Father, of whom He Himself says in the Gospel: And the Father who sent me, He hath borne witness of me (John 5:37). Who is also rightly called conscious, because with one will, with one counsel, the Father always works with the Son. Of whom He is also the witness, because no one knoweth the Son but the Father (Matt. 11:27). At that time, therefore, He had a witness in heaven and a conscious one on high, when those who beheld Him dying in the flesh were ignorant how to consider the power of His divinity. And while men were ignorant, yet in death the Mediator of God and men knew that the Father worked with Him. Which perhaps also is able to be referred to the voice of His body. [Old Edition XIII.] For holy Church for this reason tolerates the adversities of the present life, that heavenly grace may lead her to eternal rewards. She despises the death of her flesh, because she looks to the glory of resurrection. And those things which she suffers are transitory, those which she waits for are perpetual. Concerning which perpetual goods, indeed, she has no doubt, because she already holds the glory of her Redeemer as a faithful witness. For she beholds the resurrection of His flesh in her mind, and grows strongly toward hope because, what she sees already done in her Head, she hopes for also in His body, which indeed she herself is without doubt about to follow. Which Church the Psalmist, beholding as one about to remain in perpetual perfection, describes under the name of the moon, saying: The moon perfect forever (Ps. 88:38). Which, because the Lord's resurrection strengthens for the hope of resurrection, he rightly subjoined: And a faithful witness in heaven, because so that she may not tremble concerning her resurrection, she already has Him in heaven, who rose from the dead, as a witness. Therefore let the faithful people when they suffer adversities, when they are fatigued by hard tribulations, lift up their mind to the hope of following glory, and, trusting in the resurrection of their Redeemer, let them say: For behold, my witness is in heaven, and my conscious one is on high. Who is rightly called conscious, because He knew our nature not only by creating it, but also by assuming it. For His knowing is to have taken our things. Whence also it is said by the Psalmist: For He knoweth our frame (Ps. 102:13). For what wonder if He be said specially to know our frame, when it is certain that there is nothing that He does not know? But to know our frame is for Him to have taken this in Himself out of pity.

28. The same witness is to be sought by us. Which voice, however, can also agree with each of us along with blessed Job. For everyone who seeks human praises for that which he does, seeks a witness on earth. But he who hastens to please Almighty God in his acts, considers that he has a witness in heaven. And it often happens that even the good works in us are reproved by incautious men. But he who has a witness in heaven ought not to fear the reproofs of men. Whence it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER XXV

[Old Edition XIV].

VERSE 21. --- My wordy friends, my eye poureth out tears to God.

29. Testimony is not to be sought from men. For what is designated by the eye but the intention of the heart? as it is written: If thy eye be single, thy whole body shall be lightsome (Matt. 6:22). Because when something is done with a good intention, the action of that intention is not at all darkened before God. When therefore there are wordy friends, that is, when even those who are joined in faith detract, it is necessary that the eye pour out tears to God, so that our whole intention may flow down in the compunction of intimate love, and may lift itself to interior things so much more subtly as it is forced to return within by the repulse of exterior reproaches, lest it vanish without. It follows.

CHAPTER XXVI.

VERSE 22. --- And would that a man might so be judged with God, as the son of man is judged with his colleague!

30. It is uncertain which sin God punishes in us with His scourges. We always acknowledge indeed that we are sinners; but yet often when placed under the scourge, we are ignorant for which sin we are more especially scourged; and we discuss ourselves with a subtle investigation, so that, if in any way we are able, we may prevail to search out the cause of our percussion. Which while it for the most part remains hidden from us, our blindness becomes a burden to us, and we grieve more for that which we suffer. But whoever comes to judgment with his colleague, both says what he feels, and acknowledges whatever is said in contradiction, and knocks where he wishes, and knows whence he is knocked. But he who is struck by divine animadversion, while he knows indeed that he is being beaten, yet is ignorant why he is beaten, says as it were what he feels, but knows not what is said against him, because he indeed groans under the lash, but God does not openly declare for what vengeance He strikes him. Therefore it is now said: And would that a man might so be judged with God, as the son of man is judged with his colleague! As if it were openly said: As in everything which I say I am heard, so everything which is said concerning me I might hear. Which nevertheless can in no way be done in this life, because great is the interposition to the eyes of our heart for contemplating the subtilty of God, namely our very weakness. But then we shall purely behold Him by whom we are now subtly beheld, when, having laid aside this weakness, we shall have come to the grace of internal contemplation, concerning which Paul says: Then shall I know even as also I am known (1 Cor. 13:12). Whence blessed Job, seeing that the same knowledge can in no way be fully perfected here, groans indeed for the blindness of the present life, but yet consoles himself with its shortness, saying:

CHAPTER XXVII.

VERSE 23. --- For behold, short years pass away, and I walk the path by which I shall not return.

31. Its shortness mitigates and soothes the miseries of life. Everything which passes is short, even if it seems to be finished more slowly. But in the path of death, by which we do not return, we walk, not that we are not at all brought back by rising again to the life of the flesh, but that we do not come again to the labors of this mortal life, or to acquiring rewards by labors.

[Old Edition XV, Recent X].

BOOK XVII, VERSE 1. --- My spirit shall be attenuated.

32. The good promise to themselves a short life, but the wicked a long one. The spirit is attenuated by the fear of judgment, because the minds of the elect, by how much more they feel themselves to approach the extreme judgment, by so much more terribly do they tremble for discussing themselves, and if they ever find any carnal thoughts in themselves, they consume them by the ardor of penance, nor do they permit their thoughts to be dilated by carnal pleasure, because they strike themselves so much more subtly by judging, by how much they wait for the strict Judge near at hand. Whence it happens that they always suspect their end to be near. For the minds of the reprobate for this reason do many things wickedly, because they think they will live here longer. Therefore the spirit of the just is attenuated, but that of the iniquitous grows thick. For in that they swell through elation, in that they have not attenuation of spirit. But the just, while they consider the shortness of their life, avoid the faults of elation and impurity. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIX.

IBID. --- My days shall be shortened, and the grave alone remaineth for me.

33. Hence those ones avoid the faults of elation and impurity, but these ones multiply them. Perfect life is an imitation of death. For he who considers what he will be in death, always becomes timid in operation; and whence in his own eyes he already as it were does not live, thence he truly lives in the eyes of his Maker. He desires nothing that passes away, he contradicts all the desires of the present life; and he considers himself as almost dead, because he is by no means ignorant that he is about to die. For perfect life is an imitation of death, which while the just diligently go through, they escape the snares of faults. Whence it is written: In all thy works remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin (Ecclus. 7:40). Whence also blessed Job, because he considers his days to be shortened, and thinks that the grave alone remains for him, aptly subjoins:

CHAPTER XXX.

VERSE 2.---I have not sinned, and my eye abideth in bitterness.

34. Job was struck not for the correction of fault, but for the increase of grace. As if he were to say openly: I have not committed a fault, and I have received lashes. But in this matter he moves the mind, because in many places of this history he confesses that he has sinned; by what reason then does he now deny that he has sinned? But the reason quickly occurs to these things, because he did not sin so much as to deserve the lashes, and yet he could not be without sin. For that he was struck not for the correction of fault, but for the increase of grace, the Judge Himself testifies, who praises and smites. And again, that he was not without sin, he himself does not deny who is praised by the Judge, and therefore he is praised, because he does not deny it. But I believe that we discuss these words better if we perceive them as spoken from the voice of the Head. For our Redeemer, coming for our redemption, both did not sin and endured bitterness, because He undertook the punishment of our fault without fault; from whose voice is added:

CHAPTER XXXI.

VERSE 3.---Deliver me, and set me beside thee, and let any man's hand fight against me.

35. Christ was in bitterness through His passion, He was delivered through His resurrection. For He Himself did not sin in thought or in deed; He Himself abided in bitterness through His passion; He Himself was delivered through

His resurrection; He Himself was set beside the Father through His ascension, because having gone into heaven He sitteth at the right hand of God. And because after the glory of His ascension Judea was stirred up in the persecution of His disciples, it is rightly said now: And let any man's hand fight against me. For then the fury of the persecutors raged in His members; then the flame of cruelty blazed out against the life of the faithful. But where could the wicked go, or what could they do, while He whom they persecuted on earth was already sitting in heaven? Concerning whom is still added:

CHAPTER XXXII.

VERSE 4.---Thou hast removed their heart far from discipline.

36. God makes the heart of the wicked to be far from discipline only by permitting it. For if they knew the keeping of discipline, they would by no means despise the precepts of our Redeemer; the very mortality of their flesh would have excited them to the love of immortal life. For this very fact that in this life we are subject to corruption is already of the scourge of discipline. For to be troubled by heat and cold, by hunger and thirst, to be affected by diseases, and sometimes even to be extinguished, what are these but the scourges of sin? But there are some who both tolerate scourges, and yet by no means reform their mind to the fear of Him who scourges. Whence it is rightly said now: Thou hast removed their heart far from discipline. Because although the body is under discipline, the heart is not under discipline, while each one is both scourged, and yet is not brought back to humility of mind. Nor is this said as if the almighty and merciful God makes the heart of man to be far from discipline, but that He permits it, as it has fallen of its own accord, to remain where it fell by judging it, just as we also say to Him in prayer: And lead us not into temptation (Matth. 6:13); that is, permit us by no means to be led in. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIII.

IBID.---Therefore they shall not be exalted.

37. Those expert in discipline are never raised from the lowest things to the heavenly. For if the heart were under discipline, it would desire higher things, and would not gape for acquiring passing goods. Of those, therefore, whose heart is not under discipline, it is rightly said: Therefore they shall not be exalted, because while they, abandoned to the lowest pleasures, always desire earthly goods, they never lift their heart to heavenly joys. For they would be exalted if they raised their mind to the hope of the heavenly country. But they who through discipline do not study to guard their life, always lie at the bottom through desires, and, what is more grievous, in lying down they lift themselves up, because they are extolled by transitory things. For they can be extolled, but they cannot be exalted, because they are deeper in the bottom from the very fact that they become higher in their own eyes. Therefore the heart, which is without discipline, is not able to be exalted, because the human mind just as when badly lifted up is pressed in the lowest things, so when well pressed is raised to the sublime. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIV.

VERSE 5.---He promiseth prey to his associates, and the eyes of his children shall fail.

38. The devil and the wicked are one body. His associates are the apostate angels; his children, perverse men. After blessed Job brought forth sentence concerning the multitude of the wicked, that is, concerning the body of the ancient enemy, he soon turns the sentence to the very prince of them, that is, the head of all the lost, and returns from the plural number to the singular. For so the devil and all the wicked are one body, that for the most part the body is censured by the name of the head, and the head is called by the name of the body. For the body is censured by the name of the head when it is said of a perverse man: One of you is a devil (John 6:70). And again the head is called by the name of the body when it is said of that apostate angel: An enemy man hath done this (Matth. 13:28). This prince of all the perverse, therefore, has some as associates and others as children. For who are his associates but those apostate angels who fell with him from the seat of the heavenly country? Or what other children has he but perverse men, who are generated from his wicked persuasion in the operation of malice? Whence also by the voice of Truth it is said to the unfaithful: Ye are of your father the devil (John 8:44).

39. What prey the devil promiseth to his associates. This perverse author of error, therefore, promiseth prey to his associates, because he promiseth to the malignant spirits the souls of the wicked to be snatched at their end. And the eyes of his children shall fail, because while he excites the intentions of men to hope for earthly things alone, he makes them love this which they cannot hold for long. For the intention of a wicked love is not able to remain, when both that which it loves and he who loves are known to fail under speed. Perhaps also by associates may be understood any most cruel ones and those already filled with all malice; but by children those who, still deluded by deceptive promises, are nourished for increasing perversity, so that the devil already has those as it were from the merit of malice as associates who already have no room to grow in perdition, but these as it were as children whom he milks with promises that they may profit to worse things. But the eyes of his children shall fail, because the intentions of the wicked fall when they desert all that they seek here, and there suffer without end that which they may grieve over. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXV.

VERSE 6.---He hath set me as it were a proverb of the common people: and I am an example before them.

40. The foolish opinion of the common people concerning the scourges of the elect. Let blessed Job say these things from himself, let him say them from the voices of all the elect. For everyone who is struck with a scourge is set as it were for a proverb of the common people, because every foolish person, while he desires to speak evil to anyone, takes the malediction from the likeness of him whom he sees struck temporally, and wishes that punishment to his adversary which he beholds to have happened to the just. And so it happens that the upright is not rightly brought into an example to those who are wise, while the punishment of the just is believed to be damnation, and no glory is foreseen for him by any hope of faith. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVI.

VERSE 7.---My eye hath grown dim through indignation, and my members are reduced as it were to nothing.

41. When the saints are amazed and their eyes grow dim at scourges, the weak sometimes fall away. The eye grows dim through indignation when those also who in the Lord's body, that is, in the Church, have the light of truth, while they behold themselves to be longer despised and disdained by the wicked, are troubled at the wonder of the occult judgment, and are unable to penetrate the secret of God, why the perverse are permitted to prevail against the innocence of the good. For who would not be amazed when Herodias, with a drunken king, obtains by the dancing of her daughter that the head of the friend of the Bridegroom, a prophet and more than a prophet, should be brought in a dish before the faces of the guests (Mark 6:27)? But when the just grow dim through indignation, the weak for the most part fall away even to unbelief. Whence it is added: And my members are reduced as it were to nothing. For by the name of members is expressed the tenderness of the weak, who while they behold the perverse to flourish and the just to be tortured, sometimes arrive at this, that they repent of having even begun good things; and so they more quickly depart to doing evil things, as if the good which they began had harmed their life. But this which he says: My eye hath grown dim through indignation, he opens with plainer words, adding:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

VERSE 8. The just shall be astonished at this, and the innocent shall be stirred up against the hypocrite.

42. It is for the imperfect to envy the glory of the perverse. In this place the innocent is taken as the just man not yet perfect, who beginning good things as yet, although he knows not how to harm others, yet he himself is by no means able to do perfect things. And because the hearts of the little ones, while they behold the perverse to flourish in the present life, are kindled with the torches of envy; for each one envies the present goods of others so much the more, as he has himself less contemned them. For that which is not able to be possessed entirely by all at once, is wanting to one which another has had. But the innocent is kindled against the hypocrite, while even he who is wont to harm no one envies the glory of the dissembler. But if in this place any innocent one perfect in good is taken, the innocent is stirred up against the hypocrite when he both beholds him to flourish, and yet contemns him with his flower; and by preaching what things are right, he denounces that he is to be so much more despised by the rest, as he beholds him anxiously to seek those things which may not be able to remain with him for long. In which sense is still subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

VERSE 9.---And the just shall hold his way, and to clean hands he shall add strength.

43. God, who grants temporal goods to the wicked, will not deny eternal ones to the just. For the hypocrite having been considered, the just man holds his way, because while he beholds him from a perverse will to obtain those things which are of the world, he himself is more robustly bound to the love of heavenly things, knowing that for good desires eternal rewards will not be wanting, while even to perverse and double hearts temporal goods are not denied. From which matter also to clean hands he adds strength, because beholding the perverse to obtain earthly glory, he promotes his own good works to perfection; and he so much the more deeply contemns temporal things, as he sees these to abound even to the wicked. For he considers how much they are to be contemned which almighty God provides even to the perverse. For if they were principally great, the Maker would by no means bestow these on His adversaries. Whence also he weighs it to be unworthy of himself that he should seek those goods which he beholds to abound also to the wicked, but directs his mind to perceiving heavenly things, which are not able to be common to him with the reprobate. Therefore after he brought in the exterior progresses of the wicked, but the interior ones of the good, he brought forth words of exhortation, saying:

CHAPTER XXXIX.

VERSE 10.---Therefore turn ye all, and come.

44. We ought to be converted to God by faith, and come by work. Which words of exhortation he properly forms to the elect, whom he calls to eternity. Who are invited in two ways, namely, that they should be converted, and come: let them be converted surely by faith, let them come by work. Or certainly let them be converted by deserting evil things, and come by doing good things, as it is written: Decline from evil, and do good (Psal. 37:27). But it is wonderful what is subjoined:

CHAPTER XL.

IBID.---And I shall not find in you any wise man.

45. Those who are wise in their own conceit cannot reach true wisdom. For what is it that he calls them to wisdom, and yet desires that he may not find them wise, except that they cannot come to true wisdom who are deceived by the confidence of their own false wisdom? Of whom it is written: Woe unto you that are wise in your own eyes, and prudent in your own sight (Isai. 5:21). And to whom again it is said: Be not wise in your own conceits (Rom. 12:16). Whence the same eminent preacher sought that those whom he had found carnally wise should first become fools, that they might perceive true wisdom, saying: If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise (1 Cor. 3:18). And Truth says by Himself: I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes (Matth. 11:25). Because, therefore, they who are wise in their own conceit cannot reach true wisdom, rightly blessed Job, desiring the conversion of his hearers, wishes that he may not find any wise man among them. As if he should say to them openly: Learn to be fools in your own conceits, that you may be able to be truly wise in God. It follows:

CHAPTER XLI

[Vet. XX, Rec. XV].

VERSE 11.---My days have passed, my thoughts are dissipated, tormenting my heart.

46. The days of the Church are prosperity, its nights adversity. The Saints, when forced to dispense earthly things, feel themselves tormented. The holy Church of the elect beholds the spaces of her life pass away through times of day and night, because she has been accustomed to have night in adversities, but day in prosperities. For as it were light arises to her from the tranquility of peace, and night from the pain of persecution. But when after the leisure of rest she returns to the labor of persecution increasing against her, she witnesses that her days have passed. In which days, however, she is wont to be pressed by so much the heavier cares, as she thinks that more subtle accounts are sought from her by the Judge concerning that very tranquility of peace. For in the tranquility of peace at one time she thinks of the gains of souls, at another she cares for the dispensations of earthly things. Which dispensations of earthly acts are so much the heavier to good minds, as by the sight of them they are plucked away, even for a little while, from beholding heavenly things. Whence well blessed Job, whether in his own voice or in that of the universal Church, after he witnesses that his days have passed, immediately subjoined: My thoughts are dissipated, tormenting my heart. Because while temporal happiness passes from good minds, even the care of earthly dispensation is withdrawn from them, which seemed to torment them in their thoughts. For while they desire to be always uplifted to perceive heavenly things, by that very fact that they sometimes descend from earthly dispensation to think on the lowest things, they feel themselves tormented. Whence it comes to pass that even the very adversity of persecution is turned into a great exultation of joy, on account of the rest of heart attained. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLII.

VERSE 12.---They have turned night into day.

47. The Saints prefer to endure evils, rather than be fatigued with the care of goods. For dissipated thoughts turn night into day, because sometimes it pleases the just more to endure evils from adversity than to be fatigued with the care of earthly dispensation from prosperity. But because they have known more cautiously that both adversities pass away, and prosperities shine forth again, it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLIII.

IBID.---And again after darkness I hope for light.

48. The Saints are gifted with heavenly rewards immediately after death. For light is hoped for after darkness, because either after the night of the present life the eternal light is perceived, or adversity and prosperity alternate here in such a way that they do not cease to succeed each other in turn. Whence it comes to pass that even in light night is in suspicion, and in night light is in expectation, as it is written: In the day of prosperity be not unmindful of adversity, and in the day of adversity be not unmindful of prosperity (Eccl. 11:27). But behold, because we have been redeemed by the grace of our Author, we have now this heavenly gift, that when we are withdrawn from the habitation of our flesh, we are soon led to heavenly rewards; because while our Creator and Redeemer, penetrating the bars of hell, led out the souls of the elect from thence, He does not permit us to go thither, whence He has already liberated others by descending. But they who came into this world before His advent, however much virtue of righteousness they might have, could in no wise be received immediately in the bosom of the heavenly country when led out from their bodies, because He had not yet come who should loose the bars of hell by His descent, and place the souls of the righteous in their perpetual seat. Whence blessed Job, both feeling affliction, and knowing that the retribution of the righteous was still deferred, aptly subjoins:

CHAPTER XLIV

[Vet. XXI, Rec. XVI].

VERSE 13.---If I wait, hell is my house, and I have made my bed in darkness.

49. Before Christ the souls of the righteous were kept in hell free from torments. For the former saints could both endure adversities, and yet, when led out from their bodies, they could not as yet be delivered from the places of hell, because He had not yet come who should descend thither without fault, that He might deliver from fault those who were kept there. But then man made his bed in darkness, when he deserted the light of righteousness by consenting to the crafty persuader. And because in those very places of hell also the souls of the righteous were kept without torment, so that for original sin they still descended thither, and yet from their own acts they had no punishment, it is as if to have made one's bed in darkness is to have prepared rest for oneself in hell. For it was a grave weariness to the elect after the dissolution of the flesh still not to see the face of the Creator. Which weariness blessed Job not undeservedly calls darkness. But because this comes from the penalty of infirmity, he rightly subjoins that same infirmity immediately, saying:

CHAPTER XLV

[Rec. XVII].

VERSE 14.---I said to rottenness: Thou art my father; to the worms: My mother and my sister.

50. From a corrupted origin we draw the worms of concupiscence and of cares. What is this that he said to rottenness: Thou art my father, except that every man descends from an origin already corrupted? Whence also it is added: My mother and my sister, to the worms, because namely both from that very rottenness and with it we come into this world. For as far as regards the matter of the corruptible flesh, our mother and sister are the worms, because both we have proceeded from rottenness, and we come with the rottenness which we carry. But if it can be understood spiritually, nature is called mother, and habit not undeservedly sister, because from the former we are with the latter. Which mother and sister namely are worms, because by a corruptible nature and a perverse habit we are forced to be fatigued in mind with restless thoughts, as with certain worms. For the corrupted nature of the flesh and perverse habit, because they generate innumerable cares in the heart of our infirmity, are well called mother and sister worms. For cares bite the mind, while they disquiet it. For righteous men do not cease either anxiously to think and treat what they should do, or providently to inspect whither they are to be led after the present life. Because, therefore, the elect then before the advent of the Lord saw themselves to be in the labor of the present life, and yet after the present life not yet to perceive heavenly goods, they were burned with many thoughts. For they were waiting for the grace of their Redeemer, and yet they could not reach it while living in the flesh. Whence also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLVI.

VERSE 15.---Where then is now my expectation?

51. In so many evils of the righteous, Christ is the only hope. What could be the expectation of the righteous, except God justifying the righteous, who should of His own accord descend to the penalties of the human race, and by the power of His righteousness deliver the captives of death? For they did not cease with intent thought to expect His presence: they knew that it would come, but they sought that it should come more quickly. Whence he says not: Where then is my expectation? but he says: Where then is now my expectation? [Vet. XXII.] For while he adds now, he shows that he desired that which was to come at some time, to come more quickly. It follows:

CHAPTER XLVII.

IBID.---And who considers my patience?

52. Sought for by them with ardent desires. He expressed the desire with which he hastens, being placed in the flesh, to be redeemed and to be recalled from the lower parts to the highest. And indeed it belonged to few men to weigh these things, so as to know how to think of the labors of the present life or of the subsequent delay after death. Both of which the righteous grieved that they suffered before the advent of our Redeemer. Whence also it is rightly said: And who considers my patience? Indeed there is not wanting One to consider his patience; but when He does not hear more quickly, God is said as it were to consider less. For that redemption of the human race which came at the end of the world was believed late by those who preceded from the beginning of the world, because they were separated for a long space of time from heavenly remuneration, Truth witnessing, who says: Many prophets and kings have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them (Luke 10:24). Therefore, what is now said: Who considers my patience? the vows of ardent desire are opened. For neither, as we have said before, does God not consider the patience of the righteous, but He is said as it were not to consider it by appearing less quickly to the vow of desire, and by deferring the grace of His dispensation through longer times. Let him say then: Who considers my patience? because what is short to Him who disposes, is long to him who loves. Whence considering still the losses of his delay, he repeats what he had already said before, and, being about to descend to the lowest parts, he redoubles the voice of sorrow, saying:

CHAPTER XLVIII.

VERSE 16.---All my things shall descend into the deepest hell.

53. What is the deepest hell, and let their receptacles be told. Since it is certain that among those in hell the righteous were kept not in penal places, but in a superior bosom of rest, a great question arises to us, what it is that blessed Job asserts, saying: All my things shall descend into the deepest hell. Who, even if he were to descend into hell before the advent of the Mediator of God and men, yet it is clear that he was not to descend into the deepest hell. Or does he call those same superior places of hell the deepest hell? Because, namely, as to the height of heaven, the space of this air may already not undeservedly be called hell. Whence, when the apostate angels were plunged from heavenly seats into this dark air, Peter the Apostle says: God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment (2 Pet. 2:4). If therefore, as to the height of heaven, this dark air is hell, as to the altitude of the same air, the earth which lies lower may be understood as both hell and deep; but as to the altitude of the same earth, those places of hell also which are superior to other receptacles of hell, are in this place not incongruously marked by the name of the deepest hell, because what the air is to heaven, the earth to the air, this that superior bosom of hell is to the earth.

[Vet. XXIII.] 54. Job feels that the soul alone is the whole man. But it is very wonderful what he subjoins: All my things shall descend. For since the soul alone was about to descend to the places of hell, why is it that the holy man asserts that all his things descend thither, except that he saw himself to be whole there, where he understands the weight of his remuneration? Because that which he leaves of himself insensible on earth, until it returns to the incorruption of the resurrection, he does not feel to be himself. He asserts therefore that all his things are to descend into the deepest hell, whither he sees his soul alone is to descend, because there he is whole, where he can feel what he has received. Or certainly all his things descend into hell, because the retribution of all his labors was still expected to be received in the rest of hell alone. And as it were all that he did descended thither, because there he found the rest of his retribution from all things. Whence also that same expected rest is subjoined, when it is immediately added:

CHAPTER XLIX.

IBID.---Thinkest thou that there will at least be rest for me there?

55. While Job trembles for his salvation, let no one be secure. In which words namely it is both made known what he desires, and yet he designates himself as still doubtful about receiving rest, lest to him whose holy works so many scourges have followed, by the hidden judgment of the supreme Judge, after temporal scourges permanent torments should also follow. In which matter we must consider with great fear who of us is now secure of eternal rest, if he still trembles for it whose praises of virtue the very Judge who strikes proclaims: For if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? (1 Pet. 4:18). For blessed Job knew that he would reach rest after the scourges; but that he might shake our hearts with fear, he himself seemed to doubt about the retribution of eternal rest when he says: Thinkest thou? that we namely might weigh with how much dread we ought always to fear the coming judgment, when even he who was praised by the Judge is not yet secure in his own words about the retribution of judgment.

BOOK FOURTEENTH

, In which Saint Gregory opens the historical, allegorical, and moral sense of the eighteenth and nineteenth chapters of the book of Job.

CHAPTER I.

1. Recapitulation of what was said above.--- In the former part of this work (Especially in the Preface, ch. 2) we treated how almighty God, in order to correct the minds of those placed under the Law, brought forward the life of blessed Job as a testimony, who knew not the Law, and yet kept it, who guarded the precepts of life which he had not received in writing. His action is first praised with God as witness, and afterwards permitted to be proved by the devil's lying in wait, so that through the trials of tribulation he might show how much he had previously profited in tranquility. The enemy of the human race, wicked after his custom, both knew that his life was praised with God as witness, and yet sought it for testing. When he could not overthrow him, struck with so many losses of things, so many bereavements, he excited his wife against him as a sting of evil persuasion, so that at least through familiar words he might corrupt him whom he was by no means able to overthrow through so many torments of messengers. But when with the help of the woman, which he previously obtained against Adam in paradise, he was not able to be strengthened against this second man placed on the dunghill, he turned himself to other arguments of testing, so as to bring forward his friends as if consoling him, and yet to excite their minds to the harshness of rebuking; so that him, whose patience the scourges had not conquered, at least harsh words among the scourges might overcome. But the enemy craftily lying in wait endured the fraud which he had prepared against the holy man, because as many occasions of perdition as he brought upon the holy man, so many causes of victory he ministered. For against torments he held patience, against words wisdom, because he both sustained the pains of stripes with equanimity, and wisely restrained the folly of those evilly persuading. But because in those very passions and learned speeches he holds the type of holy Church, while his friends, as we have already often said, speak some right things and some foolish, they are not undeservedly figured as heretics, who because they are friends to the holy man, say many right things about the reprobate; but because they hold the likeness of heretics, they frequently slip in the excess of their mouth, and strike the breast of the holy man with the darts of their words, but are fatigued by their very striking against an unconquerable mind. We therefore ought to distinguish with subtle discretion, both what it is in their words that they truly feel about the reprobate, and what it is that sounds foolish against blessed Job.

CHAPTER II.

CHAP. XVIII. VERS. 1, 2.---Then Bildad the Shuhite (Suhites) answered and said: How long will you toss words? Understand first, and so let us speak.

2. Heretics accuse the Church of pride and ignorance.---All heretics think that the holy Church is proud in some known things, but suspect that she does not even understand some things. Wherefore Bildad the Shuhite (Suhites) charges blessed Job with having broken out into pride, whom he confesses to be tossing words. But he marks how much elation he himself had swelled with, who thought that blessed Job spoke what he did not understand. And because all heretics complain that they are despised by the holy Church in their own estimation, it is aptly added:

CHAPTER III.

VERS. 3.---Why are we counted as beasts (jumenta), and reputed vile before thee?

3. Suspicions and reproaches of heretics against the Church.---It is proper to the human mind to suspect that what it does is being done to itself. For they think they are despised, who have been accustomed to despise the ways of the good. And because the Church shows in those things which can be comprehended by reason against heretics that what they assert is not reasonable, they suspect themselves to be estimated by her judgment like beasts (jumenta). From which suspicion of their own contempt they immediately leap to indignation, and are excited to reproaches of the same Church. Whence it is added:

CHAPTER IV.

VERS. 4.---Why dost thou lose thy soul in thy fury (furore)?

4. Heretics call the zeal of the Church fury and madness.---Heretics estimate either the zeal of rectitude or the spiritual grace of holy preaching as not the weight of virtue, but the madness of fury (furore). By which fury namely they think the souls of the faithful perish because they believe the life of the Church perishes therefrom, whence they behold it glowing against them. It follows:

CHAPTER V.

IBID.---Shall the earth be forsaken for thee?

5. God is not truly worshipped outside the true Church.---For they think that they themselves worship God everywhere, and that they have occupied the whole world. What is it therefore to say: Shall the earth be forsaken for thee? unless that which they often say to the faithful, because if that is true which you say, all the earth is forsaken by God, which we already hold by reason of our multitude; but the holy universal Church preaches that God cannot be truly worshipped except within her, asserting that all who are outside of her shall by no means be saved. But on the contrary, the heretics, who trust that they can be saved even outside of her, profess that the divine help is present to them in any place. Whence they say: Shall the earth be forsaken for thee? that is, so that whoever shall be outside thee shall by no means be saved? Whence also it is added:

CHAPTER VI.

IBID.---And the rocks (rupes) shall be transferred from their place.

6. Heretics call their teachers rocks.---Heretics call those rocks (rupes) whom they estimate to exceed the human race in sublime senses, whom indeed they glory to have as teachers. But when the holy Church studies to gather all perverse preachers within the bosom of the right faith, what else does she do than move rocks from their own places, so that they may lie humbly within her, feeling rightly, who previously stood rigid in their own perverse senses? But the heretics altogether contradict this being done, and because of her voice they resist rocks being transferred from their own place, because namely they do not wish that those who were foolishly wise in false things, being elated in their senses among them, should feel true things humbly on coming to her.

7. They rage against the Church because of the scourges she suffers.---But very often heretics, when they behold some within the holy Church laboring either in want or under scourges, immediately extol themselves into the arrogance of justice; and whatever they consider to have happened against the faithful, they think this was done for their iniquities, being namely ignorant that the quality of the present life by no means proves the merit of actions. For very often both good things happen to the evil, and evil things to the good, for the reason that both true good things are kept for the good, and true evil things for the evil in the eternal retribution. Bildad therefore holding the type of heretics extolling themselves because of the prosperity of the present life, is puffed up against the scourges of blessed Job as if from their voice against the reproaches of the just, and indeed disputes eloquently against the ungodly; but how perversely he says such things against the just he knows not, for he added, saying:

CHAPTER VII.

VERS. 5.---Shall not the light of the ungodly be extinguished, nor the flame of his fire shine?

8. Evil things often happen to the good, and good things to the evil in life.---If he denounces these things in the definition of the present life, he is deceived; because very often the light of prosperity is seen to be in the ungodly, and the darkness of ignobility and poverty hides the godly. But if indeed his speech is directed to this, that he may show what the ungodly suffer in their end, it is truly said: Shall not the light of the ungodly be extinguished, nor the flame of his fire shine? Which if it could be said rightly of the ungodly, yet it ought not to have been said against the holy man set in scourges. But we, weighing the strength of his arms in his sentences, let us consider how strongly he hurls the darts, and let us cease to look at whom he attacks in hurling them, namely knowing that with frustrated blows he strikes a stone. Let him say therefore: Shall not the light of the ungodly be extinguished? Because the ungodly also have their light, namely the prosperity of the present life. But the light of the ungodly shall be extinguished; because the prosperity of a fugitive life is terminated more quickly with the life itself. Whence it is aptly added: Nor shall the flame of his fire shine?

9. The evil mostly obtain what they seek, to the accumulation of their perdition.---For every ungodly man has the flame of his own fire, which he kindles in his heart from the fervor of temporal desires, while at one time he glows with these, at another time with those lusts, and inflames his thoughts more through the manifold allurements of the world. But if fire has no flame, it by no means shines with shed light. The flame therefore of his fire is the outward beauty (decor) or power, which proceeds from his inward heat, because what he anxiously desires to obtain in this world, he mostly obtains to the accumulation of his perdition, and whether in the power of height or in the riches of multiplication, he shines as if by outward glory. But the flame of his fire shall not shine; when on the day of departure all outward beauty is withdrawn, and he is burned by his own inward heat alone. The flame therefore is withdrawn from the fire when outward glory is separated from his inward heat. The just also have the flame of their fire, but namely that which may shine, because namely their desires shine in good works. But the flame of the iniquitous by no means shines, because by this that they seek evil things, they are drawn forth to darkness. Whence also it follows:

CHAPTER VIII.

VERS. 6.---Light shall become dark in his tabernacle.

10. The joy of the iniquitous quickly fails. Above them is joy; of the just, within.---If we very often take darkness for sadness, we ought not undeservedly to take light for joy. Light therefore in his tabernacle becomes dark, because in his conscience, which he evilly inhabits, the joy which had been from temporal things fails. Whence also it is aptly added:

IBID.---And the lamp (lucerna) which is over him shall be extinguished.

To speak as of the use of many, a lamp (lucerna) is light in a shell (testa), but light in a shell is joy in the flesh. The lamp therefore which is over him is extinguished, because when the retribution of his evils follows the ungodly, carnal joy is dissipated in his mind. But well it is not said of this lamp which is with him, but which is over him, because earthly joys possess the mind of the iniquitous, and so absorb it in pleasures, that they are over it, not with it. But the just, even when they have the prosperity of the present life, know how to press it under themselves, so that this which they rejoice at in good things with themselves, they may pass over by the counsel of gravity, and exceed by the governance of virtue. The lamp therefore of the ungodly which is over him is extinguished, because his joy more quickly fails, which possessed him entirely in this life. And he who now evilly expands himself in pleasures, afterwards the penalty narrows him in punishments. Whence it is still added:

CHAPTER IX.

VERS. 7.---The steps of his strength (virtutis) shall be straitened.

11. Those who now wander in delights, shall be narrowed in punishments.---For now he as it were exerts the steps of his strength (virtutis) as often as he exercises the violences of his power. But the steps of his strength (virtutis) shall be straitened, because the powers of his malice, which he now exhibits in his pleasure, afterwards the penalty constrains. It follows:

[Rec. V].

IBID.---And his own counsel shall cast him down headlong.

12. Every wicked man falls headlong by his own counsel.---Every unjust man now has his own counsel: to desire present things, to desert eternal ones, to do unjust things, to deride just ones; but when the judge of the just and unjust shall come, every wicked man is cast down by his own counsel, because by that which he chose to desire here with depraved thoughts, he is plunged into the darkness of eternal punishment. For him whom temporal glory here extols, there penalty without end oppresses. He who here rejoiced in pleasure, there is tortured with perpetual vengeance (ultione). And it happens for the most part that this very prosperity of this world, which is greedily desired by the wicked, so binds their steps, that even when they wish to return to good works, they are scarcely able, because they have no power to act rightly since they fear to displease the lovers of this world. Whence it comes to pass that through the glory which the wicked man attains from sin, his sins are yet more abundantly multiplied, which Bildad well expresses when he subjoins:

CHAPTER XI

[Rec. VI].

VERS. 8.---For he has thrust his foot into a net, and he walks in its meshes.

13. When the sinner strives to be disentangled from the snares of sin, he knows with how hard bonds he is held, especially at the end of life. --- He who puts his feet into a net, does not cast them out when he will, so he who casts himself into sins does not rise as soon as he will; and he who walks in the meshes (maculis) of a net, entangles his steps by walking, and when he strives to disentangle himself for walking, he is bound so that he cannot walk. For it often happens that anyone, persuaded by the delight of this world, reaches in it to the glory of honor, so as to arrive at the effect of his desires, and rejoices that he has arrived at that which he sought. But because the goods of the world are in love when not possessed, and for the most part become vile when possessed, by perceiving he learns how vile is that which he sought. Whence recalled to his mind he seeks how he may flee without fault, that which he beholds himself to have obtained with fault; but the very dignity which has entangled him holds him, and he has no power to flee without other faults from this place where he arrived not without fault. He has therefore thrust his feet into a net, and he walks in its meshes, because when he strives to be disentangled, then he truly beholds with how hard bonds he is held. For we do not truly know our obligation, except when striving to escape, we as it were endeavor to lift our feet. Whence also he opens this same obligation, subjoining:

VERS. 9.---His sole (planta) shall be held by a snare.

[Vet. V.] Because, forsooth, the end (finis) shall be tightened in sin. And because the enemy of the human race, when he binds the life of each one in fault, anxiously pants for his death, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XII.

IBID.---And thirst shall burn against him.

14. When he experiences himself to be bound, the sinner burns more sharply with concupiscence. ---For our ancient enemy, when he ensnares a life in sin, thirsts to drink the death of the sinner. Which, however, can also be understood in another way. For the perverse mind, when it beholds that it has come into sin, seeks to escape the snares of sin by some surface of thought; but fearing either terrors or the reproaches of men, it chooses to die forever, rather than to suffer some adversity for a time. Whence it gives itself up entirely to the vices by which it feels itself already once bound. He whose life, therefore, is constrained in fault even unto the end, his sole (planta) is held by a snare. But because the more he considers himself bound by evils, the more he despairs of his return, by that very despair he now burns more sharply towards the concupiscences of this world; a fervor of desires is produced in the mind, and the soul, entangled by preceding sins, is kindled even to greater offences. Whence also it is added: And thirst shall burn against him. For in his soul thirst burns against him, because the more he has been accustomed to do perverse things, the more vehemently is he kindled to drink down evils. For to the wicked man to thirst is to covet the goods of this world. Whence also our Redeemer heals a hydropic man before the house of a Pharisee, and when he was disputing against avarice, it is written: Now the Pharisees, who were covetous, heard all these things, and they derided him (Luke 14:12; 16:4). What is it, then, that a hydropic man is healed before the house of a Pharisee, except that by the sickness of the body in one, the sickness of the heart is expressed in another? For the more a hydropic man drinks, the more he thirsts; and every covetous man multiplies his thirst from drinking, because when he has obtained those things which he desired, he pants more abundantly to desire other things. For he who by obtaining desires more, his thirst increases from drinking. It follows:

CHAPTER XIII

[Vet. VI, Rec. VII].

VERS. 10.---His snare (pedica) is hidden in the earth, and his trap (decipula) upon the path.

15. How great is the craftiness of the devil in deceiving. Qualities of manners akin to certain vices. ---A snare is hidden in the earth when fault is concealed under earthly advantages. For the ensnaring enemy shows to the human mind in earthly lucre what it may desire, and conceals the snare of sin, that he may bind its soul, so that it may indeed see what it is able to covet, and yet by no means see in what snare of fault it is placing its foot. But a trap (decipula) is so called from deceiving (decipiendo). And then a trap is placed upon the path by the ancient enemy, when in the action of this world, which the mind desires, the snare of sin is prepared; which, forsooth, would not easily deceive, if it could have been seen. For a trap is so placed, that while the bait (esca) is shown, the trap itself is by no means seen by the one passing by. For as it were a bait in a snare is lucre with fault, and the prosperity of this world with iniquity. While therefore lucre is desired by the covetous man, the trap which is not seen catches as it were the foot of the mind. Therefore honors, riches, health, and temporal life are often proposed to the soul with fault; which things while the weak mind sees as a bait, and sees not the trap, through the bait which seeing it desires, it is constrained in the fault which is not seen. For there exist qualities of manners, which are near to certain vices. For rough manners are wont to be joined either to cruelty or to pride; but mild manners, and such as are a little more cheerful than is becoming, sometimes to luxury and dissolution. The enemy of the human race therefore considers the manners of each one, to what vice they are near, and sets those things before his face to which he knows the mind is more easily inclined, so that to mild and cheerful manners he may often propose luxury, sometimes vain glory; but to rough minds, anger, pride, or cruelty. There therefore he places a trap, where he beholds the path of the mind to be, because there he inserts the danger of deception, where he has found the way of a neighboring thought. And because the perverse man fears also to suffer everything that he does, and judges that to be done to himself by all which he himself prepares for all over whom he has power, it rightly follows:

CHAPTER XIV.

VERS. 11.---Terrors shall frighten him on every side.

16. The sinner, drawn by depraved desires to evil action, is entangled by fear. ---For he suspects all to be such against himself, as he himself strives to be against all. And what these terrors do in his action, is subjoined when it is said:

IBID.---And shall entangle (involvent) his feet.

[Vet. VII.] For if the feet are entangled, they cannot have free steps, and they have no power to pursue any journey, because their entanglements hold them. Depraved desires therefore draw to the worst action, but the worst action restrains in fear. Which fear, forsooth, entangles the feet, so that they have no power to go out into right action. And it often happens that for this reason anyone fears to be good, lest he himself should suffer that from the wicked which he remembers himself to have done to the good; and while he fears to suffer what he did, terrified on every side, suspected on every side, he as it were has his feet entangled, who being caught in fear, has no power to do anything freely, because in good work he has as it were lost his step from that point, whence he exceeded towards the evils which he had coveted. It follows:

CHAPTER XV.

VERS. 12.---Let his strength (robur) be weakened with famine, and let hunger (inedia) invade his ribs.

17. The unjust man wastes away with famine, because he is fed with no refreshment of internal food. ---After the manner of Holy Scripture, he seems to wish for that which he foresees will be, namely, not with the mind of one cursing, but of one predicting. Every man therefore, because he consists of soul and flesh, is as it were composed of strength (robore) and weakness. For in that part in which the rational spirit is created, he is not inappropriately called strong (robustus); but in that in which he is carnal, he is weak. The strength of man therefore is the rational soul, which has power to resist assailing vices by reason. Whence also it was said above through blessed Job: Thou hast strengthened him a little, that he might pass away forever (Job 14:20). For from the rational soul man has it that he lives forever. The strength therefore of this unjust man is weakened with famine, because his soul is fed with no refreshment of internal food. Of which famine indeed God speaks through the prophet: I will send a famine into the land, not a famine of bread nor a thirst of water, but of hearing the word of the Lord (Amos 8:11).

18. Hence the senses of the mind fail.---But it is well added: And let hunger (inedia) invade his ribs. For the ribs (costae) constrain the bowels, so that the things lying hidden within may be protected by their solidity. The ribs therefore of each one are the senses of the mind, which protect the latent thoughts. Hunger therefore invades the ribs, when, all spiritual refreshment being withdrawn, the senses of the mind fail, and they cannot rule or protect their own thoughts. Hunger invades the ribs of the unjust man, because internal famine attenuates the senses of the mind, so that they by no means rule their thoughts. For while the senses of the mind have been blunted, the thoughts go forth to external things, and, as if the ribs were weakening, those bowels which could have remained sound in secret are poured out abroad. Whence it comes to pass that, the thoughts being scattered externally, the deceived soul desires the appearance of external glory, and loves nothing except what it sees to be beautiful without. Against whom it is yet aptly subjoined:

CAPUT XVI

[Vet. et Rec. VIII].

VERS. 13.---Let it devour the beauty of his skin, and let first-born death consume his arms.

19. First-born death is pride, which rich men can scarcely avoid.---The beauty of the skin is temporal glory, which while it is desired without, is retained as a species in the skin. But by the name of arms works are not incongruously designated, because corporal work is done with arms. But what is death but sin, which kills the soul from the interior life? whence it is written: Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection (Apoc. 20:6), because he shall afterwards rise happily in the flesh, who, placed in this life, shall have risen from the death of his mind. If therefore sin is death, first-born death may not incongruously be understood as pride, because it is written: The beginning of all sin is pride (Ecclus. 10:15). First-born death therefore devours the beauty of his skin and his arms, because pride supplants the glory or the operation of the wicked. For he could also have existed in this life glorious without fault, if he had not been proud; he could have been commended by the judgment of his author for some of his works, unless elation supplanted these very works before his eyes. For we often see certain rich men, who could have had riches and glory without fault, if they had wished to have these things with humility. But they are extolled by things, they are puffed up by honors, they disdain others, and they place all the confidence of their life in that very abundance of things. Whence also a certain rich man said: Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; rest, eat, drink, make merry (Luke 12:19). Which thoughts of theirs while the supreme Judge beholds, he plucks them out of this very confidence of theirs. Whence here also is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XVII

[Rec. IX].

VERS. 14.---Let his confidence be plucked from his tabernacle, and let destruction (interitus) tread upon him as a king.

20. Those whom the devil deceives with mild persuasions, he hurries away to punishment with violent bonds. ---In this place by the name of destruction (interitus) the enemy of the human race himself, who brought in destruction, is designated; who is expressed through a certain attendant of his, of whom it is said to John: His name was Death (Rev 6:8). This destruction, therefore, in the day of departure treads upon the wicked man as a king, because him whom before he deceived with mild persuasions, at the last he hurries away to punishment with violent bonds, and he oppresses him the more harshly, the more vehemently he binds him in depraved acts. Who here also treads upon the mind of the reprobate while he possesses it, because as often as he has pressed it with delights, so often as it were has he placed the feet of his tyrannical domination upon it.

[Vet. IX.] 21. We cannot escape the temptation of sin, but we can escape its dominion. ---But if by the name of destruction, not the devil openly, but sin ought to be understood, from which it happens that the reprobate are drawn to destruction, such destruction forsooth treads upon the mind as a king, when it possesses it not resisting. For temptation of sin cannot be wanting to man placed in this life, but it is one thing to resist sin tempting, another to serve it reigning. But every unjust man, because he knows not how to resist the persuasions of sin, and fears not to be subjected to its dominion, it is rightly said of him: Let destruction tread upon him as a king. For the Apostle was repelling the kingdom of this destruction from the hearts of the disciples when he said: Let not sin reign in your mortal body (Rom 6:12). For he did not say: Let it not be, but Let it not reign, because it cannot but be, but it cannot reign in the hearts of the good. Because therefore when any fault whatever shall have knocked at the heart of the unjust man, it finds it not resisting, but subjects it to its own dominion, let it be rightly said: Let his confidence be plucked from his tabernacle, and let destruction tread upon him as a king. His confidence therefore is plucked from the earth, when every perverse man, who had prepared many things for himself according to his wish in this life, is dissipated by sudden death. And destruction treads upon him as a king, because he is either here pressed by vices, or at the time of his death he is subjected to demoniacal power by this that he is hurried away to punishments. Which is therefore so done in the minds of the reprobate, because even when the occasion of perpetrating sin is wanting, the thoughts of desires are by no means wanting to their hearts. And although they always follow the devil in work, yet they bind themselves greatly to him in thought. First therefore fault is in thought, and afterwards in work. Whence it is said to the daughter of Babylon: Come down into the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon, sit on the ground (Isa 47:1). For though dust is always ground (terra), yet the ground is not always dust. What therefore ought we to understand by dust except thoughts, which while they fly about importunately and silently in the mind, blind its eyes? And what is designated by the ground (terra) except earthly action? And because the mind of the reprobate is first cast down to thinking perverse things, and afterwards to doing them, it is rightly said to the daughter of Babylon, who descends from the judgment of internal rectitude, by a smiting sentence, that she should first sit in the dust, and afterwards on the ground, because unless she prostrated herself in thought, she would not have cleaved to the evil work. It follows:

CHAPTER XVIII

[Rec. X].

VERS. 15.---Let his companions dwell in his tabernacle, because he is not.

22. Satan is said not to be, because he has lost his well-being (bene esse). ---That is, let apostate angels converse in his mind by most wicked thoughts, his companions forsooth, who for this reason already is not, because he has departed from the highest Essence, and through this, a defect daily increasing, he tends as it were to non-being, whither he once fell from Him who truly is; who is also rightly said not to be, because he has lost his well-being, although he has not lost the essence of his nature. [Vet. X.] Still however expressing the same thoughts of the unjust man more subtly, he subjoins, saying:

CHAPTER XIX.

IBID.---Let brimstone be scattered in his tabernacle.

23. The sins of the flesh are rightly compared to stinking and burning brimstone. ---What else is brimstone but the fuel of fire? Which yet so nourishes the fire that it exhales a most grievous stench. What therefore do we understand by brimstone but the sin of the flesh? Which while it fills the mind with perverse thoughts as with certain stenches, prepares for it eternal burnings; and while it spreads the cloud of its stench in the reprobate mind, it supplies as it were nourishment against it by the following flames. For that by brimstone the stench of the flesh is understood, the very history of Holy Writ testifies, which relates that the Lord rained fire and brimstone against Sodom (Gen. 19:24). Who when He had decreed to punish the crimes of her flesh, noted the stain of the sin in the very quality of the vengeance. For brimstone has stench, fire has heat. Because therefore they had burned with perverse desires from the stench of the flesh, it was fitting that they should perish at once by fire and brimstone, that from a just punishment they might learn what they had done from an unjust desire. This brimstone therefore is scattered in the tabernacle of the wicked man, as often as perverse delight of the flesh reigns in his mind. Whom because depraved thoughts possess without ceasing, and forbid him to bear the fruit of good work, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XX.

VERS. 16.---Let his roots be dried up from beneath, and from above let his harvest be worn away.

24. The aridity and sterility of the wicked. --- For what do we understand by the name of roots, which are placed in secret, and bring forth the bud into the open, but thoughts, which while they are not seen in the heart, produce visible works? Whence also by the name of harvest that same open operation is signified which is produced, to wit, from a hidden root. And because every wicked man first withers in the thoughts of temptations, and afterwards fails from good acts, it is rightly said by Bildad: Let his roots be dried up from beneath, and from above let his harvest be worn away. Because while every depraved man places his thoughts in the lowest things and neglects to desire the joys of everlasting greenness, what else does he do but permit his roots to be dried up from beneath? Whose harvest is worn away from above, because all his operation is accounted as nothing by the heavenly judgment, even if it seems good before human eyes. Roots therefore are in the lowest part, and the harvest above, because here we first send forth good thoughts, that we may one day deserve to perceive the fruit of good works in the eternal retribution. But every wicked man, when he deserts good thoughts, and pours himself forth to those things which are without, his roots are dried up from beneath. But from above his harvest is worn away, because he who persists here sterile, is called to no rewards after this life. It follows:

CHAPTER XXI

[Vet. and Rec. XI].

VERS. 17.---Let his memory perish from the earth, and let not his name be celebrated in the streets.

25. How short is the glory of Antichrist and of all the wicked. ---We must observe that Bildad the Shuhite speaks of every wicked man in such a way that his words are covertly turned to the head of all the wicked. For the head of the wicked is the devil. He, in the last times, having entered that vessel of perdition, will be called Antichrist, who will endeavor to spread his name far and wide, whom now every one imitates when he strives to extend the glory of his praise from the memory of an earthly name, and rejoices in transitory opinion. So therefore let these words be understood of every wicked man, that they ought also to be referred specifically to the very head of the wicked. Let him say then: Let his memory perish from the earth, and let not his name be celebrated in the streets. For streets (plateae) are called from breadth by a Greek appellation. Antichrist endeavors to establish his memory on earth, when he desires, if it were possible, to remain forever in earthly glory. He rejoices that his name is celebrated in the streets, when he extends the operation of his iniquity far and wide. But because this his iniquity is not permitted to be extolled for long, let it be said: Let his memory perish from the earth, and let not his name be celebrated in the streets; that is, let him more quickly lose the praise of earthly power, and lose all the joy of his name, which he had spread far and wide in a short prosperity of time. It follows:

CHAPTER XXII.

VERS. 18.---He shall expel him from light into darkness.

26. Eternal punishment succeeds the glory of the wicked. ---He is led from light to darkness when he is condemned from the honor of this present life to eternal punishments. Whence also it is subjoined more plainly:

IBID.---And He shall transfer him from the world.

For he is transferred from the world when, the heavenly Judge appearing, he is taken from this world, in which he perversely glories. Who because he is condemned with all his followers, at the end of the world intervening, it is rightly subjoined:

VERS. 19.---His seed shall not be, nor his progeny among his people, nor any remains in his regions.

For it is written, that the Lord Jesus shall slay him with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy him with the brightness of His coming (2 Thess. 2:8). While therefore his iniquity is terminated with the state of the world, his progeny is not left among his people, because both he and his people are urged together with it to punishment, and all the wicked, who were born from his perverse persuasion in depraved actions, shall be struck with eternal destruction with their same head by the brightness of the coming of the Lord. And no progeny of his remains in the world, because the strict Judge concludes his iniquities with the very end of the world. But that these things should be plainly understood of Antichrist, is shown when it is subjoined:

[Vet. XII].

VERS. 20.---In his days the last shall be astonished, and horror shall invade the first.

27. The cruel persecution of Antichrist. Then constancy from virtue and fear from the flesh shall be present to the saints. ---For so great iniquity shall then be let loose against the just, that even the hearts of the elect shall be struck with no small fear. Whence it is written: So as to lead into error, if it were possible, even the elect (Matt. 24:24). Which forsooth is said, not because the elect are to fall, but because they are to tremble with great terrors. But then the contest of righteousness against him is related to be held by both the last elect and the first, because forsooth both those who shall be found elect at the end of the world are to be prostrated in the death of the flesh, and those also who proceeded from the earlier parts of the world, to wit, Enoch and Elijah, shall be recalled to the midst, and are to suffer the savageness of his cruelty in their still mortal flesh. At his powers loosened in such great potency the last are astonished, and the first fear, because although according to that by which they are lifted up by the spirit of pride, they despise all his temporal power, yet according to that by which they themselves are still in mortal flesh, in which they can be tormented for a time, they dread those very punishments which they bravely endure; so that in them at one and the same time there is both constancy from virtue, and fear from the flesh, because although they are elect, so that they cannot be overcome by torments, yet through this that they are men, they also fear the torments which they overcome. Let it be said then: In his days the last shall be astonished, and horror shall invade the first, because forsooth he is then to show such great signs, and to do cruel and hard things, as to bring to astonishment those whom he shall find at the end of the world, and to transfix with the pain of carnal death the earlier fathers who were reserved for his expugnation. Therefore because he has related many things concerning all the wicked, or concerning the very head of the wicked, he soon subjoins by a general definition:

CHAPTER XXIV.

VERS. 21.---These are therefore the tabernacles of the wicked, and this is the place of him who is ignorant of God.

28. The place of Antichrist is darkness, into which he shall be thrust down with all the wicked. ---For he had said above: He shall expel him from light into darkness, and shall transfer him from the world. Adding his evils, he subjoined: These are the tabernacles of the wicked, and this is the place of him who is ignorant of God, evidently indicating that he who is now lifted up by being ignorant of God, then arrives at his own tabernacles, when his iniquity plunges him into punishments; and at some time finds his place to be darkness, who while he here rejoiced in a false light of righteousness, held a place that was another's. For the perverse in all that they do through simulation, strive to occupy as it were another's place, the name of the glory of the just. But they then arrive at their own place, when by the merit of their iniquity they are tormented with perpetual fire. For here in all that they do they serve the desire of perceiving praise, and through the image of good works they extend the bosom of the mind to avarice. Let the wicked man go now therefore, and, swollen with much preparation, let him here build his habitations, let him extend the name of his glory, let him multiply his fields, and let him delight himself with abundant riches; but when he shall arrive at eternal punishments, he shall surely know that these are the tabernacles of the wicked, and this is the place of him who is ignorant of God. Rightly indeed had Bildad said these things, but he was ignorant to whom he said them. But the heart of the just man is vehemently afflicted, when sentences are brought against him from an unjust estimation. Whence blessed Job immediately answered, saying:

CHAPTER XXV

[Vet. XIII, Rec. XII].

CHAP. XIX, VERS. 2.---How long do ye afflict my soul, and wear me away with words?

29. What the just suffer from the wicked. --- The words of the holy man, as we have already often said, are sometimes to be understood as from his own person, sometimes from the voice of the Head, but sometimes as a type of the universal Church. But the soul of the just is greatly afflicted when those who know not how to live well hurl strict sentences against the good; and with their voice they claim for themselves a righteousness which they impugn by their conduct. Whence to the friends of blessed Job, holding as we have often said the type of heretics, it is rightly answered by him: How long do ye afflict my soul, and wear me away with words? For the good are worn away by the words of the wicked, when those swell against them in words, who lie either in a perverse faith or in depraved conduct. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVI.

VERS. 3.---Lo, ten times ye confound me.

30. Whether the just are silent, or whether they speak, they always experience the wicked as adversaries. ---Counting the times of the speeches of Job's friends, we find that they have spoken as yet only five times. But because he had heard reproaches from them five times, to whose reproaches he himself had answered five times, he declares that he has been ten times confounded, because he labored heavily both in that he was reproached in vain, and in that he spoke the words of doctrine to those who would not hear. And so both when he was silent and heard, and when he spoke and was not heard, he himself endured labor, who felt the pain of the heart both by being silent patiently, and by speaking to them unprofitably. Whence also he says above: What shall I do? If I speak, my pain will not rest; and if I be silent, it will not depart from me (Job 16:7). But if we refer these words to the type of the holy Church, it is clear that her great joy is to keep the precepts of the Decalogue. But the perverse confound her ten times, because in all that they sin they leave the precepts of the Decalogue by their depraved conduct, and as often they cause confusion to the good, as often as in their acts they resist the divine voices. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVII.

IBID.---And ye are not ashamed of oppressing me.

31. The enemies of the Church are restrained neither by the fear of God nor by the shame of men. ---There are some whom suddenly arisen malice invites to perpetrate wickedness, but yet human shame recalls them. And for the most part through this, that they are ashamed outwardly, they return to their interior, and take against themselves an internal judgment, because if for the sake of man they fear to do evil things, how much more for the sake of God, who inspects all things, ought they not even to desire evil things? In whom it comes to pass that they correct greater evils by the smallest goods, to wit, by outward shame internal guilt. And there are some who after they have contemned God in the mind, much more do they despise human judgments, and all the evil that they desire, they are not ashamed to perform boldly. Whom secret iniquity invites to perpetrate evil, and no open shame retards; as also it is said of a certain wicked judge: He feared not God, and regarded not man (Luke 18:2). Hence it is also that it was said of some sinning with an impudent front: And they have preached their sin like Sodom (Isa. 3:9). For the most part therefore such are the adversaries of the holy Church, who are restrained from perpetrating evils neither by the fear of the Lord nor by the shame of men. To whom it is well said by blessed Job: And ye are not ashamed of oppressing me, because although it was depraved to have willed evil things, it is worse not to be ashamed of things evilly desired. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VERS. 4.---Surely if I have been ignorant, my ignorance shall be with me.

32. Heretics oppose arrogance to the humility of the Church. ---Heretics have this as their own, to be puffed up with the empty arrogance of their knowledge, and often to deride the simplicity of those who believe rightly, and to account the life of the humble as of no merit. [Vet. XIV.] But on the contrary, the holy Church in all that she truly understands humbly depresses her sense, lest she be puffed up by knowledge, lest she swell in the searching of hidden things, and presume to search out some things which are beyond her strength. For she more profitably studies not to know what she is not able to search out, than boldly to define what she knows not. For it is written: As he that eats much honey, it is not good for him; so he that is a searcher of majesty shall be oppressed by glory (Prov. 25:27). For the sweetness of honey, if it be taken more than is necessary, whence the mouth is delighted, thence the life of the eater is killed. Sweet also is the searching of majesty; but he who desires to search this out more than the knowledge of humanity permits, its very glory oppresses him, because like honey immoderately taken, it breaks the sense of the searcher, while it is not comprehended. But that is said to be with us, which is for us; and again that is said not to be with us, which is against us (Luke 11:13). Because therefore their knowledge puffs up the heart of heretics, but the knowledge of their ignorance humbles the faithful, let blessed Job say with his voice, let him say also with the confession of the universal Church: Surely if I have been ignorant, my ignorance shall be with me. As if it were plainly said to heretics: All your knowledge is not with you, because it is against you, while it raises you up with foolish elation. But my ignorance is with me, because it is for me; since while I do not proudly dare to search out anything concerning God, I humbly keep myself in the truth. And because these very things which they seek to know heretics catch at for the use of elation alone, that they may seem learned against the faithful and the humble, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIX

[Rec. XIII].

VERSE 5.---But ye exalt yourselves against me.

33. Order requires that we should first be exalted against ourselves, and afterwards against the wicked. The wicked are ignorant of this method of correction.---But perhaps we weigh these words better if we show how they specifically fit the friends of blessed Job himself. For they, seeing the just man struck, ought to have returned to their own innermost parts, and by no means to have pressed blessed Job with words of rebuke, but to have bewept themselves; because if he was thus struck who so served, with what vengeance did they deserve to be smitten who had not so served? To whom it is well said: But ye exalt yourselves against me. As if it were more plainly said to them: Ye who ought to have been exalted against yourselves by my striking. For this is the order of exaltation in good, that we should first be exalted against ourselves and afterwards against the wicked. For he who is exalted against the good is puffed up by pride. For we are exalted against ourselves when, recognizing our own evils, we smite ourselves with the strict vengeance of penance, when we by no means spare ourselves in sins, and are inclined by no allurements of thoughts towards ourselves. If we first strictly pursue our own evils in ourselves, it is also just that we should also be usefully exalted against the evils of others; and those things which we punish in ourselves, we may also overcome in others by reproving them.

34. But the wicked know not this exaltation, because they leave themselves and attack the good. They incline themselves within their own conscience with the softness of smooth flattery, and are exalted against the life of the good with the strictness of asperity. Whence it is now rightly said to the friends of blessed Job, swelling in his scourge: But ye exalt yourselves against me; that is, ye leave yourselves to be reproved, and rebuke me with strict sentences. For he who does not first judge himself, knows not what he should judge rightly in another. And if he knows perhaps by hearing what he ought to judge rightly, yet he is not able to judge rightly the merits of others, to whom the conscience of his own innocence provides no rule of judgment. For it is from this that to certain men lying in wait, and bringing forward an adulteress to be punished, it is said (John 8:7): He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. For they were going to punish the sins of others, and had left their own. They are therefore called back within to their conscience, that they may first correct their own things, and then reprehend those of others. Hence it is that when the tribe of Benjamin had been overwhelmed in a crime of the flesh, all Israel being gathered together wished to avenge the iniquity, but yet once and again was itself prostrated in the conflict of war. But when the Lord was consulted if they ought to go to avenge it, it was commanded. They went according to the command of the divine voice, and fell once and a second time, and then finally smiting the sinful tribe greatly, almost utterly extinguished it. Why is it that they are inflamed to the vengeance of a crime, and yet are themselves prostrated first, unless it be that they through whom the faults of others are smitten must first be purged, so that they who hasten to correct the vices of others may now come clean through vengeance? Whence it is necessary that when the vengeance of the divine examination ceases against us, our conscience should itself reprehend itself, and exalt itself against itself to the laments of penance, and not be elate against the good and humble to itself, but rigid against itself, and submissive to all the good. Therefore it is now rightly said to the proud ones correcting: But ye exalt yourselves against me, and reproach me with my disgrace. All elate men reckon temporal evils to be a heavy disgrace; and they believe each one to be so far despised by God, as they see him afflicted by the scourge of striking. For they seek nothing in his morals, nothing in his acts; but whomsoever they see struck in this life, they think them to be already condemned by the divine judgment. Whence it is now well said by the voice of blessed Job:

CHAPTER XXX.

IBID.---And reproach me with my disgrace.

35. False judgments of the reprobate concerning the scourges of the just.---Because those who knew him as just before the scourges, judged him to be unjust from his very striking itself. Whence also heretics often, because they see some within the holy Church afflicted, whereas it is written of God: He scourgeth every son whom He receiveth (Heb. 12:6), suspect the tribulations of the faithful to be only from sin, and believe themselves to be just for this reason, because, being left in the sense of their own depravity, they have grown hard without the scourge. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXI

[Rec. XIV].

VERSE 6.---Know now at least that God hath afflicted me with an unequal judgment.

36. Certain words of Holy Scripture are thought depraved, because they are not required for their interior understanding. ---O how hard sounds the voice of the just man afflicted with stripes; which, however, not elation, but grief expressed! But he is not just who deserts justice in grief. But blessed Job, because he had a mild heart, did not sin even in a hard voice. For if we say that he sinned in this voice, we assert that the devil fulfilled what he proposed, saying: Touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse Thee to Thy face (Job 2:5). Therefore a heavy question arises. For if indeed he did not sin in that which he says: Know now at least that God hath afflicted me with an unequal judgment, we consent that God (which it is impious to say) did something unjustly. But if he did sin, the devil exhibited concerning him what he promised. It must therefore be maintained both that God acted rightly concerning blessed Job, and yet that blessed Job in that which he says, that he was afflicted with no just judgment of God, did not lie, and that the ancient enemy lied in that which he had promised concerning the fault of the blessed man. For sometimes the words of the good are believed to be depraved for this reason, because they are very little weighed by their interior understanding. For blessed Job had attended to his life, and was weighing those scourges which he suffered, and he saw that it was not equal that he should receive such scourges for such a life. And when he says that he was afflicted with an unequal judgment, he spoke this with a free voice, which the Lord in His secret had said of him to his adversary: Thou movedst Me against him, to afflict him without cause (Ibid., 3). For that which God says, that He afflicted blessed Job without cause (frustra), this again blessed Job asserts, that he was afflicted by the Lord with an unequal judgment. In what therefore did he sin, who in nothing differed from the sentence of his Author?

[Vet. XVII.] 37. To say good things of oneself, provided they be true, is sometimes allowed. Which is confirmed by the example of Paul and Job.---But perhaps some one may say that it cannot be without sin for us to say that good of ourselves which the Judge has said of us in secret. For whom the just Judge praises, he is not doubted to be justly praiseworthy. But indeed if he has praised himself, his justice is no longer believed to be worthy of praise. Which indeed is rightly said, if that which the just Judge offers through an equal sentence, he of whom it is treated presumes afterwards to say of himself through an elate mind. For if he himself also remaining in humble thought, cause or grief requiring it, has said true good things of himself, he has not so far receded from justice, as he in no way differed from the truth.

38. Whence Paul the Apostle also related many strong things of himself for the edification of his disciples; but in relating these things he in no way failed, because he did not recede from the path of truth and certain attestation and a humble heart. Therefore blessed Job, feeling his own life to be just, may say that he was not afflicted with a just judgment. Nor does he sin in this voice in which he does not differ from his Author, because he whom God struck without cause (frustra), himself also asserts himself to be afflicted with no just judgment. But again another question arises, which I remember to have been solved already in the beginning of this work (Lib. 3, chap. and num. 3), since almighty God does nothing in vain, why does He testify that He afflicted blessed Job in vain (frustra)? For our just Maker by so many stripes upon blessed Job, did not care to extinguish his vices, but to increase his merits. It was therefore equal (aequum) what He did through the increase of good merit; however it did not seem equal, because it was believed to punish the causes of sin. But blessed Job believed his sins were being blotted out by those scourges, not his merits increased; and therefore he calls it an unequal judgment, because he examines his life with the scourges. Therefore if life and scourges are weighed, it was not equal what blessed Job, as I said, believed was being done to him through the wrath of strictness. But if the mercy of the Judge is attended to, because through the punishment of the just man the merits of his life are accumulated, it was an equal or rather a merciful judgment. Therefore Job both said true things, while he weighed his life with the scourge; and God did not afflict Job with an unjust judgment, because He accumulated merits from the scourge; and the devil did not fulfill what he had promised, because blessed Job among words which sound hard did not recede both from a true sentence and from a humble mind. But these words of the afflicted one we understand perhaps less, unless we know the sentence of the Judge. Who (451) when He gave sentence between both parties, says to the friends of Job: Ye have not spoken before Me the thing that is right, as My servant Job hath (Job 42:8). Who therefore with a foolish mind would confess that blessed Job sinned in his speech, while by the very voice of the Judge he is asserted to have spoken rightly? Which voice indeed if we refer it to the person of the holy Church, we fit it not incongruously to its weak members, who, in the time of its persecution, while they consider both its merits and its scourges, because they see the unjust flourish, and the just perish, in no way suspect this to be just. Well, however, by the voice of the blessed man it is subjoined:

[Vet. XVIII].

IBID.---And hath compassed me with His scourges.

39. The weak members of the Church are troubled by constant scourges.---For it is one thing to be struck with scourges, another to be compassed by them. For we are struck with scourges when we have consolation even in pains from other things. For when so great affliction presses us, that the mind can breathe from the consolation of no thing, we are no longer only struck by scourges, but even compassed, because we are surrounded on every side by the lash of tribulations. Paul had been compassed with scourges, when he said: Without were fightings, within were fears (2 Cor. 7:5). He had been compassed with scourges, when he said: In perils of my own nation, in perils of the Gentiles, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness (2 Cor. 11:26), and the rest, which he so enumerates, that he shows himself to have had rest nowhere. But when the holy Church is compassed with the scourges of its tribulations, in it all the weak are reduced to a case of pusillanimity, so that they already think themselves despised in this, in that they see themselves more slowly heard. Rightly still also from their type it is subjoined by the voice of the holy man:

CHAPTER XXXIII.

VERSE 7.---Behold, I shall cry, suffering violence, and no one will hear; I shall cry aloud, and there is no one to judge.

40. God dissembles the complaints of the suffering, that He may increase their utility.---Almighty God, knowing what may be profitable for us, dissembles hearing the voice of the suffering, that He may increase their utility, that life may be purged through punishment, and the tranquility of rest, which cannot be found here, may be sought elsewhere. But this grace of dispensation some even of the faithful are ignorant of. From whose person also it is now said: Behold, I shall cry, suffering violence, and no one will hear; I shall cry aloud, and there is no one to judge. For it is said there is no one to judge when He who is Himself dissembles to judge, because besides Him there is no one who may judge our cause against the adversary. Nor, however, is this without judgment, that judgment is deferred, because when blessed Job was saying these things, both the merits of the holy man and the punishment of the adversary were increasing. Therefore it is the part of the Judge to defer this very judgment. But it is one thing what God justly disposes within, another what the mind, worn out by scourges without, desires. Whence still concerning that depression of stripes he subjoins:

CHAPTER XXXIV

[Rec. XV].

VERSE 8.---He hath fenced up my path, and I cannot pass, and He hath set darkness in my way.

41. To those sinning from ignorance and infirmity God is present as our illumination and salvation. ---He saw his path fenced up with stripes when, desiring to pass to security, he could not escape the scourges. And because he saw himself struck, and yet found not in himself a life worthy of striking, he found as it were darkness in the way of the heart of his ignorance, who could not penetrate why he was so scourged. Which is referred not incongruously also to the weak members of the holy Church, when by this that they remember themselves to have acted perversely, they are retarded also from a (452) good work; and timid from their own infirmity, they do not presume to attempt strong good things against these. For they fear to begin great good things, who remember themselves to have been weak in their own acts. And when for the most part they even know not what good they should choose, they dread as it were the darkness set in their way. For often the mind becomes so uncertain concerning its own work, that it is altogether ignorant what is virtue, what is fault. Therefore he finds darkness in his way, who in those things which he desires to do knows not what he ought to choose. [Vet. XIX.] Since therefore it is sinned often from infirmity, sometimes indeed from ignorance, it is said from the weakening members: He hath fenced up my path, and I cannot pass. But from those who are in the dark as to what good work they should choose, it is subjoined: And He hath set darkness in my way. For indeed it is from the punishment of fault to see the good which one ought to do, and yet not be able to fulfill it; and again it is from the heavier punishment of fault not even to see what one ought to do. Whence also against both these it is said by the voice of the Psalmist: The Lord is my illumination, and my salvation; whom shall I fear? (Psalm 27:1). For against the darkness of ignorance the Lord is illumination, but against infirmity He is salvation, when He both shows what ought to be sought for doing, and provides strength so that what He has shown may be able to be fulfilled. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXV

[Rec. XVI.]

VERSE 9.---He hath stripped me of my glory, and taken the crown from my head.

42. The weak members of the Church are sometimes stripped of justice for a time.---That all these things suit the person of the blessed man set in affliction, there is no doubt. But because the words of the history are open, according to the letter they do not need exposition. It is necessary therefore that they should be investigated through mystical senses. For he says: He hath stripped me of my glory. The glory indeed of each one is his justice. For as a garment covers from the cold, so justice fortifies from death. Whence not undeservedly is justice compared to a garment, when it is said by the Prophet: Let Thy priests be clothed with justice (Psalm 132:9). But because in the time of its affliction the holy Church loses this garment of justice, which protects with God, in its weakening members, let it be rightly said: He hath stripped me of my glory; that is, justice has been taken away from the weak, which could not be taken from them if it had inherent in their very marrow; but for this reason it could be taken away, because after the manner of a garment it adhered outwardly. In which matter it is to be asked how they can be called members of the holy Church, who were able to lose the justice which they seemed to hold. But it must be known that for the most part justice is lost for a time by its weakening members; but when afterwards through the knowledge of their fault they return to penance, they bind themselves to the same justice which they had lost more strongly than was believed. Where it is still added: And taken the crown from my head. As the head is the first part of the body, so the principal part of the interior man is the mind. But the crown is the reward of victory, which is obtained from above, that he who has contended may be remunerated. Because therefore many pressed by adversities by no means endure in the contest, in them the holy Church loses as it were the crown from its head. For the crown on the head is the heavenly remuneration in the mind. And there are very many who, while they are afflicted by adversities, neglect to think of heavenly rewards, and cannot arrive at the perfection of victory. In these therefore the crown is taken from the head, because (453) the heavenly and spiritual reward is taken away from the thought of the mind, so that they already desire quiet outward things, and do not seek eternal rewards, because they had been accustomed to think of them.

43. The crown is taken from the head of the Church, when prelates neglect spiritual goods.--- Or certainly the priests are not undeservedly taken for the head of the faithful, because they are the first part of the members of the Lord. Whence also by the prophet the head and the tail are said to be exterminated, where indeed by the name of the head priests, and by the appellation of the tail reprobate prophets are designated. Therefore the crown is taken from the head when the rewards of heavenly remuneration are deserted even by those who seemed to preside in this body of the Church. And for the most part when the leaders fall, the army which followed succumbs more widely. Whence soon after the losses of the greater ones he subjoined concerning the manifold tottering of the Church:

CHAPTER XXXVI

[Vet. XX].

VERSE 10.---He hath destroyed me on every side, and I am gone, and He hath taken away my hope like a tree plucked up.

44. When those set over them fall, the weak fall.---For the Church is as it were destroyed on every side, and perishes in its weak members, when those very things which seemed strong fall, when the crown is drawn away from the head, that is, when eternal rewards are neglected even by those set over them. But well is it subjoined concerning the weak falling: And He hath taken away my hope like a tree plucked up. For indeed a tree is impelled by the wind that it may fall. And he whom threats terrify, so that he falls to injustice, what else than a tree has he endured the blast of the wind, and lost the state of his rectitude? For as it were from the wind he has lost hope, who, overcome by the threats and persuasions of the wicked, has left the eternal rewards which he hoped for. And because it happens for the most part that while one fears punishments he deserts justice, it comes to pass, God judging, that even deserting justice he does not escape the punishments which he feared, and he who very little feared the destruction of the mind, tolerates also the evils of the flesh which he was fearing. Whence still it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVII

[Rec. XVII].

VERSE 11.---His fury is kindled against me, and He hath so held me as His enemy.

45. Some God strikes as sons, others as enemies.---For, that eminent preacher attesting, we say that God is faithful, and will not suffer us to be tempted above that which we are able to bear, but will make with the temptation a way to escape, that we may be able to bear it (1 Cor. 10:13). By the prophet also the Lord says: With the wound of an enemy have I struck thee, with a cruel chastisement (Jer. 30:14). He therefore who is so struck, that his strength is overcome by the striking, the Lord no longer strikes him as it were a son through discipline, but as it were an enemy through wrath. When therefore scourges exceed the virtue of our patience, it is greatly to be feared lest, our sins requiring it, we be no longer struck as it were sons by a father, but as it were enemies by the Lord. And because it happens for the most part that even malignant spirits suggest many things to the hearts of the afflicted, and among the scourges which strike without pour noxious thoughts into their minds, after the fury of the Lord it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXVIII

[Rec. XVIII].

VERSE 12.---His robbers came together, and made themselves a way through me.

46. Malignant spirits, breaking in, beset the afflicted. In them the will is unjust, and the power just. For His "robbers" are the malignant spirits, who are occupied in seeking the deaths of men. Because they make a way for themselves in the hearts of the afflicted, when among the adversities which are endured outwardly they cease not to inject also wicked thoughts. Of whom it is still said:

And they have besieged my tabernacle in a circuit.

For they besiege the tabernacle in a circuit when they surround the mind on every side with their temptations. Which they persuade by most evil suggestion now to mourn for temporal things, now to despair of eternal things, now to fall into impatience, and to hurl words of blasphemy against God. Which words, however, as we have already said, agree with blessed Job even according to the history, who while he heaped before his eyes the evils which he endured, judged that he was struck not as a son to be corrected, but as an enemy. Through whom also His robbers made a way for themselves, because the malignant spirits received against him license of striking. Whose tabernacle they besieged in a circuit, because, his goods and children being taken away, they also wore away his whole body with wounds. [Vet. XXI.] But it is very wonderful, when he said "robbers," why he added "His"? namely, to show that those same robbers are God's. In which matter, if the will and the power of the malignant spirits be distinguished, it is opened why they are called the robbers of God. For malignant spirits incessantly pant to harm us; but though they have a wicked will from themselves, yet they have not the power of harming, unless the supreme Will permits them. And while they indeed unjustly desire to hurt us, yet they are not permitted by the Lord to hurt any one, except justly. Because therefore in them the will is unjust, and the power just, they are called both "robbers" and "of God," so that it is from themselves that they unjustly desire to bring in evils, and from God that they justly consummate what they desired. But because, as we have often said, the holy man placed in the pain of punishments, uses now his own voices, now those of the Church, now those of our Redeemer, and for the most part so relates his own things, that yet through a type he brings forward those which belong to the holy Church and to our Redeemer, the care of the history being set aside for a little while, let us show in those things which he subjoins how he agrees with the voices of our Redeemer. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIX

[Rec. XIX].

VERSES 13, 14.---He hath put my brethren far from me, and mine acquaintance are verily estranged from me. My kinsfolk have failed, and they that knew me have forgotten me.

ALLEGORICAL SENSE.---47. The Jews, the brethren, acquaintance, and kinsfolk of Christ, denied Him when incarnate, whom they had foretold should be incarnate.

This we show better, if we bring forward the testimony of John into the midst, who says: He came unto His own, and His own received Him not (John 1:11). For from Him his brethren were put far away, and His acquaintance were estranged, whom the Hebrews, holding the Law, knew how to prophesy, and when present they very little recognized. Whence it is rightly said: My kinsfolk have failed, and they that knew me have forgotten me. For the Jews, kinsfolk according to the flesh, and acquaintance through the instruction of the Law, as it were forgot Him whom they had prophesied, while they both sang of Him as to be incarnate in the words of the Law, and denied Him when incarnate in words of perfidy. It follows:

CHAPTER XL.

VERSE 15.---They that dwell in mine house, and my maidservants, count me for a stranger.

48. By priests and Levites Christ was held for a stranger. They that dwell in the house of God were the priests, whose origin being deputed to the service of God was already held by office in that condition. Moreover, by maidservants are not undeservedly understood the souls of the Levites, serving more familiarly at the secrets of the tabernacle, as if at the interior of a chamber. Let him say then of the priests serving with sedulous care, let him say of the Levites obsequious to the interior of the house of God: They that dwell in mine house and my maidservants count me for a stranger, because they would not acknowledge and venerate the incarnate Lord, whom they had long before foretold by the words of the Law. Who still more clearly manifests that He was not acknowledged by their perverse will, when he subjoins:

CHAPTER XLI.

IBID.---And I was as a stranger in their eyes.

49. Christ a stranger in His own house. For our Redeemer, while He was not acknowledged by the synagogue, existed in His own house as it were a stranger. Which the prophet openly witnesses, saying: Why shouldest Thou be as a sojourner in the land, and as a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night (Jer. 14:8)? For because He was not heard as Lord, He was believed to be not the owner of the field, but a sojourner. Who as it were a wayfaring man turned aside only to tarry, because He took away few from Judea, and proceeding to the calling of the Gentiles, He performed the journey He had begun. He was therefore a stranger in their eyes, because while they thought only of those things which they could see, they were not able to understand in the Lord that which they could not see. For while they despise the visible flesh, they did not reach to the invisible majesty. Let it be said therefore rightly: And I was as a stranger in their eyes. Of which people it is still aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLII.

VERSE 16.---I called my servant, and he gave me no answer.

50. Christ despised by His own servant, namely, the Jewish people. For what was the Jewish people but a servant, who obeyed the Lord not with the love of a son, but with servile fear? Against which it is said to us by Paul: Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye have received the spirit of adoption of sons, whereby we cry, Abba, Father (Rom. 8:15). This servant, then, the Lord called, because, having conferred gifts, He studied to lead him to Himself as it were by voices sent forth. But he gave no answer, because he despised to return worthy works for His gifts. For God calls us when He prevents us with gifts; but we answer to His calling when we serve worthily according to the gifts received. Because, therefore, He prevented the Jewish people with so many gifts, let Him say: I called my servant. But because even after so many gifts he despised Him, let Him subjoin: And he gave me no answer. It follows:

CHAPTER XLIII

(Vet. XXII, Rec. XX).

IBID.---I entreated him with my own mouth.

51. Christ entreated him that was reluctant to His commands, and was not heard. As if He were to say more clearly: I, who before my incarnation had commanded him so many precepts to be performed through the mouths of the prophets, having come to him incarnate, entreated him with my own mouth. Whence also Matthew, when he described the precepts given by Him on the mountain, says: Opening His mouth, He said (Matt. 5:2). As if he were to say plainly: Then He opened His own mouth, who before had opened the mouths of the prophets. Hence also it is that it is said of Him by the spouse desiring His presence: Let Him kiss me with the kisses of His mouth (Cant. 1:1). For the holy Church, as many precepts as she has known from His preaching, has as it were received so many kisses of His mouth. But well is it said: I entreated, because being shown in the flesh, while He spoke the commandments of life humbly, He as it were asked the proud servant that he should come. Where also it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLIV

(Rec. XXI).

VERSE 17.---My wife abhorred my breath.

52. The bride, the synagogue, abhorred Christ. What is the wife of the Lord understood to be but the Synagogue, subject to Him in the carnal understanding of the covenant of the Law? Moreover, breath is from the flesh. But the faithless people understood the flesh of the Lord carnally, because they believed Him to be a mere man. His wife, therefore, abhorred His breath, because the Synagogue was terrified to believe that Him whom she saw to be a man was God. And when she heard words from His mouth corporally, she refused to understand in Him the secrets of the Divinity, and did not believe Him to be the Creator whom she saw as created. The carnal wife, therefore, abhorred the breath of the flesh, because, being given up to carnal senses, she did not acknowledge the mystery of His incarnation. It follows:

CHAPTER XLV

(Rec. XXII).

IBID.---And I entreated the children of my womb.

53. How God is said to have bodily members. In God, who is not circumscribed by the form of a body, members of the body, that is, hands, eye, womb, are so named, that the effects of His power may be designated from the names of the members. For He is said to have eyes, because He sees all things; He is described as having hands, because He works all things; but in the womb offspring is conceived, which is brought forth in this life. What then ought we to understand by the womb of God, but His counsel, in which we were conceived before the ages by predestination, that having been created through the ages we might be brought forth? God, therefore, who remains before the ages, entreated the children of His womb, because those whom He powerfully created by His divinity, He being incarnate humbly entreated. But because in that very flesh in which He appeared He was despised by their estimation, it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XLVI.

VERSE 18.---Even the fools despised me.

54. The wise falling from the truth, the fools also failed. The wise falling from the faith of the truth, it is rightly added also concerning the fools, because while the Pharisees and lawyers despised the Lord, the multitude of the people also followed their unbelief, which in that it saw a man, despised the preachings of the Redeemer of the world. For often by the name of "fools" those who are the poor among the people are designated. Whence also it is said by Jeremiah: I said, Surely these are poor and foolish, that know not the way of the Lord, and the judgment of their God (Jer. 5:4). But the wise and rich of the world being left, our Redeemer had come to seek the poor and the foolish. Whence now as it were in increase of pain it is said: Even the fools despised me. As if it were plainly said: Even they despised me, for whose healing I assumed the foolishness of preaching. For it is written: For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe (1 Cor. 1:21). For the Word of God is wisdom, but the foolishness of this wisdom is called the flesh of the Word; so that because all carnal ones by the prudence of their own flesh were not able to reach to the wisdom of God, they might be healed by the foolishness of preaching, that is, by the flesh of the Word. He says therefore: Even the fools despised me. As if it were plainly said: and I was despised even by them for whom I feared not to be accounted a fool. And because the multitude of the Jews when it perceived the miracles of our Redeemer, honored Him for the signs, saying: This is the Christ (Mark 13:21); but when it beheld the infirmities of His humanity, it disdained to believe Him the Creator, saying: Nay; but He deceiveth the people (John 7:12); it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XLVII

(Vet. XXIII).

IBID.---And when I had withdrawn from them, they slandered me.

55. They slandered Christ when He was ceasing from miracles. For the Lord as it were approached the hearts of the people when He showed them miracles, and as it were withdrew when He showed no signs. But they slandered the Lord when He withdrew, since they would not yield faith to Him when He was ceasing from miracles. But what wonder that He should endure these things from the common people, when they also who seemed to be teachers of the Law, who asserted by prophetic words that He was to be incarnate, and saw Him incarnate, were yet divided from Him by the interruption of perfidy? Of whom it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XLVIII.

VERS. 19.---My counselors of old have abhorred me, and he whom I loved most has turned against me.

56. The teachers of the Law and the Pharisees abhorred Him.---It is clear to all that God does not need counselors, who Himself provides the counsel of wisdom to the counselors of men. Concerning which it is also written: Who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been His counselor? (Rom. 11:34, from Isa. 40:13). But just as when bread or a garment is given to one in need, the Lord testifies that He has received it (Matth. 25:40), so when right counsel is given to any ignorant person, He Himself receives it, whose member he is who is instructed. For all we faithful are members of our Redeemer; and just as He is fed in us through the mercy of bounty, so He is aided in us through the counsel of doctrine. The scribes therefore and the teachers of the Law, who were accustomed to instruct the people unto life, what else were they but the counselors of the coming Redeemer? Who nevertheless, when they beheld the incarnate Lord, by their counsels divided many from faith in Him, although previously they seemed to have taught many to believe in the mystery of His incarnation through the words of the prophets. And because he is more in love with God who draws many to His love, it is further added concerning the same order of teachers of the Law and Pharisees: And he whom I loved most has turned against me. For that very order, through the persuasion of perfidy, turned away from the faith of truth, which before, serving in the labor of preaching, was loved most; whom the multitude of the people followed, not only to not believe, but even to persecute the Lord, and were inflamed with the torches of that cruelty even unto His passion. In which passion indeed the hearts of the disciples were troubled. Whence it is now added:

CHAPTER XLIX

[Rec XXIII].

VERS. 20.---To my skin, my flesh being consumed, my bone has cleaved.

57. While Christ was suffering and the apostles were fleeing, the holy women cleaved to Him like skin.---In the bone, strength is designated, but in the flesh, the weakness of the body. Since therefore Christ and the Church are one person, what is designated by the bone but the Lord Himself? What by the flesh but the disciples, who at the time of His passion savored of weak things?

But by the skin, which remains outside the flesh in the body, what are figured but those holy women, who served the Lord with outward ministries to prepare the supports of the body? For while His disciples, although not yet firm, were preaching the faith of truth to the peoples, the flesh was adhering to its bone. And when the holy women were preparing those outward things that were necessary, they remained as it were like skin on the outside of the body. But when it came to the hour of the cross, a grave fear from the persecution of the Jews invaded His disciples: they fled individually, the women cleaved. As if therefore the flesh were consumed, the bone of the Lord cleaved to His skin, because His strength, at the time of the passion, when the disciples fled, found the women near Him. Peter indeed stood for a while, but yet afterwards, being terrified, he denied Him (Matth. 26:70). John also stood, to whom at the very time of the cross it was said: Behold your mother (John 19:27). But he could by no means persevere, because of him also it is written, that a certain young man followed him wrapped in a linen cloth over his naked body, and they laid hold of him; but he, leaving the linen cloth, fled naked from them (Mark 14:51). Who, even if afterwards he returned to the hour of the cross to hear the words of his Redeemer, yet first, being terrified, he fled. But the women are recorded not only to have not feared, nor to have fled, but even to have stood even unto the sepulcher. Let Him say then: To my skin, my flesh being consumed, my bone has cleaved. That is, they who ought to have cleaved more closely to my strength, were consumed by fear at the time of my passion, and those whom I placed for outward ministries, I found in my passion faithfully cleaving to me without fear. Where also it is clearly understood that these words are spoken through a mystery, while there follows:

58. The apostles, the teeth of Christ, had lost all their power while He was suffering.---For what do we have around our teeth but lips, even if we suffer no scourges? But what is designated by the lips but speech, and what by the teeth but the holy apostles? Who are placed in this body of the Church for this purpose, that they may bite the life of carnal men by correction, and break it from the hardness of its pertinacity. Whence also it is said to the same first of the apostles, as to a tooth placed in His body: Kill, and eat (Acts 10:13). But because at the time of His passion these teeth, through fear of death, lost the bite of correction, lost the confidence of strength, lost the efficacy of every kind of operation, so that two of them walking, after His death and resurrection, spoke on the way and said: We were hoping that it was He who should redeem Israel (Luke 24:21), it is now rightly said: And only lips are left around my teeth. They were still communing about Him, but now they believed in Him very little. Therefore only lips had remained around His teeth, because they had lost the power of good operation, and retained only words of communing about Him. They had lost the bite of correction, and they had the movement of speech. The lips therefore were only left around the teeth, because they still indeed knew how to commune, but they were afraid now to preach Him, or to bite the vices of the unfaithful. Having finished these things which he spoke in the voice of the Head, blessed Job returns to his own words, saying:

CHAPTER LI.

VERS. 21.---Have pity on me, have pity on me, at least you my friends, because the hand of the Lord has touched me.

59. In adversity, the mind of the pious is moved to prayer, not to wrath.---This the mind of the pious is accustomed to have as its own, that when it suffers unjust things from adversaries, it is moved not so much to wrath as to prayer, so that if their depravity can be gently moderated, they choose rather to entreat than to be angry. Whence it is now rightly said: Have pity on me, have pity on me, at least you my friends, because the hand of the Lord has touched me. Behold, he calls those "friends" from whom he considers himself to be always afflicted with insults, because to good minds even those things become prosperous which seem adverse. For all the perverse are either converted by the sweetness of the good, so that they return, and by that very fact they are friends by which they become good; or they persevere in malice, and in this also they are friends even against their will, because if there are any faults of the good, they purge them by their persecutions even without knowing it. It is also to be noted that the words of the blessed man in public agree with those things which were done in secret before God. For he had been struck by Satan, and yet he does not attribute his striking to Satan, but calls himself touched by the hand of the Lord, just as Satan himself also had said: Put forth Your hand and touch his bone and his flesh, if he will not bless You to Your face (Job 2:5). For the holy man knew that even through this very thing which Satan had done with perverse will against him, he had power not from himself, but from the Lord. It follows:

CHAPTER LII

[Vet. XXV, Rec. XXIV].

VERS. 22.---Why do you persecute me like God, and are satisfied with my flesh?

60. God does not persecute us by being cruel.---It is not inconsistent with the language of piety that he asserts himself to be persecuted by God. For there is a good persecutor, as the Lord says of Himself by the prophetic mouth: Him that slandered his neighbor in secret, him did I persecute. But when any holy man is permitted to be scourged, he knows that he suffers persecution against the vices committed by an internal dispensation. But the cruel minds of persecutors, when they seek the power of striking, are inflamed against the life of the good not with a desire for purgation, but with the torches of envy. And indeed they do that which Almighty God permits to be done. But while one and the same cause is acted through them as through God, yet one and the same will is not maintained in the same cause, because while Almighty God in love displays purgation, the depravity of the unjust in cruelty exercises malice. That therefore which is said, Why do you persecute me like God? he referred to the outward striking, not to the inward intention, because even if they do this outwardly which God has disposed to be done, yet they do not seek this which God seeks in His action, that the good may be purged from affliction. Which can also be understood in another way. For Almighty God strikes the vices of others so much the more justly, as He has nothing of vices in Himself. But men, when they strike others through discipline, ought so to strike another's weakness, as to know how to turn their eyes back even to their own, that they may consider from themselves how much they should spare others in striking, when they are not ignorant that they themselves also are worthy of strikings. Therefore it is now said: Why do you persecute me like God? As if it were openly said: You so afflict me out of my weaknesses, as if you yourselves in the manner of God had nothing of weakness. Whence it must be considered that if there are any who perhaps are in need of sharpness of correction, then a hard correction is to be applied to them by us, when the hand of God ceases from the stripe. But when the heavenly scourges are present, not correction now, but consolation is due from us, lest while we join rebuke to pain, we add striking to striking.

61. Slanderers, like wild beasts, devour men.---But it is well added: And are satisfied with my flesh? Those whose mind hungers for the punishments of their neighbors, beyond doubt seek to be satisfied with the flesh of others. It must also be known that they also who feed on the slandering of another's life, are beyond doubt satisfied with the flesh of others. Whence it is said by Solomon: Be not in the feasts of drinkers, nor eat with them who contribute flesh to eat (Prov. 23:20). For to contribute flesh to eat is to speak of the vices of neighbors in turn in the conversation of detraction. Concerning whose punishment it is there soon added: Because they that are given to drinking and giving a contribution shall be consumed, and drowsiness shall be clothed with rags (Ibid.). They are given to drinking, who intoxicate themselves with the reproach of another's life. But to give a contribution is, just as each one is accustomed to contribute food to eat for his own part, so to contribute words in the communing of detraction. But they that are given to drinking and giving a contribution shall be consumed, because as it is written: Every slanderer shall be rooted out. But drowsiness shall be clothed with rags, because his own death finds him despised and destitute of all good works, whom the languor of his own detraction occupied here in searching out the crimes of another's life. [Vet. XXVI.] But so many hard things which blessed Job sustains, it is not worthy that they should pass by in silence, and that the obscurity of ignorance should cover them from the knowledge of men. For so many are able to be built up for the preservation of patience, as many as shall have known the deeds of his patience, heavenly grace filling them. Whence also the same blessed Job wishes the scourges which he feels to be drawn into an example, who immediately subjoins, saying:

CHAPTER LIII

[Rec. XXV].

VERSES 23, 24.---Who will grant me that my words may be written? Who will give me that they may be engraved in a book with an iron pen, and with a plate of lead, or at least be carved in flint?

62. The hearts of the Jews are designated by the plate of lead, those of the Gentiles by the flint.---All the things which blessed Job endured, because that heavy people of the Jews, being taught by the strong sentence of the fathers, recognized them, they are written with an iron pen and a plate of lead. But because even the hard hearts of the Gentiles recognized these things, what do we see them as except carved in flint? And it is to be noted that what is written on lead, by the very softness of the metal, is more quickly deleted; but on flint letters can indeed be impressed more slowly, but more difficultly deleted. Not undeservedly therefore is Judea expressed by the plate of lead, which both perceived the precepts of God without labor, and lost them with speed. Rightly is Gentility figured by the flint, which could scarcely receive the words of the sacred eloquence to be kept; but yet, being strongly received, it preserved them. But by the iron pen what else is designated than the strong sentence of God? Whence also it is said by the prophet: The sin of Judah is written with an iron pen on a diamond nail (Jer. 17:1). In the nail is the end of the body. Moreover, the diamond stone is so hard that it cannot be cut by iron. By the iron pen a strong sentence is signified, but by the diamond nail the eternal end. The sin of Judah therefore is said to be written with an iron pen on a diamond nail, because the fault of the Jews is reserved through the strong sentence of God for an infinite end.

63. Lead signifies avarice.---Rightly also by the plate of lead we understand those whom the weight of avarice burdens, to whom it is said by the reproving Prophet: O ye sons of men, how long will ye be heavy of heart (Ps. 4:3)? For by lead, whose nature is of a heavy weight, the sin of avarice is specially designated, which so renders heavy the mind which it has infected, that it can by no means be lifted up to seek sublime things. [Rec. XXVI.] For hence it is written in Zechariah: Lift up thine eyes, and see. What is this that goeth forth? And I said: Whatnam is it? And he said: This is an amphora going forth, and he said: This is their eye in all the earth. (Vet. XXVII.) And behold a talent of lead was carried, and behold one woman sitting in the midst of the amphora, and he said: This is impiety. And he cast her into the midst of the amphora, and cast the leaden mass into her mouth (Zech. 5:5, seq.).

He who, to show that he had known more broadly something about this vision of the amphora, and of the woman, and of the lead, still following subjoined: And I lifted up mine eyes, and saw; and behold two women going forth, and the spirit was in their wings, and they had wings as the wings of a kite, and they lifted up the amphora between the earth and the heaven. And I said to the angel who spoke in me: Whither do these carry the amphora? And he said to me: That a house may be built for it in the land of Shinar (Zech. 5:9, seq.). Which testimony of the prophet we have brought forth to no purpose for the proof of lead, if we do not also, repeating it, explain it. For he says: Lift up thine eyes, and see. What is this that goeth forth? And I said: What is it? And he said: This is an amphora going forth (Ibid.). God, willing to show the prophet the human race, from what fault it mostly slips from Him, through the image of an amphora designated as it were the open mouth of avarice. For avarice is like an amphora, which holds the mouth of the heart open in its circuit. And he said: This is their eye in all the earth (Ibid.). We see many men of obtuse sense, and yet we see them astute in evil acts; the prophet also attesting, who says: They are wise to do evil, but to do well they know not (Jer. 4:22). These therefore are torpid in sense, but in those things which they seek they are excited by the stings of avarice; and they who are blind to see good things, being excited by rewards, become watchful to perform evil things. Whence rightly of this same avarice it is said: This is their eye in all the earth. And behold a talent of lead was carried (Ibid.). What is the talent of lead, except the weight of sin from the same avarice? And behold one woman sitting in the midst of the amphora. Which woman, lest perhaps we should be able to doubt who she was, the angel straightway made known. For there soon follows: And he said: This is impiety. And he cast her into the midst of the amphora. Impiety is cast into the midst of the amphora, because doubtless impiety is always held in avarice. And he cast the leaden mass into her mouth. The leaden mass is cast into the mouth of the woman, because namely the impiety of avarice is burdened by the weight of its own sin. For if she did not covet those things which are below, she would by no means exist as impious towards God and her neighbor.

[Vet. XXVIII.] 64. Pride and vain glory are two principal vices. By these avarice is lifted up.--- And I lifted up mine eyes, and saw; and behold two women going forth, and the spirit was in their wings. What else do we understand in these two women, except two principal vices, namely pride and vain glory, which are joined to impiety without any doubt? Which are also narrated to have the spirit in their wings, because in their actions they serve the will of Satan. For the prophet calls him the spirit, of whom Solomon says: If the spirit of him that hath power ascend upon thee, leave not thy place (Eccl. 10:4). And of whom the Lord says in the Gospel: When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry and waterless places (Matt. 12:43). The spirit is in their wings, because pride and vain glory through everything that they do are subservient to the will of Satan. And they had wings, as the wings of a kite. A kite always strives to lie in wait for the nature of the young. These women therefore have wings, as the wings of a kite, because their actions are beyond doubt similar to the devil, who always lies in wait for the life of the little ones. And they lifted up the amphora between heaven and earth. Pride and vain glory have this as their own, that they extol him whom they have infected in his own thought above other men, and now through the ambition of things, now through the desire of dignities, they lift up him whom they have once held captured as if into the height of honor. But he who is between heaven and earth, both deserts the lowest things, and by no means reaches the higher things.

65. They lift up therefore these women the amphora between heaven and earth, because pride and vain glory so lift up the mind captured through the avarice of honor, that despising any neighbors they as it were desert the lowest things, and boasting seek high things. But such as these while they are proud, both pass in mind those with whom they are, and are by no means joined to the superior citizens. The amphora therefore is said to be lifted up between earth and heaven, because all the avaricious through pride and vain glory both despise the neighbors near them, and in no way apprehend the superior things which are beyond them. Between earth therefore and heaven they are carried, because they neither hold the equality of fraternity in the lowest things through charity, nor yet prevail by extolling themselves to reach the highest things. And I said to the angel who spoke in me: Whither do these carry the amphora? And he said to me: That a house may be built for it in the land of Shinar. For the same amphora a house is built in the land of Shinar. For Shinar is called their stench. And as a good odor is from virtue, Paul attesting, who says: He manifesteth the odor of his knowledge through us in every place, because we are the good odor of Christ to God (2 Cor. 2:14). So on the contrary stench is from vice. For the root of all evils is cupidity (1 Tim. 6:10). And because whatever evil is produced through avarice, it is worthy that the house of avarice should be constructed in stench. It is to be known also that Shinar is a very wide valley, in which a tower had begun to be built by the proud, which, the diversity of languages having been made, was destroyed. Which tower namely was called Babylon, for that same confusion of minds and languages. Not undeservedly is the amphora of avarice placed there, where Babylon, that is confusion, is built, because while through avarice and impiety it is certain that all evils arise, rightly this same avarice and impiety are said to dwell in confusion.

66. The Church asks that her sermons be inscribed in hearts heavy with avarice, and in hard ones.---These things we have said in few words by excess, that we might show the weight of sin expressed by the plate of lead. Which words nevertheless of blessed Job agree also to the holy Church, which keeping the two Testaments of the sacred eloquence, as it were a second time asks that her sermons be written, saying: Who will grant me, that my words may be written? who will give me, that they may be engraved in a book? Which because with a strong sentence she speaks now to hearts heavy through the weight of avarice, but now to hard hearts, she writes with an iron pen in a plate of lead or at least in flint. But by right we say that blessed Job uses the voices of our Redeemer and of His Church if we find something which he speaks openly concerning the same our Redeemer. [Vet. XXIX.] For by what means is it to be believed that he insinuates something through a figure from him, if he does not demonstrate him to us with open voices? But now let him open what he feels concerning him, and let him take away from us all the ambiguities of thoughts. It follows:

CHAPTER LIV.

VERSE 25.---For I know that my Redeemer liveth.

67. Job openly foretold Christ the Redeemer.---For he who says not Creator, but Redeemer, openly announces Him who, after He created all things, that He might redeem us from captivity, appeared incarnate among us, and by His passion liberated us from perpetual death. And it is to be noted with how great faith he binds himself in the strength of His divinity, of whom it is said by Paul: That although he was crucified from weakness, but he liveth from the strength of God (2 Cor. 13:4). For he says: For I know that my Redeemer liveth. As if he said with open voices:

Let any infidel know Him scourged, derided, struck with palms, crowned with a thorny crown, smeared with spittle, crucified, dead; I believe with certain faith that He lives after death, I profess with a free voice, because my Redeemer liveth, who lay down among the hands of the impious. But what, blessed Job, through His resurrection dost thou also trust concerning the resurrection of thy flesh, profess, I pray, with an open voice. It follows:

CHAPTER LV

[Rec. XXVII].

IBID.---And in the last day I shall rise out of the earth.

68. Christ died that we might not fear to die; He rose again that we might trust that we can rise again.---Because, forsooth, the resurrection which He showed in Himself He will also at some time work in us. For the resurrection which He showed in Himself He promised to us, because the members follow the glory of their Head. Our Redeemer therefore took upon Him death, lest we should fear to die. He showed resurrection, that we might trust that we can rise again. Whence also He willed that the same death should not be for more than three days, lest if resurrection were delayed in Him, it should be altogether despaired of in us. Which is well said of Him by the Prophet: He shall drink of the torrent in the way, therefore shall He lift up the head (Psal. 110:7). For He deigned as it were to drink of a certain river of our passion, not in a mansion, but in the way, because He touched death transitively, that is, for three days, and in that death which He touched, He by no means remained as we do until the end of the world. [Rec. XXVIII.] While therefore He rose again on the third day, He showed what should follow in His body, that is, the Church. For by example He showed what He promised in reward, that as the faithful should acknowledge that He Himself had risen, so they might hope for the rewards of resurrection in themselves at the end of the world. Behold, we through the death of the flesh remain in the dust until the end of the world, but He on the third day flourished from the dryness of death; that He might show to us the power of His divinity by the very innovation of His flesh. Which is well demonstrated through Moses by the twelve rods placed in the tabernacle (Num. 17:2). For when the priesthood of Aaron, who had been of the tribe of Levi, was despised, and the tribe was not believed worthy to offer burnt offerings, twelve rods, according to the twelve tribes, were commanded to be placed in the tabernacle; and behold, the rod of Levi flourished, and showed what power Aaron had in his office (Ibid., 8). By which sign what is hinted at, but that all of us who lie in death until the end of the world, remain as the other rods in dryness? But while all the rods remain in dryness, the rod of Levi returns to flower, because the body of the Lord, our true Priest forsooth, placed in the dryness of death, broke forth into the flower of resurrection. By which flower Aaron is rightly known to be priest, because by this glory of resurrection our Redeemer, who was born of the tribe of Judah and Levi, is shown to be intercessor for us. Behold therefore already the rod of Aaron flowers after dryness; but the rods of the twelve tribes remain in dryness, because already indeed the body of the Lord lives after death, but our bodies are still delayed from the glory of resurrection until the end of the world. Whence he cautiously brought in this same delay, saying: And in the last day I shall rise out of the earth.

[Vet. XXX.] 69. The resurrection of many dead reinforces our confidence.---We have therefore the hope of our resurrection, considering the glory of our Head. But lest anyone should perhaps say in silent thought that He therefore rose from death, because He, being one and the same God and man, overcame by His divinity the death which He endured from His humanity, but that we, who are pure men, cannot rise from the damnation of death, rightly at the time of His resurrection the bodies of many saints also rose again, that He might both show in Himself an example to us, and strengthen us by the resurrection of others who were like to us through pure humanity, so that when man should despair of perceiving in himself what God-man had shown in Himself, he might presume that this could be done in himself, which he should know was done in those whom he should not doubt to have been pure men.

70. Faith in the resurrection is established.---But there are some who, considering that the spirit is loosed from the flesh, that the flesh is turned into rottenness, that the rottenness is reduced to dust, that the dust is so dissolved into the elements that it is by no means seen by human eyes, despair of resurrection being possible; and while they look upon dry bones, they distrust that these can be clothed with flesh and flourish again to life. Who if they do not hold the faith of resurrection from obedience, certainly they ought to have held it from reason. For what does the world daily imitate in its elements but our resurrection? For through the moments of each day the temporal light itself as it were dies, while, the darkness of night coming on, that which was beheld is withdrawn, and as it were daily rises again, while the light taken from the eyes is restored again when the night is suppressed. Through the moments of the seasons also we see the trees lose the greenness of their leaves, and cease from the bringing forth of fruits; and behold suddenly as if from the withering wood, a kind of resurrection coming on, we see the leaves burst forth, the fruits grow large, and the whole tree to be clothed with renewed beauty. Unceasingly we see the small seeds of trees committed to the moisture of the earth, from which not long after we behold great trees arise, and bring forth leaves and apples. Let us consider therefore the small seed of any tree which is cast into the earth, that a tree may be produced from it, and let us comprehend, if we can, where in that so great brevity of the seed so immense a tree lay hid, which proceeded from it, where the wood, where the bark, where the greenness of the leaves, where the abundance of fruits. Was any such thing discerned in the seed when it was cast into the earth? And yet the secret Artificer of all things wonderfully ordering all, both the roughness of the bark lay hid in the softness of the seed, and in its tenderness was concealed the strength of the oak, and in its dryness the abundance of fructification. What wonder therefore if He reforms into a man when He wills the very thin dust, reduced in the elements to our eyes, who reintegrates immense trees from the thinnest seeds? Because therefore we are created rational, we ought to gather the hope of our resurrection from the very appearance and contemplation of things. But because in us the sense of reason has grown torpid, the grace of the Redeemer came in for an example. For our Creator came, took upon Him death, showed resurrection, that we who would not hold the hope of resurrection from reason, might hold it from His help and example. Let therefore blessed Job say: I know that my Redeemer liveth, and in the last day I shall rise out of the earth. And let whoever despairs of the power of resurrection being possible in himself, blush at the words of a faithful man placed in gentilism, and let him weigh with how great a weight of punishment he is to be struck, if he still believes not his own [resurrection], who has already known the resurrection of the Lord to be accomplished, if even he believed his own, who still hoped for the resurrection of the Lord Jesus to be accomplished.

[Vet. XXXI.] 1. The quality of bodies after resurrection.---But behold I hear of resurrection, yet I inquire the effect of the same resurrection. For I believe that I shall rise again, but I wish to hear of what sort. For I must know whether I shall rise in some other subtle body perhaps, or aerial, or in that body in which I die. But if I shall rise in an aerial body, it will no longer be I who rise. For how is there a true resurrection, if there cannot be true flesh? Open reason therefore suggests that if there shall not be true flesh, without doubt the resurrection will not be true. For neither can it be rightly called resurrection, where that which fell does not rise again. But take away from us these clouds of doubt, O blessed Job, and because by the received grace of the Holy Spirit thou hast begun to speak to us of the hope of our resurrection, openly indicate if our flesh truly rises again. It follows:

CHAPTER LVI

[Rec XXIX].

VERSE 26.---And again I shall be compassed with my skin.

72. The error of Eutychius, asserting that the body will be impalpable and more subtle than air, is refuted.---When "skin" is openly mentioned, all doubt of true resurrection is taken away, because our body will not be, as Eutychius bishop of the city of Constantinople wrote, impalpable in that glory of resurrection, more subtle than winds and air. For in that glory of resurrection our body will be indeed subtle through the effect of spiritual power, but palpable through the truth of nature. Whence also our Redeemer, to the disciples doubting of His resurrection, showed His hands and side, offered His bones and flesh to be felt, saying: Handle and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have (Luke 24:39). To whom, when placed in the city of Constantinople, I had brought forward this testimony of evangelical truth to the same Eutychius, he said: Therefore the Lord did this, that He might remove the doubt of His resurrection from the hearts of the disciples. To whom I said: It is a very wonderful thing which thou assertest, that doubt should rise to us from that whence the hearts of the disciples were healed from doubt. For what worse can be said than that this should become to us a matter of doubt concerning His true flesh, by which His disciples were restored to faith from all doubt? For if He is asserted not to have had that which He showed, whence faith was confirmed to His disciples, thence ours is destroyed. Who also added, saying: He had a palpable body which He showed; but after the hearts of those feeling it were confirmed, all that in the Lord which could be felt was reduced into some subtlety. To these same things I replied, saying: It is written: Christ rising from the dead, dieth no more, death shall no more have dominion over Him (Rom. 6:9). If therefore anything in His body could be changed after resurrection, against the truthful sentence of Paul, after resurrection the Lord returned to death. Which who even foolish would presume to say, unless one who denies the true resurrection of His flesh? Then he objected to me, saying: Since it is written: Flesh and blood cannot possess the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 15:50), by what reason is it to be believed that flesh truly rises again? To whom I said: in sacred eloquence flesh is called in one way according to nature, and in another way according to fault, or corruption. Flesh indeed according to nature, as it is written: This now is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh (Gen. 2:23); and The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us (John 1:14). But flesh according to fault, as it is written: My spirit shall not remain in these men, because they are flesh (Gen. 6:3). And as the Psalmist says: He remembered that they are flesh: a spirit going, and not returning (Psal. 78:39). Whence also Paul said to the disciples: But ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit (Rom. 8:9). For neither were they not in the flesh, to whom he transmitted epistles, but because they had conquered the passions of carnal desires, being already free through the power of the spirit, they were not in the flesh. That therefore which the apostle Paul says: Because flesh and blood cannot possess the kingdom of God, he wills flesh to be understood according to fault, not flesh according to nature. Whence also he presently showed that he spoke of flesh according to fault, adding: Neither shall corruption possess incorruption. In that glory therefore of the heavenly kingdom, flesh according to nature will be, but according to the desires of passions it will not be, because the sting of death being overcome, it shall reign in eternal incorruption.

[Vet. XXXII.] 73. The responses and evasions of Eutychius are dissolved.---Which things being said, the same Eutychius replied that he presently consented, but yet he still denied that a palpable body could rise again. Who also in the book which he had written concerning resurrection had inserted the testimony of the apostle Paul saying: That which thou sowest is not quickened, except it first die; and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain (1 Cor. 15:36). Hastening forsooth to show this, that the flesh will be either impalpable, or will not be itself, while the holy Apostle, treating of the glory of resurrection, said that the body which shall be is not sown. But to these things it is more quickly replied. For the apostle Paul saying: Thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, insinuates this which we see, because the grain is born with stalk and leaves, which is sown without stalk and leaves. He therefore in the increase of the glory of resurrection did not say that that which was was wanting to the grain of seed, but that that was present which was not. But this man, while he denies that the true body rises again, by no means says that that is present which was wanting, but that that is wanting which was.

74. The emperor thinks to commit the book of Eutychius to the flames. Eutychius dies, having abjured his error.---Then therefore being led into a long contention concerning this matter, we began to recoil with the heaviest feignedness from each other, when the emperor Tiberius Constantine of pious memory, receiving me and him in secret, recognized what discord was turned between us, and weighing the allegation of each part, destroying the same book which he had written concerning resurrection by his own allegations also, he deliberated that it ought to have been burned with flames. From which as we went out, a strong sickness followed me, and the same Eutychius a strong sickness and death followed. Who being dead, because there was almost no one who followed his sayings, I dissembled to pursue the things begun, lest I should seem to hurl words into ashes. While however he was still living, and I was sick with very strong fevers, whoever of my acquaintances went to him for the sake of salutation, as I learned by their relation, he held the skin of his hand before their eyes, saying: I confess that we shall all rise again in this flesh. Which, as they themselves confessed, he had been altogether accustomed before to deny.

75. Resurrection is proved from the words of Job.---But we, putting those things aside, let us subtly inquire in the speeches of blessed Job if the resurrection will be true and the body true in the resurrection. [Vet. XXXIII.] For behold already we cannot doubt of the hope of resurrection, while he says: And in the last day I shall rise out of the earth. He also took away doubt concerning the true restoration of the body, who said: And again I shall be compassed with my skin. Who still to take away the ambiguities of our thought adds:

VERSE 26.---And in my flesh I shall see God.

76. Job believed that the flesh was to be restored into a perfect state.---Behold resurrection, behold skin, behold flesh he confesses with open voices. What therefore remains whence our mind can doubt? If therefore this holy man, before the effect of the Lord's resurrection, believed that the flesh was to be restored into a perfect state, what will be the guilt of our doubt, if the true resurrection of the flesh is not believed even after the example of the Redeemer? For if after resurrection the body shall not be palpable, surely another rises than dies, which is a wicked thing to believe, because I die, and another should rise. Whence I pray thee, blessed Job, subjoin what thou feelest, and take away from us the scruple of this question. It follows:

CHAPTER LVII

VERSE 27.---Whom I myself shall see, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another.

77. Our flesh after resurrection will be the same by nature, and different by glory.---For if, as some followers of errors think, after resurrection the body shall not be palpable, but the subtlety of an invisible body shall be called flesh, although it be not the substance of flesh, surely he is one who dies, and another who rises. But blessed Job destroys this sentence for them with a truthful voice, who says: Whom I myself shall see, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another. But we, following the faith of blessed Job, and truly believing the body of our Redeemer to be palpable after resurrection, confess that our flesh after resurrection will be both the same and different: the same by nature, different by glory; the same by truth, different by power. It will be therefore subtle, because also incorruptible. It will be palpable, because it will not lose the essence of true nature. But the holy man adds with what hope he holds the same confidence of resurrection, with how great certainty he expects it. It follows:

CHAPTER LVIII.

IBID.---This my hope is laid up in my bosom.

78. Job is most certain of his resurrection.---We believe that we have nothing more certain than this which we hold in our bosom. He therefore held his hope laid up in his bosom, because he assumed a true certainty concerning the hope of resurrection. But because he has made known the coming day of resurrection, now already either by his own voice, or in the type of the holy and universal Church, he reproves the deeds of the wicked, and foretells the judgment which follows in the day of resurrection. For he presently adds:

CHAPTER LIX.

VERSES 28, 29.---Why then do ye say now: Let us persecute him, and let us find the root of the word against him? Flee ye then from the face of the sword, because the sword is the avenger of iniquities, and know ye that there is a judgment.

79. From the judgment which is to follow the resurrection, he urges the iniquitous to repentance.---For by the former sentence he reproved the deeds of the iniquitous, but by the following he made known the punishments from the divine judgment. For he says: Why then do ye say now: Let us persecute him, and let us find the root of the word against him? Any perverse persons, because with an evil study they hear things well brought forth, and desire to find an entrance of accusation in the tongue of the just, what else do they seek but the root of the word against him, from which forsooth they may take the origin of speaking, and expand the branches of perverse loquacity in accusation? But the holy man, when he suffers such things from the perverse, does not grieve against them, but rather for them, and reproves things evilly thought, and shows to them the evils which they should flee, saying: Flee ye then from the face of the sword, because the sword is the avenger of iniquities, and know ye that there is a judgment. Every one who acts perversely, by that very thing by which he despises to fear this, knows not that there is a judgment of God. For if he knew that this was to be feared, he would not do those things which are to be punished in it. For there are many who know by word only that there is a final judgment, but by acting perversely they testify that they know it not. For because he dreads this not as he ought, he has not yet learned with how great a whirlwind of terror it comes. For if he knew how to weigh the weight of the tremendous examination, he would surely by fearing provide against the day of wrath. To flee also the face of the sword is to appease the sentence of strict animadversion before it appears. For the terror of the judge cannot be avoided except before the judgment. Now he is not discerned, but is appeased by prayers. But when he shall sit in that tremendous examination, he both can be seen, and can no longer be appeased, because the deeds of the perverse, which he long sustained in silence, he will at once repay all together in anger. Whence it is necessary now to fear the judge, while he does not yet exercise judgment, while he long sustains, while he yet tolerates the evils which he sees, lest when once he has shaken his hand in the retribution of vengeance, he should strike so much more strictly in the judgment, as he waited longer before the judgment.

BOOK FIFTEEN.

In which a brief explanation of the 20th and 21st chapters of the book of Job is completed.

[Vet. et Rec. I.] That the friends of blessed Job could by no means have been perverse, the words of Zophar the Naamathite testify, who hearing from his mouth the terror of the coming judgment, presently adds:

CHAPTER ONE.

CHAP. XX, VERSE 2.---Therefore my various thoughts succeed one another, and my mind is snatched into different things.

1. With how great terror we ought to be affected from the assiduous consideration of it.---As if he said with open voices: Because I consider the terror of the last judgment, therefore I am confounded in fear by the tumults of thoughts. For the mind expands itself so much more in thought, as it weighs that that which is imminent is terrible. And the mind is snatched into different things, when now the evils which it has done, now the good which it neglected to do, now the reprehensible things in which it is, now the right things which it beholds to be still wanting to itself, it weighs with solicitous dread. But the friends of blessed Job, although taught by the assiduity of his life they knew how to live well, yet not knowing how to weigh the judgments of God subtly, they did not believe that any of the just could receive evils here. Whence also they suspected the same holy man to be iniquitous, whom they saw scourged, and from this suspicion it was worked that they should also fall into his rebuke; to which rebuke however they descend as if under a kind of reverence. Whence Zophar subjoins saying:

CHAPTER II.

VERSE 3.---I will hear the doctrine wherewith thou reprovest me, and the spirit of my understanding shall answer me.

2. Many hear warnings to judge, not to follow.---As if he said openly: I hear thy words indeed, but whether they are rightly brought forth, I discern by the spirit of my understanding. For they who despise the words of a teacher, take his doctrine not for a help, but for an occasion of strife, that they may rather judge what is heard than follow it. These things therefore being premised under a kind of moderation, he breaks out now into open reproach of the blessed man, when he subjoins:

[Rec. II].

VERS. 4, 5.---This I know from the beginning, since man was placed upon the earth, that the praise of the impious is short, and the joy of the hypocrite like a point.

3. Whatever is finished is short.---It is clear now that, puffed up with the spirit of his own understanding, he turns those sentences which he brings forward against the impious into reproofs of blessed Job. For whom he saw first acting justly and afterwards enduring punishments, he thinks all that he saw in him was hypocrisy, because forsooth he did not believe that a just servant could be afflicted by a just God. But let us follow those same sentences of his, which he brought forth as right but not rightly, weighing them with careful attention; and despising what he speaks false against blessed Job, let us behold how true things he would say if he spoke these against the impious. He says therefore: This I know from the beginning, since man was placed upon the earth, that the praise of the impious is short. [Vet. II.] Being about to speak of the brevity of the present life, he brought back the eye of the heart to the start of our origin, that from things past he might collect how null are those things which seem to be something while they are. For if from the very rise of the human race even to this time in which we are we lead the eyes of the mind, we see how short everything has been that could be finished. For let us suppose any man to lead his life from the first day of the world's creation even to this present day, yet today to finish that same life which he seemed to lead so long, behold the end is present, past things are now nothing, because all have passed away. There is nothing future in this world, because no moment, even the shortest, remains for life. Where then is the long time which, caught between the beginning and the end, is so consumed as if it had never been even short?

4. Many care not to be, but to be called good. The joy of the hypocrite passes, the punishment remains. The impious therefore, because they love the present life, being doubtless puffed up in it, seek to receive praise. They are extolled by the favors of the tongue, and they desire not to be good, but to be called so. Which praise indeed they think to be long while they attain it, but understand to have been short while they lose it. For in the end it is shown to them how nothing it was which they loved. Whence it is rightly said against the same impious: This I know from the beginning, since man was placed upon the earth, that the praise of the impious is short. Where it is aptly subjoined: And the joy of the hypocrite like a point. Often a hypocrite, while he feigns himself holy, and fears not at all to show himself iniquitous, is honored by all, and the glory of sanctity is deferred to him by those who see the outward things, but cannot look through the inward. Whence it comes to pass that he rejoices in the first seat, is merry in the first place at the table, is puffed up in the first salutation, is elevated in the reverent voice of those obeying, and swells with proud thought in the service of subjects, as also by the voice of Truth it is said of such: But all their works they do to be seen by men. For they broaden their phylacteries, and enlarge their fringes. And they love the first places at suppers, and the first chairs in the synagogues, and salutations in the market-place, and to be called by men, Rabbi (Matth. xxiii. 5). But what will this their joy be compared to eternity, when, at the rushing in of the moment of death, it is so consumed as if it had not been at all? The gladness of which joy indeed has passed away, and the punishment remains, and when the thing is lost, the cause lasts. But it is well said: The joy of the hypocrite like a point. For in a point the style is raised as soon as it is placed, nor is any delay made that it may be drawn along to express a line. The joy therefore of the hypocrite is after the likeness of a point, because it appears for a moment, but disappears forever; and as the style in a point is raised while it is placed, so the hypocrite loses the joys of the present life while he touches them. Concerning which it is also added:

CHAPTER IV

[Rec. III].

VERS. 6, 7.---If his pride shall ascend even to heaven, and his head shall touch the clouds, he shall be lost in the end like a dunghill.

5. The joys of the present life, which the unjust make so much of, the just account as dung.--- The pride of the hypocrite is said to ascend even to heaven, when his elation seems to lead a heavenly life. Whose head also touches as it were the clouds, when the principal part, namely his intellect, is believed to be equalled to the merits of the preceding saints. But in the end he is lost as it were a dunghill, because in his death when he is led to torments, full of the dung of vices, he is trodden down by malignant spirits. [Vet. III.] For the joys of the present life, which the unjust esteem as great goods, the just account as dung. Whence it is written: For the dung of oxen the slothful man is stoned (Ecclus. xxii. 2). He therefore who would not follow God, becomes slothful from the love of eternal life. And as often as he is struck by the loss of temporal things, he is doubtless afflicted by those things which just men despise as dung. He therefore who is worn away by the stroke of earthly things, what else is he but stoned with the dung of oxen? And rightly is the hypocrite said to be like a dunghill, because while he desires to have temporal glory, now by thought he swells within himself, now he envies the same glory in others, and mocks those who truly have it. With as many vices as he is full of, so with as it were so many dunghills does his breast stink in the sight of the eternal Judge. Let it be said therefore: If his pride shall ascend even to heaven, and his head shall touch the clouds, he shall be lost in the end like a dunghill. Who, although he feigns that he leads a heavenly life, although he ostentatiously shows his intellect to be like to true preachers, yet is lost in the end like a dunghill, because his mind is condemned for the stench of his own vices. It follows:

CHAPTER V.

VERS. 7.---And they who had seen him shall say: Where is he?

6. The life of hypocrites is detected in the end.---For the most part the life of hypocrites, being reprobate even by all, is known in the end, that by signs now more open it may be shown who they were. They therefore who now saw him puffed up, shall say of him when extinct: Where is he? Because he appears neither here where he had been puffed up, nor in the rest of eternity, in which he was thought to be. Concerning the brevity of whose life it is still aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER VI

[Rec. IV].

VERS. 8.---As a dream flying away he shall not be found, he shall pass away like a nocturnal vision.

7. The life of a hypocrite is like a phantasm.---What is the life of a hypocrite but a certain vision of a phantasm, which shows that in an image which it has not from truth? Whence also it is rightly compared to a dream, because all praise and glory are as it were lost by him while they are held. For often in a nocturnal vision some poor men wonder at themselves being made rich, they see honors deferred to them, they consider heaps of riches, a multitude of followers, beauty of garments, abundance of food to be present to them; they rejoice that they have escaped penury, which they were tolerating with a groan; but suddenly, when they awake, they find how false was that which they rejoiced in, and they regret having awoken, because true want holds them waking. So the minds of hypocrites, while one thing is what they do, and another what they show to men, receive praises from the very ostentation of sanctity, are preferred in the estimation of men to many better ones, and while they are inwardly proud in their own silent thought, they show themselves humble outwardly. And when they are immoderately praised by men, they think themselves to be such also with God, as they rejoice to have become known to men. Whence it comes to pass that they even presume that they shall receive the rewards of eternal life, and they who here exult in human favors, doubt not at all that they shall there have rest. But in the midst of these things the secret hour of vocation creeps on, and when they close the eyes of the flesh, they open those of the mind, and as soon as they have received eternal punishments, they see there that they were rich in the estimation of virtues in dreams. Well therefore is it said of this hypocrite: He shall pass away like a nocturnal vision. Because this that he sees himself for a moment rich in human estimations, is from the ostentation of a phantasm, not from the solidity of virtue. For when his mind awakes in the death of the flesh, he knows without doubt that he saw the favors of men around him while sleeping. It follows:

CHAPTER VII

[Rec. V].

VERS. 9.---The eye which had seen him shall not see him, neither shall his place any more behold him.

8. The tongues of flatterers profit him nothing in judgment.---What is the place of the hypocrite but the heart of flatterers? For there he rests where he has found favors. The eye therefore which had seen him shall not see him, because, being withdrawn by death, he is hidden from his foolish lovers, who had been accustomed to behold him with admiration. Neither shall his place any more behold him, because the tongues of flatterers do not follow him to judgment with their favors. But yet as long as he lives, he ceases not to teach even his followers those things which he himself does, and through the depravity of his own error he generates others also to that simulation which he exhibits. Concerning whom it is here aptly added:

CHAPTER VIII.

VERS. 10.---His children shall be worn away by want.

9. Hypocrites being multiplied outwardly, become empty inwardly.---It is written: Wisdom will not enter into a malevolent soul (Wisd. i. 4). And by the Psalmist it is said: The rich have lacked and suffered hunger (Psal. xxxiii. 11). For if their want and hunger were spoken of as to outward famine, surely they would not be rich who lacked the bread of the body. But because while they are multiplied outwardly, they become empty inwardly, they are recorded to be both rich and needy at the same time, because forsooth they deserve not in the least to be satisfied with the bread of wisdom. The children therefore of this hypocrite are worn away by want, because they who are born in hypocrisy from the imitation of him, while they hold not the solidity of truth, fail in the want of the heart.

CAPUT IX

[Vet. IV].

IBID.---And his hands shall restore to him his sorrow.

10. Eternal punishment will be paid to hypocrites as a kind of debt.---What is designated by the hands but works? His hands therefore shall restore to him sorrow, because he shall receive just damnation from iniquitous operation. But it is well said, not that they shall give, but restore, because his perverse actions shall pay him eternal punishment as a kind of debt. But before he arrives at eternal punishments, let him add more fully what kind of person he shows himself here. It follows:

CHAPTER X.

VERS. 11.---His bones shall be filled with the vices of his youth, and they shall sleep with him in the dust.

11. Vices never desert hypocrites.---The origin of a depraved beginning multiplies the causes of fault even by presumption. For while anyone has begun to do evil, by use it now grows for the worse in that which he had begun. What therefore is the youth of this hypocrite but the beginning of depravity? For in youth lust already begins to grow hot. And then the hypocrite has youth, when he has begun to desire and embrace the lust of glory. Which in him, while the bland fomentations of flatterers multiply it, they make more robust, and turn it as it were into bones. For this which he began badly, he daily makes stronger by custom for the worse. Let it be said therefore: His bones shall be filled with the vices of his youth, because the hard customs of depravities in him were taken from the vice of a most wicked beginning. Whence it is written in the Proverbs: A young man according to his way, even when he has grown old, shall not depart from it (Prov. xxii. 6). Which bones indeed shall sleep with him in the dust, because iniquitous customs endure in him so far as to draw him along to the dust of death. For for the bones or vices to sleep with him in the dust, is for them not to desert him even to the dust, that is, by no means to cease from iniquity even to death. Those depraved customs therefore hold him, which once began, and daily exist more hard. And they sleep with him in the dust, because they are not finished except with his life. But these things may be understood also in another way.

[Vet. V.] 12. Hypocrites feigning to have many things which they have not, lose even those which they have.---For a hypocrite sometimes has something strong and valid in his operation; but while he feigns himself to have many good things which he has not, he loses even those things which he has. Whence it is well said now: His bones shall be filled with the vices of his youth. Because since he does many things childishly, being light and changeable, even in those things which he has done strongly, he becomes soft in vice. Which bones of his indeed shall sleep with him in the dust, because forsooth as all that simulation which he acts is like dust, so also if he has anything valid in him, it is emptied of all solidity, so that through the arrogance of virtue he loses this also, which could have been of virtue in him. For the bones to sleep with him in the dust, therefore, is for even those things well done to perish together with his depraved acts. It follows:

CHAPTER XI.

VERS. 12.---For when evil shall be sweet in his mouth, he shall hide it under his tongue.

13. It is the part of the hypocrite to pretend sweet things in words, and to plot perversities in thoughts.---Evil is sweet in the mouth of the hypocrite, because iniquity is sweet to him in his mind. For the mouth is the thought of the heart, concerning which it is written: Deceitful lips in the heart, and they have spoken evil with the heart (Psal. xi. 3). But this evil, which is sweet in the mouth of the hypocrite, is hidden under his tongue, because the roughness of malice which lies hid in the mind, is covered under the cloak of bland speech. For the evil would be in the tongue, and not under the tongue, if the hypocrite speaking should open the malice of his depravity. But as most of the just, when they see some acting perversely, who are to be smitten with hard rebukes, take roughness in the tongue, but cover the benignity of their mind under the tongue. Whence also it is said by the voice of the Bridegroom of the holy Church: Honey and milk are under thy tongue (Cant. iv. 11). For they who would not open the sweetness of their mind to the weak, but speaking smite them with a certain roughness, and yet amidst the rough words as it were secretly interpose something of sweetness, these namely have sweetness not in the tongue, but under the tongue, because amidst the hard things which they bring forth they emit certain bland and sweet things, by which the mind of the sorrowing may be refreshed from benignity. So all the perverse, because they have evil not in the tongue, but under the tongue, pretend sweet things in their speeches, and plot perversities in their thoughts. For hence it is that Joab held the chin of Amasa with his right hand, but secretly putting his left to the sword, he poured out his bowels (II Sam. xx. 9). For to hold the chin with the right hand is as it were to flatter from benignity. But he puts his left to the sword, who secretly strikes from malice. Hence also concerning their head himself it is written: Under his tongue is labor and sorrow (Psal. x. 7). For he who does not openly show the evils which he thinks, does not exert the labor and sorrow of those whose death he desires in the tongue, but presses it under the tongue. But it is well subjoined concerning this hypocrite:

CHAPTER XII

[Rec. VI].

VERS. 13.---He will spare it, and will not leave it, and will hide it in his throat.

14. It is the part of the hypocrite never to confess things committed.---For he spares the evil which he loves, because he does not persecute this in himself by repenting. Whence also it is added: He will not leave it. For if he wished to leave it, he would by no means spare it, because he would persecute it. But he hides this in the throat, because he so preserves it in thought, as never to bring it forth in voice. It follows:

CHAPTER XIII.

VERS. 14.---His bread in his belly shall be turned into the gall of asps within him.

15. The glory in which the hypocrite delights is converted into the gall of asps.---That which bread is in the belly, is the satiety of temporal delight in the mind. Let the hypocrite, then, be satiated now with the praise bestowed on him, let him be delighted with honors; his bread in his belly shall be turned into the gall of asps within him, because the satiety of transitory delight will be turned into bitterness in the end of retribution; and it is recognized to have been the persuasion of the gall of asps, that is, of malignant spirits, which was here believed to be the praise of glory. For then the wicked see that they have been infected with the venom of the ancient serpent, when, delivered over to the avenging flames, they are tormented with the same persuader of theirs. This bread, therefore, tastes of one thing in the mouth, but of another in the belly, because the joy of transitory delight is sweet while it is being acted out here as if by chewing; but it becomes bitter in the belly, because after the joy is completed, it is swallowed down for punishment.

[Vet. VI.] 16. The hypocrite desires to be instructed in the mysteries of Sacred Scripture, not that he may live by them, but that he may be extolled. Or certainly, because bread is not inconveniently understood as the understanding of Sacred Scripture, which refreshes the mind and provides it with the strength for good work, and often the hypocrite also studies to be instructed in the mysteries of sacred eloquence (sacri eloquii); yet not that he may live by them, but that he may appear to other men how learned he is; his bread in his belly shall be turned into the gall of asps within him, because while he glories in the knowledge of the sacred law, he converts for himself the drink of life into a cup of poison; and thence the reprobate dies, whence he seemed to be instructed for life. Nor is this inconveniently understood, that sometimes the hypocrite, while he studies the word of doctrine for display, blinded by divine judgment, understands perversely this very word which he evilly seeks. But when he falls into the error of heresy, it happens to him that just as from the gall of asps, so the unhappy man dies from bread; and in his doctrine he finds death, because in the words of life he by no means sought life. But it often happens that the eloquence of divine admonition, even if the hypocrite understands it rightly, because he by no means preserves it in work, he loses these things even before he finishes the course of the present life, so that he loses knowing what by knowing he refused to do. Whence also it is subjoined:

[Vec. VII.]

VERS. 15.---The riches which he hath swallowed he shall vomit up, and God shall draw them out of his belly.

17. By contemning good work, the hypocrite often loses even knowledge.---The hypocrite wishes to know the divine eloquence (divina eloquia), and yet not to do it. He wishes to speak learnedly, and not to live so. For the reason, therefore, that he does not act what he knows, he loses even this which he knows, so that because he does not join the pure operation of his knowledge, by contemning the purity of good work he loses also knowledge. The riches, therefore, of the sacred law, which by reading he swallowed down, by forgetting he vomits up, and God draws them out of his belly, because that which he refused to observe, by a just judgment

He plucks out of his memory, lest he should hold the precepts of God at least in his tongue, which he has not preserved in his life. Whence it is said by the Prophet: But to the sinner God hath said: Why dost thou declare my justices, and take my covenant through thy mouth (Psal. xlix. 16)? Which words of doctrine also, if ever it happens that the hypocrite seems to retain them in his mouth even unto the end, he will be the more damned thence, whence even the evil man is by no means deprived of the good gift of God. For it is written: To them that remember His commandments to do them (Psal. cii. 18). He, therefore, who remembers His commandments in memory, but by no means does them, this man holds in the words of doctrine the sentences by which he is to be damned.

[Rec. VIII.] 18. Sacred eloquence is for eternal damnation to those who either will not know it, or knowing it contemn it. Hence indeed it is written in Zechariah: What seest thou, Zechariah? And I said: I see a flying roll, the length thereof is twenty cubits, and the breadth thereof ten cubits. And he said to me: This is the curse that goeth forth over the face of the whole earth, for every thief, as it is there written, shall be judged (Zach. v. 2). For what is the flying roll, but Sacred Scripture? Which while it speaks of heavenly things, lifts up the intention to the higher things of our mind, because while we behold it to be above us, we avoid attending to, that is, desiring, the lowest things. [Vet. VII.] Which is said to have a breadth of ten cubits, but a length of twenty, because the breadth of our operation is single, and the long-suffering (longanimitas) of hope is extended to double, since for our good work both rest of mind is prepared for us here, and eternal joys there, the Truth attesting, who says: Whosoever shall leave house, or lands, and the rest, shall receive an hundredfold in this world, and in the future shall possess eternal life (Matth. xix. 29; Luke xviii. 30). For the number of an hundred becomes perfect by the ten being tenfold. He, therefore, receives an hundredfold here, who although he should have nothing, yet by that very perfection of mind already seeks to have nothing in this world. Because, therefore, by this a double is returned to us for a single, rightly is this roll extended in length through twenty cubits, which is widened through ten. But because these very sacred words are for eternal damnation to those who either will not know them, or certainly knowing them contemn them, it is rightly said of this roll: This is the curse that goeth forth over the face of the whole earth (Zach. v. 3). And why it is called a curse, he adds: Because every thief, as it is there written, shall be judged. The hypocrite, therefore, because he contemns living according to the words of the law which he knows, and seeks favors from doctrine, shall be judged a thief, because by this that he speaks just things, he snatches for himself the praise of the life of the just. Concerning whom it is still well subjoined:

CHAPTER XV

[Rec. IX].

VERS. 16.---He shall suck the head of asps, and the viper's tongue shall kill him.

19. In temptation the devil first creeps in gently, afterwards he pulls violently.---The asp is a small serpent, but the viper is of a more prolonged body; and asps produce eggs, and from their eggs their young are procreated, but vipers when they have conceived, their young rage in the belly, who, having burst the sides of their mothers, proceed from their bellies. Whence also the viper is so named because it brings forth by force (vi pariat). Therefore the viper is so born that it goes out violently, and is produced with the extinction of its mother. What then are figured by small asps but the latent suggestions of unclean spirits, which first creep into the hearts of men with a small persuasion? But what is designated by the viper's tongue, but the violent temptation of the devil? For first he creeps in gently, but afterwards he even pulls violently. Therefore he sucks the head of asps, because the beginning of a hidden suggestion is first born small in the heart, but the viper's tongue kills him, because afterwards the captured mind is slain by the venom of a violent temptation. First the unclean spirits speak to the heart of man with subtle counsels, who while they gently persuade, as it were pour out the venom of asps. Whence it is written: They have broken the eggs of asps, and have woven the webs of the spider. He that shall eat of their eggs shall die, and that which is warmed shall break out into a cockatrice (regulum) (Isai. lix. 5). [Vet. VIII.] To break the eggs of asps for wicked men is to open by perverse works the counsels of malignant spirits, which lie hid in their hearts. To weave also the webs of the spider is to work any temporal things for the concupiscence of this world. Which while they are solidified by no stability, the wind of mortal life undoubtedly snatches them away. But it is well added: He that shall eat of their eggs shall die (Ibid.), because he who receives the counsels of unclean spirits, kills in himself the life of the soul. And that which is warmed shall break out into a cockatrice (regulum), because the counsel of the malignant spirit which is covered in the heart is nourished to full iniquity (iniquitatem). For the cockatrice (regulus) is called the king of serpents. But who is the head of the reprobate, but the Antichrist? Therefore that which shall have been warmed shall break out into a cockatrice (regulus), because he who receives in himself the counsels of the asp to be nourished, having been made a member of the wicked head, grows into the body of the Antichrist. Concerning this hypocrite, therefore, it is said: He shall suck the head of asps, and the viper's tongue shall kill him, because when he willingly receives the wicked suggestion of the ancient enemy, he afterwards delivers himself up vanquished to his violent temptations. Whence also in paradise, he brought words of bland persuasion to the man while standing (Gen. iii. 5 seq.); but him whom once he snatched to consent, now even while resisting he pulls, and almost violently kills him vanquished by the delights of his corruption. But perhaps we are able to understand these very things even through a contrary interpretation. For because the asp kills quickly with its venom, but the viper more slowly, by the asp is designated a violent and sudden temptation, but by the viper a gentle and long-lasting one. Whence also to the one death is said to be in the sucking of the head, but to the viper in the tongue, because a sudden temptation often kills the unexpecting mind as soon as it arises; but a long temptation, because it suggests perverse things by persuading for a longer time, as it were from the tongue the viper kills. And because every hypocrite, penetrated by the suggestion of unclean spirits, as it were by the venom of serpents, by no means considers what are the heavenly gifts of the Holy Spirit, while he spreads the intention of the heart in exterior favors, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XVI

[Rec. X].

VERS. 17.---He shall not see the rivulets of the river, the torrents of honey and butter.

20. The hypocrite is devoid of faith, hope, and charity.---In the Gospel the Lord says: He that believeth in me, as the Scripture saith, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water (John vii. 38). Where the Evangelist subjoins, saying: But this He said of the Spirit, which they that believed in Him were to receive. The rivulets of the river, therefore, are the gifts of the Holy Spirit. A rivulet of the river is charity (charitas), a rivulet of the river is faith, a rivulet of the river is hope. But since every hypocrite loves neither God nor his neighbor, while he seeks the transitory glory of the world, he does not see the rivulets of the river, because he is not infused with the irrigation of charity. The hypocrite, while he seeks present gains, despises future gifts, and not having faith, he does not see the rivulet of the river in his mind, because faith is the substance of things to be hoped for, the evidence of things not appearing (Hebr. xi. 1). And while the hypocrite retains those things which are seen, he neglects the hope of those things which are not seen. Therefore he does not see the rivulet of the river through desire, because he intends only visible things. And it is written: For what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for (Rom. viii. 24)? He would, therefore, have seen the rivulets of the river, if he had closed his eyes to the glory of the present world, and opened them to the love of the heavenly country (coelestis patriae). And it is to be noted that he says not rivers, but rivulets (rivulos). For by the rivulets of the river can be understood those spiritual gifts which run so subtly from heavenly things into the mind of the lover, that they cannot be fulfilled through the mouth of the flesh. For often the soul of the lover is filled with such a gift of contemplation (contemplationis), that it is able to see what it is not able to speak. But the torrent river is that very inundation of the Holy Spirit, which is collected in the soul of the contemplator by an exuberant infusion, when the mind is filled more than it is sufficient to understand.

[Vet. IX.] And it is to be known that when the grace of the Holy Spirit infuses us, it fills us likewise with honey and butter. For honey falls from above, but butter is collected from the milk of animals. Therefore honey is from the air, but butter is from the flesh. But the Only-begotten of the Highest Father, although He be God above all, was made man among all. Who when He filled us with the sweetness of His divinity and the mystery of His incarnation, satiated us likewise with honey and butter. Because, therefore, the spirit of Christ gladdens the mind which it has filled, both with the sweetness of His divinity and with the faith of His incarnation, these rivulets of the torrent river are mentioned to be of honey and butter together, because both from the knowledge of God they refresh the mind with high sweetness, and from the grace of the incarnation they anoint it with the mystery of the charism. But because this hypocrite, poured out in exterior favors, does not perceive these internal gifts, he adds to what things he may tend after punishments, when it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XVII

[Rec. XI].

VERS. 18.---He shall pay for all that he hath done, and yet he shall not be consumed.

21. The damned are always dying, yet never to be consumed by death.---For he pays in torment those desires which he kept here illicitly; and, delivered over to the avenging flames, he is always dying, because he is always preserved in death. For he is not consumed in death, because if the life of the dying were consumed, the punishment would also end with the life. But that he may be tormented without end, he is compelled to live without end in punishment, so that he whose life was dead here in guilt, there his death may live in punishment. Let him say, therefore: He shall pay for all that he hath done, and yet he shall not be consumed, because he is tormented, and not extinguished; he dies, and lives; he fails, and subsists; he is always ending, and is without end. These things are very terrible by hearing alone, how much more by suffering! But because the multitude of his iniquity (iniquitatis) demands that he can never be without punishments, it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XVIII.

IBID.---According to the multitude of his inventions, so also shall he suffer.

22. They are tormented for punishment with new inventions, who found many things for guilt.---Because he found many things for guilt, he is tormented with new inventions in punishment. For what he could not suspect here, that he feels there when delivered over to vengeance. For as the elect exercised in good works sometimes study to do more than the Lord deigned to command them (for virginity of the flesh was by no means commanded, but only praised; for if it were commanded, surely marriage would already be believed to be a fault, and yet many are powerful in the virtue of virginity, so that namely they may impend more in obedience than they received in precept), so for the most part all the perverse are exercised in wicked acts, so that they find more to do in perverse operation than they could receive examples of iniquity (iniquitatis) from the use of the reprobate. Whence also they are smitten with the torment of more ample retribution, because they themselves have found more wicked actions from themselves, for which they ought to be smitten. [Vet. X, Rec. XII.] Well therefore is it said: According to the multitude of his inventions, so also shall he suffer. For he would not find new iniquity unless he also sought it; and he would not seek it, unless from study he hastened to perpetrate it. Therefore the excess of evil thought is weighed in his torment, and he receives the pain of worthy retribution. And although the pain of all the damned be infinite, yet they receive heavier torments who have found many things in iniquities from their own desires also. But because Zophar brought in the punishment of this hypocrite, he immediately joins the guilt, nor does he narrate any one guilt, but that from which all arise. For it is written: The root of all evils is cupidity (cupiditas) (I Tim. vi. 10). He, therefore, to whom cupidity is said to dominate, is without doubt shown to be subject to all evils. For he subjoins:

CHAPTER XIX.

VERS. 19, 20.---Because breaking he hath made bare the house of the poor, he hath snatched, and hath not built it, nor is his belly satiated.

23. He is punished with eternal punishment who has not bestowed his own; how much more he who has snatched the things of others? Avarice grows by the obtained things desired, it is not extinguished.---He breaks and makes bare the house of the poor, who does not blush to spoil also through avarice (avaritiam) him whom he crushes through power. He snatches it, and does not build it. As if it were openly said: He who ought to have built it, moreover snatches it. For the Lord, coming in judgment, is about to say to the reprobate: I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not, and the rest (Matth. xxv. 42). From which guilt it is subjoined: Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels (Ibid.). If therefore he is punished with so great a punishment, who is convicted not to have given his own, with what punishment is he to be smitten, who is proved to have taken away the things of others? He snatched, therefore, and did not build it, because he not only bestowed nothing of his own, but also took what was another's. But it is well subjoined: Nor is his belly satiated. For the belly of the wicked (iniqui) is avarice (avaritia), because in it is collected whatever is swallowed by perverse desire. For it is clear that avarice is not extinguished by the things desired, but is increased. For after the manner of fire, when it has received the wood which it may consume, it grows; and whence the flame seems for a moment to be compressed, thence a little after it is seen to be dilated. And often Almighty God, when He is vehemently angry with an avaricious mind, first permits all things to be at hand for it according to its wish, and afterwards He withdraws them through vengeance, so that it must tolerate eternal punishments for them. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XX.

VERS. 20.---And when he shall have what he desired, he shall not be able to possess it.

24. It is a sign of greater wrath, when that is granted which is evilly desired.---For it is a sign of greater wrath (iracundiae) when that is granted which is evilly desired, and thence sudden vengeance follows, because he has also obtained that which he desired while God was angry. Whence also it is said by the Psalmist, when the people are reported to have evilly desired the meat of the flesh: While their meat was yet in their mouth, and the wrath (ira) of God came upon them, and slew the most fat of them (Psal. lxxvii. 31). For divine judgments are wont to appear more slowly, when they are hindered, lest evil vows ought to be fulfilled. For by how much more quickly an evil vow is permitted to be fulfilled, for the most part by so much more swiftly is it punished. Whence therefore the hypocrite is speedily multiplied that he may be powerful, thence it is acted with celerity that he may not be, because also the shrubs which grow more slowly endure for years; and those which profit in a short time wither more swiftly, and as it were while they hasten to be, they tend to not being. It follows:

CHAPTER XXI

[Vet. XI].

VERS. 21.---There remained nothing of his meat.

25. His meat is all this that he desired with perverse longing. But when the hypocrite is struck, nothing remains of his meat, because when he is led to eternal punishments, he is alienated from all the goods which he had possessed here. Whence also it is still subjoined:

IBID.---Therefore nothing shall continue of his goods.

For if anything of his goods continued for him, he would take with him what he had had. But because, encompassing all things, he refused to fear the Judge, having been withdrawn from this life, he goes naked to the Judge. To whom, however, being wicked (iniquo), it is less for retribution that he is tormented in the subsequent punishment, if at least in this life he is permitted to be free. But there is no liberty in guilt, because it is written: Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty (II Cor. iii. 17). And for the most part, its own guilt becomes a punishment for the perverse mind. Whence also it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXII

VERS. 22.---When he shall be satiated, he shall be straitened (arctabitur).

26. The anguish of the rich from satiety.---For first he pants through avarice (avaritiam) to gather what he has desired; and when he has gathered many things as if in a certain belly of avarice, being satiated he is straitened, because while he is anxious how he may guard the things acquired, his very satiety narrows him. For the field of a certain rich man had brought forth abundant fruits, but because he had not where he might store so many, he said: What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said: This will I do, I will pull down my barns, and build greater (Luke xii. 17). He therefore who, being straitened from abundance, said: What shall I do? was seething as if pressed by much food. Let us consider with how many vows he desired that his field should bring forth abundant fruits. Behold, however, the vows are fulfilled, because the field had brought forth abundant fruits. But because the places do not suffice for storing them, the multiplied rich man knows not what he may do. O anguish born from satiety! The mind of the avaricious is straitened by the fertility of the field. For saying: What shall I do? surely he indicates that, pressed by the affections of his own vows, he was laboring under a certain bundle of things. Well therefore is it said: When he shall be satiated, he shall be straitened (arctabitur). Because the mind of the avaricious, which first had sought rest from abundance, afterwards labored more heavily for guarding. Whence here also it is still subjoined:

CHAPTER XXIII.

IBID.---He shall be troubled (aestuabit), and every sorrow shall rush in upon him.

27. Anxiety in acquiring and guarding riches is a prelude to eternal punishments. For he first had sorrow in the very fatigue of his concupiscence, how he might seize what he desired, how he might take away some things by flatteries (blandimentis), others by terrors; but after he has arrived at his desire through the acquired things, another sorrow fatigues him, so that with solicitous fear he may guard what he remembers to have been acquired with heavy labor. Hence on every side he fears waylayers, and greatly fears to suffer that which he himself did to others. He dreads another more powerful, lest he sustain him as violent; but when he beholds a poor man, he suspects a thief. He also cares greatly for those very things which have been heaped together, lest they be consumed through negligence from the defect of their own nature. In all these things, therefore, because fear itself is a punishment, the unhappy man suffers as much as he fears to suffer. After this also he is led to Gehenna, and is delivered over to eternal tortures. Every sorrow, therefore, rushes in upon him, whom here first the punishment of concupiscence, afterwards indeed the care of guarding, and there eventually the punishment of vengeance burns.

[Vet. XII.] 28. The wonderful security of the heart not exposed to avarice. But wonderful is the security of the heart not to seek the things of others, but to remain content with the food of each day. From which security, evidently, even perennial rest is born, because from a good and tranquil thought one passes to eternal joys. On the contrary, the reprobate are fatigued both here in desires, and there in torments; and for them from the labor of thought the labor of sorrow is born, while from the heat of avarice they are drawn to the fire of Gehenna. And because, as we have already said above, often every perverse man the more quickly he arrives at his desire, the more easily is he snatched to torment, it is subjoined by choosing:

CHAPTER XXIV.

VERS. 23.---Would that his belly might be filled, that He might send forth into him the wrath of His fury, and rain upon him His war!

29. God's darts rain upon the avaricious rich man. The Lord rains His war upon this hypocrite when He strikes his works with the swords of His judgments. For to rain war for God is to urge the life of the wicked to destruction by strict sentences from above. To rain war for God is to strike the hearts that are proud against Him, and to hit the dry mind, as if with certain thickening drops of rain, with the darts of His judgments, so that when he is already snatched to judgment, he may now remember that he has desired evilly, and studied to gather the desired things more evilly; now he may grieve that he leaves what he gathered, and at length he may even feel the fire of vengeance, which, lest he should live well, he contemned to foresee. It follows:

CHAPTER XXV

[Rec. XIV].

VERS. 24.---He shall flee from iron weapons, and shall rush into a bow of brass.

30. While avoiding temporal want, avarice is delivered over to perpetual, and at the same time to eternal punishments. It should be known that avarice sometimes creeps in through elation, sometimes indeed through fear. For there are some who, while they desire to appear more powerful, are inflamed to the ambition of others' things. And there are some who, while they fear that the necessaries of support may fail them, relax their mind to avarice, and ambitiously seek others' things, when they suspect that their own cannot suffice for them. Every necessity is not incongruously called iron, because it tortures the life of the needy with the wound of sorrow, as it is also written of his necessities who, being sold by his brothers, was leading an afflicted life: Iron passed through his soul (Psal. 104:18). What then are iron weapons, except the necessities of this present life, which press hardly, and pursue the life of the needy? For rust consumes iron, but it is usually more difficult to consume brass. By iron, therefore, the present necessity, which is transitory, is figured, but by brass the eternal sentence. And because the heavenly judgment is not attended to by the mind of the wicked, it is justly compared to a bow, since it strikes as if from an ambush, while he who is struck does not attend to it. He shall flee, therefore, from iron weapons, and shall rush into a bow of brass, because while, fearing present necessities, he seizes many things through avarice, he sets himself before the strict strokes of the last judgment. And when he flees iron weapons, he is found by the arrows of the bow of brass, because, foolishly guarding against temporal evils, he is struck by the eternal sentence. For he who here flees the hardness of want with guilt, there finds the perpetuity of just vengeance. [Vet. XIII.] But before he is snatched to judgment, it still intimates what this wicked man works here. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVI

[Rec. XV].

VERS. 25.---Drawn, and coming forth from its scabbard, and flashing (fulgurans) in its bitterness.

31. Drawn to sin by the devil, we come forth by our own will. This wicked man lies in wait for the depredations of his neighbors; but while he contrives evil in his thoughts, it is as if the sword is still in the scabbard; but when he iniquitously performs the evil which he thought, he comes forth from his scabbard, because from the concealment of his thought he is opened through the iniquity of evil operation. It is shown in work of what kind he lay hid in thought. And it is to be noted that it says: Drawn, and coming forth from its scabbard; drawn, namely, by the seducer, but coming forth by his own will. For he who is led undoubtedly follows him leading; but he who comes forth, is seen to proceed according to his own will. He, therefore, who is both drawn to any evil works by the ancient enemy, and yet is bound in their desires by his own free will, is said to be drawn and coming forth from his scabbard, since that which goes out from a perverse thought to a most wicked operation, is both of that spirit who suggested it, and of his wickedness who consented by his own will.

32. The more the wicked shine, the more sharply they shall be punished. The terror of whose power is still shown when it is immediately subjoined: And flashing in its bitterness. For lightning (fulgur) when it comes suddenly from above, shines with terror before the eyes, shows brightness, and strikes the things set before it. So, so indeed, the wicked man when he has assumed the glory of the present life, whence in this world he is shown bright through power, thence it is brought about that in the last he may be struck. For to flash, as it were, belongs to the wicked to shine in the honor of this life. But because the splendor of that glory is delivered over to the eternal punishments of Gehenna, it is now rightly said: Flashing in its bitterness. For he who now rejoices striking as if from terror and brightness, thereafter sustains punishments forever. And indeed of a certain rich man it is written (Luke 16:19) that he feasted sumptuously every day (splendide). But it is one thing to shine (splendere), and another to flash (fulgurare). For sometimes there is splendor without striking, but by the name of lightning splendor is expressed with striking. He, therefore, who being placed in power hurts others, is not incongruously called flashing, because whence he himself is extolled against the good as if from the light of glory, thence the life of the good is tortured. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVII

[Rec. XVI].

IBID.---Terrible ones shall go, and shall come upon him.

33. By as many succeeding vices as the sinner is pressed, by so many going and returning evil spirits is he devastated. Who in this place are called terrible ones, except the evil spirits, to be feared and fled from by good minds? And because those same evil spirits are to be believed each to serve certain vices, when this perverse man seems indeed to desert some vices for a moment, but begins to do others, upon him indeed terrible ones go and come, because although other evils desert the mind of the perverse, others occupy it. For you may often see a wicked man placed in earthly power, moved by grave fury, executing whatever wrath has suggested; and when the fury has departed, soon luxury devastates his mind; when luxury is intermitted for a time, elation immediately, as if from continence, is substituted in his thought, and that he may be feared by others, he desires to appear terrible. But when the matter requires that he should speak anything doubly, as if having postponed the terror of pride, he flatters with remiss speech; and when he has ceased to appear proud, he does not fear to become double. In whose mind, therefore, vices succeed to vices, rightly is it said of him: Terrible ones shall go, and shall come upon him, because by as many departing and succeeding vices as he is pressed, by so many evil spirits is his mind devastated as if by ones going and returning. But these things which he does outwardly come forth by parts; for to his mind all evils are bound together at the same time. Whence also it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VERS. 26.---All darkness is hidden in his secret places.

34. All vices are bound together in the mind of the hypocrite. For although the hypocrite shows good actions on the surface, some darkness of evil works, however, appears in him; but yet he produces less in work than lies hidden in his thought. For he who does not fulfill all things together in effect, holds all things that may hurt silently in his mind. All darkness, therefore, is said to be hidden in his secret places, because although he does not show all evils in himself, he yet desires to bring all upon his neighbors. [Vet. XIV, Rec. XVII.] But let him subjoin by what vengeance that mind so reprobate is to be struck. It follows:

CHAPTER XXIX.

IBID.---A fire that is not kindled shall devour him.

35. The fire of Gehenna is wonderfully cherished, and tortures both soul and body. In a very wonderful manner the fire of Gehenna is expressed in few words. For corporeal fire, that it may be able to be fire, stands in need of corporeal nourishments. Which, when it is necessary that it be preserved, is undoubtedly nourished through heaped up logs; nor can it exist unless kindled, and unless cherished it cannot subsist. But on the contrary, the fire of Gehenna, although it be corporeal, and corporeally burns the reprobates sent into it, is neither kindled by human study, nor nourished with logs, but once created lasts unquenchable, and does not need kindling, and is not without heat. Well, therefore, is it said of this wicked man: A fire that is not kindled shall devour him, because the justice of the Almighty, foreknowing the future, from the very origin of the world created the fire of Gehenna, which should once begin to be in the punishment of the reprobate, but would never end its heat even without logs. But it should be known that all the reprobate, because they have sinned from soul and flesh together, are there tortured in soul and flesh alike. Whence it is said by the Psalmist: Thou shalt make them as a fiery oven, in the time of thy countenance; the Lord in his wrath shall trouble them, and fire shall devour them (Psal. 20:10). For an oven burns inwardly, but he who is devoured by fire begins to be burned from the exterior part. That therefore the sacred eloquences might demonstrate that the reprobate burn both exteriorly and interiorly, they testify that they are both devoured by fire, and set as an oven, so that they may be tortured in body by fire, and burn in mind by sorrow. Whence here also, when it was said of this impious man: A fire that is not kindled shall devour him, it is immediately added concerning his spirit:

CHAPTER XXX

[Rec. XVIII].

IBID. He shall be afflicted being left in his tabernacle.

36. The evil who now are led forth from the body unwillingly, shall be held in the body against their will. For the tabernacle of the wicked is the flesh, because he inhabits it gladly, and if it be possible, he desires that he may never relinquish it. But the just, because they place their joy in the hope of heavenly things, and their conversation is in heaven (Philip. 3:20), although they are still in the flesh, they are as if already not in the flesh, because they are fed by no delight of the flesh. Whence also it is said to some: But you are not in the flesh, but in the spirit (Rom. 8:9). For they were not not in the flesh who through the master's epistles were receiving the eloquences of exhortation; but to be as if already not in the flesh is to have nothing of the love of carnal things. But on the contrary this wicked man, because he placed all his joy in carnal life, dwelt in the tabernacle of the flesh. Which flesh indeed when he shall have received in the resurrection, he shall burn with it delivered over to the fire of Gehenna. Then he desires to be led forth from it, then he seeks to escape its torments, if he be able; then he begins to wish to avoid what he loved. But because he preferred that same flesh to God, it is brought about by the judgment of God, that he may be more tortured from it in the fire. Here therefore he does not want to relinquish it, and yet he is drawn away from it; there he desires to relinquish it, and yet he is held in it on account of punishments. For the increase therefore of torment, both here he is led forth from the body unwillingly, and there he is held in the body against his will. Because therefore his spirit will wish to escape in torment the flesh which he preferred to himself by loving evilly, and is not able, it is now rightly said: He shall be afflicted being left in his tabernacle. Concerning whose accusation it is presently said:

CHAPTER XXXI

[Vet. XX, Rec XIX].

VERS. 27.---The heavens shall reveal his iniquity, and the earth shall rise up against him.

37. In judgment the wicked shall experience just and unjust accusers. What do we understand by the heavens except the just, and what by the earth except sinners? Whence also in the Lord's prayer we ask: Thy will be done as in heaven and in earth (Matth. 6:10), that namely the will of our Creator as it is perfected in all the just, so also it may be fulfilled in all sinners likewise. Concerning the just also it is written: The heavens declare the glory of God (Psal. 18:1). And upon the sinning man the sentence is brought, by which it is said: Earth thou art, and unto earth shalt thou go (Gen. 3:19). Of this impious man therefore, led to that terrible judgment, the heavens reveal the iniquity, and the earth rises up against him, so that he who here never spared either the good or the bad, in that tremendous examination both the life of the just and of sinners alike may accuse him. And indeed it is more grave if anyone should hurt the just rather than sinners. Whence also it is said by the prophet: Her blood is in the midst of her, she shed it upon the most clear rock; she shed it not upon the ground, that it might be covered with dust (Ezek. 24:7). Signifying namely by the ground and the dust sinners, but by the most clear rock the just man, who is not exasperated by the grave contagions of sinners. Blood therefore is shed upon the most clear rock, when the malice of a bloody mind ranges in the affliction of a just soul. Since therefore it is more grave to afflict the just than the unjust unjustly, yet it is much more grave to hurt both the just and the unjust alike. Because therefore here the wicked man hurt both the just and the unjust alike, in the accusation of condemnation the heavens shall reveal his iniquity, and the earth shall rise up against him, because he both opposed those who savored of heavenly things, and pressed those who savored of the lowest. By the earth indeed not sinners and reprobates, but those who, occupied in earthly acts, through the help of alms and tears arrive at eternal life can be designated, concerning whom it is said by the Psalmist, when the Lord was announced to come to judgment: He called the heavens from above, and the earth, that he might judge his people (Psal. 49:4). For He calls the heavens from above when those who, relinquishing all their own things, held the conversation of heavenly life are called to sit together in judgment, and come as judges with Him. The earth also is called from above when those who had been bound in earthly acts, yet in them sought more heavenly than earthly gains, to whom it is said: I was a stranger and you gathered me; naked, and you covered me (Matth. 25:43). The heavens therefore reveal the iniquity of this hypocrite, and against him the earth rises up, while both those who come as judges with God, and those who are liberated through judgment exist as witnesses of that depravity. Nothing therefore of those things which he did in time is hidden for his damnation, and although many of his acts are now concealed from men through duplicity, yet in the day of damnation whatever was lying hid within him is shown. Whence it is aptly subjoined:

CHAPTER XXXII

[Vet. XVI].

VERS. 28.---The offspring of his house shall be exposed, it shall be pulled down in the day of the fury of God.

38. In judgment the evils lying hidden within shall be revealed. Then the offspring of his house is exposed, when all the evil that was born in his conscience is shown. For now the offspring of the house of the hypocrite remains hidden, because although his operation appears good in image, yet the intention lies hid. For it is one thing which he does, another which he intends. But when, the Judge arriving, the conscience of each one shall have been led to testimony, whence it is written: Their thoughts accusing, or also defending them (Rom. 2:15), in this the offspring of the house of the hypocrite is exposed, because in his mind the perverse thought is detected. And in the day of the fury of God it is pulled down, because, the wrath of the Judge being shown, delivered over to the avenging flames, he is separated from His sight. For he who would not think on the highest while he lived, depressed by the weight of his own sins, shall fall from the face of the Judge into the lowest of punishments. But now the Judge both considers the sinning man and tolerates him, and expects each to conversion, because it is the day of patience, and not yet is the day of fury. But in this day of patience the hypocrite remains as if immovable, while he both perpetrates many evils, and no scourges chastise him. But in the day of fury he shall be pulled down, because, snatched in the time of vengeance to punishments, he is separated from the countenance of the eternal Judge. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXIII

[Rec. XX].

This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage of his words from the Lord.

39. In judgment even the least evils will be punished. ---For if he had wished to act well while placed in this life, he would have a portion with the Lord in the fellowship of the heavenly kingdom. But because he chose to be subject to depraved desires, he finds his portion from the Lord in torments, because he did not seek to participate in the grace of the same Lord. But it is well said: And the heritage of his words from the Lord. For he who for great evils is plunged into punishment, was perhaps believed that for the words which he had spoken wrongly he would be judged very little. But when the strict justice of Almighty God exacts punishment from the reprobate for their perverse acts, He renders to them evils even to the retribution (retributionem) of words, so that they who are debtors of great evils, being delivered to punishments, may pay even the last farthing. For those least things are spared to those who have strictly bewailed the greater evils in themselves. For those whom great things oppress, the smallest evils also in Gehenna (gehenna) likewise afflict. Holy men, however, do not desire to receive a portion from the Lord, but to have the Lord Himself as their portion. Whence the Prophet prays, saying: God is my portion (Psalm 73:26). But the iniquitous man, because he did not seek to have the Lord Himself as his portion, finds his portion outside the Lord in fire, so that, excluded from His face, because he did not desire to rejoice in Him, he may be tortured under Him. These things Sophar so brought in, that by those things which he had said against the hypocrite he might strike at the life of blessed Job, thinking that he who had been smitten by the Lord had not acted with a simple mind in all the good things he had done. For him whom he saw smitten, he believed to have displeased God. But the friends of blessed Job even in this matter hold the likeness of heretics, who in the holy Church, while they behold some who act well groaning under scourges, think that they do not have good merits in their good acts, and believe them evil whom they see afflicted by the divine stroke, being forsooth ignorant that many are the tribulations of the righteous (Psalm 34:19); and He scourgeth every son whom He receiveth (Heb. 12:6). But blessed Job, after the manner of the holy and universal Church, which patiently endures the darts of words from the perverse, and when she hears the sayings of the proud, does not leave the path of her humility, added with great humility of heart, saying:

CHAPTER XXXIV

[Vet. XXII, Rec. XXI].

JOB CHAPTER XXI, VERS. 2.---Hear, I pray you, my speeches, and do penance.

40. Holy men, while they teach rightly, do not fear to be derided. ---For he who, when he said Hear, added I pray you, shows with what great humility he speaks, while he entreats those who are proud against him, that he may bring back their sense to the doctrine of salvation. But holy men, while within the universal Church they are ready not only to teach what is right, but also to endure what is perverse, do not fear to be derided. Whence it is also added:

CHAPTER XXXV.

VERS. 3.---Suffer me, that I also may speak, and after my words, if it shall seem good, laugh on.

41. Holy men in their words seek to profit their hearers and themselves. To proud hearers the doctrine of humility is a heavy burden. --- For the good, when they speak, have two things which they attend to in their speeches, namely, that they may profit either themselves and their hearers, or themselves alone, if they cannot profit their hearers. For when those good things which they speak are heard well, they profit both themselves and their hearers at the same time. But when they are derided by their hearers, they have without doubt profited themselves, whom they have made free from the fault of silence. Blessed Job therefore, that he may profit himself and his hearers, says: Hear, I pray you, my speeches, and do penance. But that he himself may discharge what he owes, even if he cannot profit his hearers, he adds: Suffer me, that I also may speak, and after my words, if it shall seem good, laugh on. And it is to be noted that while he subjoined Do penance, he first said Hear; but when he added After my words, if it shall seem good, laugh on, he first said Suffer me. For to hear belongs to one willing, to suffer to one unwilling. His friends therefore, if they desire to be taught, let them hear; but if they are ready to deride, let them suffer the things which are said, because forsooth to proud minds the doctrine of humility is a heavy weight of burden. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVI

[Rec. XXII].

VERS. 4.---Is my dispute against man, that I should not be deservedly sorrowful?

42. Job made more humble by his scourges, feared only to have displeased God. ---Every one who, pleasing God, displeases men, has no causes for sorrow. But he who either pleasing men displeases God, or believes that he displeases both God and men at the same time, if sorrow does not affect him, he exists as a stranger to the virtue of wisdom. But blessed Job believed that he had displeased God among his scourges, and therefore he recalled his mind to sorrow, because he was not to be despised whom he feared he had displeased. If however he were disputing against man concerning the merits of his life, he ought by no means to have been sorrowful; but because through his present scourges he had become doubtful concerning his past life, he rightly sought for sorrow in his scourge. Whence he also adds:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

VERS. 5.---Look upon me, and be astonished.

43. From the smitings of Job we must learn what we ought to fear. ---That is, consider what I have done, and wonder at the smiting which I suffer. He who still rightly adds, saying:

IBID.---And lay your finger upon your mouth.

As if he were saying openly: Knowing the good things which I have done, and considering the evils which I suffer, restrain yourselves even from the fault of words, and fear your own losses in my smitings. Or certainly because we discern anything with our fingers, discretion is not incongruously designated by a finger. Whence it is also said by the Psalmist: Blessed be the Lord my God, who teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight (Psalm 144:1). Designating operation by the hands, but discretion by the fingers. [Vet. XVIII.] The finger therefore is laid upon the mouth when the tongue is restrained by discretion, lest through that which it speaks it should fall into the fault of folly. He says therefore: Lay your finger upon your mouth, that is, join the virtue of discretion to your speech, so that through these right things which you say against the hypocrite you may see to whom they are to be said. It follows:

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

VERS. 6.---And when I remember, I am afraid, and trembling taketh hold on my flesh.

44. Certain things are said ironically and by way of derision by holy men. ---Because blessed Job had not been forgetful of his own acts, his last speech shows. From which circumstance this which is now said by him to his friends: And when I remember, I am afraid, and trembling taketh hold on my flesh, it is forsooth certain that it is said by way of derision. As if it were openly said: If I shall remember that I have had anything of a hypocrite, I immediately tremble in the weeping of penance. But he says that his flesh, if he shall have remembered, is shaken with trembling, that is, that the infirmity of his work is fatigued with the dread of vengeance. But because Sophar asserted many things concerning the sudden damnation of the impious, in which he bit at the power of blessed Job, the holy man adds against his sayings, saying:

[Rec. XXIII].

VERS. 7.---Wherefore then do the wicked live, are they lifted up, and strengthened with riches?

45. The happiness of this life is weighed, in dignities and riches, in children and kinsfolk; in a peaceful house; in the fecundity of herds; in the multitude and exultation of the family. ---For unless the divine patience tolerated them, they would by no means lead a life for a long time in sins. For they are lifted up with riches when they begin to be powerful, but they are strengthened when they are permitted to subsist for a long time in this life. For those whom substance elevates, the length of days strengthens in the pride of their power. Or certainly they are reported as lifted up and strengthened, because they are lifted up by honors, strengthened by things. But there are many who both lifted up by honors, and strengthened by riches, receive those things which they desire in this life, but are deprived of the succession of offspring. To these forsooth their very power is a punishment, when they both consider that they have a great inheritance, and have no heirs to whom they may leave it. What therefore does it profit if all things be present, and children be wanting who may become successors? It follows:

CHAPTER XL.

VERS. 8.---Their seed is established in their sight with them.

46. Unto the increase of great happiness, heirs are also given with a great patrimony; and lest any even temporal necessity should subtract from their eyes those in whom their soul exults, it is said of this their seed: It is established in their sight. But what if children are given, but they themselves are struck with sterility? So is the race extinguished in them, just as it was feared it would be extinguished by the sterility of the parents. It follows:

IBID.---And their offspring before their eyes. [Propinquorum turba et nepotum in conspectu eorum.]

Behold life is present, honors and riches are present, children are present, grandchildren are present. What if any inward thought should burn the mind, and domestic strife should strike through the joys of security? What is the happiness of this world, if it be not joyful? It follows:

CHAPTER XLI.

VERS. 9.---Their houses are safe from fear, and the rod of God is not upon them.

47. They are secure and peaceful, because they live sinning, they do things to be bewailed, and they do not leave their joys. The rod (virga) of heavenly discipline does not smite them, and they profit in fault so much the more, as they are smitten less from fault. But because we have heard the things which prosper within, let us see also in the fields what prosperity smiles upon them. It follows:

VERS. 10.---Their bull gendereth, and faileth not; their cow calveth, and is not deprived of her calf.

The use of common speech is that it calls the male bull and the female cow, but the locution of literature (that is, of grammar) calls bull of the common gender. Whence it is now said: Their bull gendereth, and faileth not; their cow calveth, and is not deprived of her calf. The first happiness to the masters of flocks is, if the flock, having no sterility, conceives; the second, if the conception comes to the birth; but the third, if that which is brought forth be led to growth through nourishments. That therefore he might show that all were present at once to the impious, blessed Job asserts that their flocks have conceived, and not miscarried; have brought forth, and have not been deprived of their own offspring. But the happiness is less, if when the flocks increase, the keepers of the flocks also do not profit. Whence also to the fecundity of the flocks the fecundity of the family is soon substituted. For it is said:

CHAPTER XLII.

VERS. 11.---They send forth their little ones like a flock, and their children dance.

48. That as greater things are granted to be possessed, so many may bud forth to keep them. But because he said They dance, lest we should believe that the very play of the infants in the house of the iniquitous was very vile, adding, he says:

VERS. 12.---They take the timbrel and harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ.

As if he were saying plainly: When the masters swell with honors and things, the subjects rejoice in playful acts. But, O blessed man, why do you tell us so many things about the pleasures of the iniquitous? You have been speaking for a long time in their description; after many things distinguish briefly what you feel. It follows:

CHAPTER XLIII

[Old XIX, New XXIV].

VERS. 13.---They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment they go down to hell.

49. Whatever has an end is momentary. Prosperity is not a proof of innocence, nor adversity of iniquity.--- Behold, O blessed man, you had long recounted their joys; how do you now assert that they go down to hell in a moment, unless because all length of time of this present life is known to be a point, when it is terminated by an end? For when each person is brought to the end, he now holds nothing of the past, because all times have slipped away; in the future he has nothing, because the moments of a single hour do not remain. The life, therefore, which could be so narrowed, was a point. For as we said before, we place and lift the pen in a point. He, therefore, touched life as if in a point, who received and lost it. In this "moment" (punctus) it can also be understood that often those who have been long tolerated in iniquity are snatched away by sudden death, so that they are not even allowed to weep before death for the things they have sinned. But because sometimes even the life of the just is terminated by a sudden end, we better understand this if we feel it concerning their temporal life, because whatever could pass away was sudden. But to the friends of blessed Job, who therefore believed him to be unjust because they saw him scourged, it was rightly shown by the voice of the same holy man concerning the flowering and perdition of the iniquitous that the prosperity of the present life is not a witness of innocence, because many return to perennial life through scourges, and most, who are to be led to infinite punishments, die without a scourge. Concerning whom it is still added:

CHAPTER XLIV

[New XXV].

VERS. 14.---Who said to God: Depart from us.

50. Those who do not obey God's commands, drive Him away from themselves.--- Even fools do not presume to say this in words; but nevertheless all the perverse say "Depart" to God, not in words, but in their conduct. For those who do those things which Almighty God forbids, what else do they do but close their mind against the Almighty? For as to think of His precepts is to introduce Him to oneself, so to resist His commands is to repel Him from the habitation of the heart. Therefore, they say: "Depart from us," who refuse to grant Him access to themselves, and who assail Him with wicked acts, even if they seem to praise Him in words. They say also:

CHAPTER XLV.

IBID.---We desire not the knowledge of Your ways.

51. It is one thing not to know the ways of God, another to be unwilling to know them.--- By the very fact that they despise to apprehend His knowledge. For there are some who, from that which the Truth says: "That servant who knew not the will of his lord, and did things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes; but the servant who knew the will of his lord, and did not according to it, shall be beaten with many stripes" (Luke 12:47, 48); they are unwilling to know what they should do, and think as if they would be beaten less, if they do not know what they ought to have performed. But it is one thing to have been ignorant, another to have been unwilling to know. For he is ignorant who wishes to apprehend, and is not able. But he who, in order not to know, turns away his ear from the voice of truth, is adjudged not as ignorant, but as a despiser. [Old XX.] But the way of God is peace, the way of God is humility, the way of God is patience. But because the iniquitous despise all these things, they say: "We desire not the knowledge of Your ways." For while they are proud in the present life, while they are puffed up with honors, while they even desire them if they have them not, they despise the ways of God in their thought. For because the way of God in this life was humility, God Himself and our Lord and Redeemer came to reproaches, to contumelies, to the passion, and bore the adversities of this world with equanimity, and bravely avoided prosperities, so that He might teach that the prosperities of eternal life are to be desired, and the adversi-ties of the present life are not to be feared. But because the iniquitous desire the glory of the present life, and flee ignominy, they are recorded to say: "We desire not the knowledge of Your ways." For they are unwilling to know what they despise to do. Their words are still added, when it is said:

CHAPTER XLVI

[New XXVI].

VERS. 15.---Who is the Almighty, that we should serve Him?

52. Carnal men either suspect that God does not exist, or they despise serving Him.--- For the mind of man, evilly poured out exteriorly, is so scattered in corporeal things, that it neither returns to itself within, nor is sufficient to think of Him who is invisible. Whence carnal men, despising spiritual commands, because they do not see God corporally, sometimes arrive at this, that they even suspect Him not to be. Whence it is written: "The fool has said in his heart: There is no God" (Psalm 13:1). Whence now also it is said: "Who is the Almighty, that we should serve Him?" For for the most part men desire more to serve men, whom they see corporally, than to serve God, whom they do not see. For through everything they do, they tend to the end of their eyes; and because they cannot tend the eyes of the body to God, they either despise to offer Him obedience, or if they have begun, they are fatigued. For they do not believe Him to exist, as has been said, whom they do not behold corporally.

Who, if they humbly sought God the author of all, would find in themselves that that which is not seen is better than that thing which is seen. For they themselves subsist of an invisible soul and a visible body; but if this which is not seen is withdrawn from them, immediately that which is seen falls to ruin. And indeed the eyes of the flesh are open; but they cannot see or feel anything. For the sense of vision has perished, because the inhabitant has departed; and the house of the flesh remains empty, because that invisible spirit has withdrawn, which was wont to look through its windows. Since therefore invisible things are more excellent than visible things, all carnal men ought to have weighed it from themselves, and to tend toward God through this, so to speak, scale of consideration: because He exists by the fact that He remains invisible, and remains most high by the fact that He can by no means be comprehended. But there are some who do not doubt that God both exists and is incomprehensible; who nevertheless seek from Him not Himself, but exterior gifts. Which when they see to be lacking to those serving Him, they themselves despise serving Him. Concerning whose words it is further added:

CHAPTER XLVII

[New XXVII].

IBID.---And what does it profit us, if we pray to Him?

53. The order of things to be asked in prayer.---When God is not sought in prayer, the mind is more quickly fatigued in prayer: because when each one asks for those things which perhaps, according to a secret judgment, God refuses to grant, he also comes into a state of weariness, who does not wish to give what is loved. But the Lord wishes Himself to be loved more than those things which He created, and eternal things to be asked rather than earthly ones, as it is written: "Seek first the kingdom of God and His justice, and all these things shall be added to you" (Matt. 6:33). For He who did not say "they shall be given," but "they shall be added," surely indicates that it is one thing which is principally given, another which is superadded. For because eternity ought to be in our intention, but temporality in our use, both that is given, and this indeed is superadded from abundance. And yet often men, when they ask for temporal goods, but do not seek eternal rewards, ask for that which is added, and do not desire that where it should be added. Nor do they account it as the gain of their petition, if they be temporally poor here, and live there eternally rich in blessedness; but intent only, as has been said, on visible things, they refuse by the labor of petition to purchase invisible things. Who, if they sought heavenly things, would now exhibit labor with fruit: because when the mind in prayers pants after the appearance of its author, inflamed with divine desires, it is joined to heavenly things, and separated from lower ones; by the love of its fervor it opens itself that it may receive, and receiving it is inflamed; and to love higher things is already to go upward; and while with great desire it gapes after celestial things, in a wonderful way it tastes this very thing which it seeks to receive. It follows:

CHAPTER XLVIII

[Old XXI, New XXVIII].

VERS. 16.---Nevertheless, because their goods are not in their hand, let their counsel be far from me.

54. The just possess their goods, they are not possessed by them; otherwise the iniquitous.--- He has goods in his hand, who, by despising temporal things, keeps them under the dominion of his mind. For whoever loves them excessively, subjects himself to them more than to himself. For many of the just were rich in this world; supported by things and honors, they seemed to have many things, whose mind, because the excessive delight of those things which were present did not possess it, their goods were in their hand: because they were held subject to the power of the soul. But on the contrary, the iniquitous so pour themselves out with all their desires in the appetites of exterior things, that they themselves do not rather hold the things they have, but are held with a captive mind by the things they have. Because therefore their goods are not in their hand, it is rightly added: "Let their counsel be far from me." For what is the counsel of the iniquitous but to seek earthly glory, to neglect eternal glory, to desire temporal salvation with interior loss, and to exchange transitory pains for eternal groans? The holy man therefore, beholding these thoughts of the iniquitous, should spurn them, and say: "Let their counsel be far from me." Because he certainly sees that to be incomparably good, he chooses to groan here for a short time under the scourge rather than to endure the punishments of eternal vengeance. But neither in this life do those who desire to prosper in it, prosper continually. For for the most part, groans that have arisen interrupt their joys. Whence it is added:

CHAPTER XLIX

[New XXIX].

VERS. 17.---How often shall their lamp be put out, and a flood come upon them, and He distribute the sorrows of His fury?

55. How many and what kind of punishments affect the wicked.--- Often the impious man considers his lamp to be the life of his sons; but when a son who is loved excessively is withdrawn, the lamp of the impious man, which was seen, is extinguished. Often the impious man thinks the glory of present honor to be his lamp; but when, his dignity being taken away, he is cast down, the lamp is extinguished which was shining for him according to his desire. Often the impious man thinks that the riches of earthly substance are present to him as a great lamp of light; but when, a loss rushing in, he has lost the riches which he loved more than himself, what else has he lost but the lamp in whose light he rejoiced? He therefore who does not desire to rejoice in eternal things, cannot even here, where he wishes to be established, rejoice continually. For how often is the lamp of the impious extinguished, and an inundation comes upon them, and He distributes the sorrows of His fury? A flood comes upon the impious when they suffer waves of sorrows from some adversity. For Almighty God, when He sees Himself despised and man rejoicing in earthly concupiscence, strikes also with sorrows that which He sees preferred to Himself in the thought of the impious man. But it is well said: "And He shall distribute the sorrows of His fury." For He who keeps eternal sorrows for the impious man through retribution, also sometimes pierces his mind with temporal sorrow; because He strikes both here and there, He distributes the sorrows of His fury upon the impious man. For neither does a present punishment, which does not change the soul of the unjust from wicked desires, deliver from eternal punishments. Whence also it is said by the Psalmist: "He shall rain snares upon sinners; fire, brimstone, and the spirit of storms, are the portion of their cup" (Psalm 11:6). For by saying snares, fire, brimstone, and the spirit of storms, He brought in many sorrows indeed. But because from those sorrows the sinner who is not corrected is called to eternal punishments, he called those same sorrows not yet the whole cup, but the portion of the cup: because surely their suffering is indeed begun here through sorrows, but is consummated in perpetual vengeance. Concerning whose end it is further added:

CHAPTER L

[Old XXII, New XXX].

VERS. 18.---They shall be as chaff before the face of the wind, and as ashes which the whirlwind scatters.

56. Like chaff they are carried away to the fire by the breath of divine wrath.--- When the iniquitous man is seen in power, when he is greatly unrestrained in oppressions and violence, he is estimated by the thoughts of the weak as excessively heavy, and as if rooted in this world. But when the sentence of the strict Judge shall come, all the iniquitous shall be like chaff before the wind: because, so to speak, they are suddenly lifted by the breath of wrath and carried away to the fire, they whom here in their former prejudices, as a superincumbent mass of hard weight, the tears of the needy could not move. And they are light to the hands of the snatching judgment, who through injustice were heavy to their neighbors. "And as ashes which the whirlwind scatters." Before the eyes of Almighty God, the life of the iniquitous is as ashes: because, although it appears green for a moment, yet by His judgment it is already seen consumed; because it is deputed to eternal consumption. The whirlwind scatters these ashes: because "God shall come manifestly; our God, and He shall not keep silence. A fire shall burn in His sight, and a mighty tempest round about Him" (Psalm 50:3). By the whirlwind of this tempest the iniquitous are snatched away from the sight of the eternal Judge; and they who here had solidified their mind with perverse desire, shall there be seen as chaff and ashes: because the snatching whirlwind carries them away to eternal punishments. It follows:

CHAPTER LI

[New XXXI].

VERS. 19.---God shall lay up the sorrow of the father for his children: and when He shall repay it, then he shall know.

57. How God punishes the sins of parents in their children.--- We know it is written: "Who render the sins of the fathers upon the children and grandchildren, unto the third and fourth generation" (Exod. 34:7). And again it is written: "What is it (De Poenit., dist. 4, c. 13) that you turn among yourselves this parable into a proverb in the land of Israel, saying: The fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the teeth of the children are set on edge? As I live, says the Lord God, you shall not have any more this parable for a proverb in Israel. Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine. The soul that shall sin, the same shall die" (Ezek. 18:2; Jer. 31:29). In both these sentences, therefore, while a dissimilar sense is found, the mind of the hearer is instructed to seek subtly the way of discretion. For we draw original sin from our parents; and unless we be loosed by the grace of baptism, we also bear the sins of our parents: because we are indeed still one with them. He renders, therefore, the sins of the parents upon the children, while for the fault of the parent, the soul of the offspring is polluted from original sin. And again He does not render the sins of the parents upon the children: because when we are delivered from original fault through baptism, we no longer have the faults of our parents, but those which we ourselves commit. Which nevertheless can be understood in another way also: because whoever imitates the iniquity of a wicked parent, is also bound by his offense. But whoever does not imitate the iniquity of a parent, is by no means weighed down by his offense. Whence it happens, that an iniquitous son of an iniquitous father pays not only his own sins which he added, but also the sins of his father; when with the vices of his father, by which he is not ignorant that the Lord was angered, he also does not fear to add yet his own malice. And it is just, that he who under a strict Judge does not fear to imitate the ways of an iniquitous parent, should be compelled in the present life to pay even the faults of the iniquitous parent. Whence also it was said there: "The soul of the father is mine, and the soul of the son is mine. The soul that shall sin, the same shall die": because in the flesh sometimes children are even destroyed because of the sin of the father. But original sin being deleted, they are not held in the soul from the wickedness of the parents. For what is it that little children are for the most part seized by demons, unless that the flesh of the son is punished from the penalty of the father? For in himself the iniquitous father is struck, and he despises to feel the force of the percussion. For the most part he is struck in his children, that he may be more sharply burned; and the sorrow of the father is rendered to the flesh of the children, so that through the punishments of the children the iniquitous mind of the father may be punished. But when not little ones, but now more grown children are struck because of the fault of parents, what else is clearly given to be understood, but that they also pay the penalties of those whose deeds they followed? Whence also it is rightly said: "Unto the third and fourth generation." For because unto the third and fourth generation, the children can see the life of their parents which they imitate, the vengeance is extended unto them, who saw what they should evilly follow.

[Old XXIII.] 58. Guilt closes the eyes of the impious, punishment opens them.--- And because guilt closes the eyes of the impious, but punishment opens them at the last, it is rightly added: "And when He shall repay it, then he shall know." For the impious man does not know the evils which he has done, except when he has already begun to be punished for those same evils. Whence also it is said by the prophet: "And only vexation shall give understanding to the hearing" (Isa. 28:19). For then he understands what he heard, when he has already grieved that he is vexed for his contempt. Hence it is said by Balaam concerning himself: "The man whose eye is stopped up has said: the hearer of the words of God has said, who has beheld the vision of the Almighty, who falls: and so his eyes shall be opened" (Num. 24:3, 4). For he offered counsel against the Israelites, but afterwards in punishment he saw what he had previously committed from guilt. But the elect, because they foresee that they ought not to sin: their eyes indeed are open before the fall. But the iniquitous man opens his eyes after the fall: since after the guilt he already beholds in his punishment, that he ought to have avoided the evil which he did. Concerning whose useless knowledge even then it is subjoined:

CHAPTER LII.

VERS. 20.---His eyes shall see his own destruction, and he shall drink of the fury of the Almighty.

59. Eyes are opened uselessly after the fall.--- Who, if placed in this life, had wished to see his own guilt, would not afterwards drink of the fury of the Almighty. But he who here turns away his eyes from the regard of his crime, shall not be able there to decline the sentence of damnation. But often those who do not fear eternal punishments, dread to do wicked things at least for the sake of temporal percussion. But there are some who have so hardened in iniquity, that they do not even fear to be struck in those things which they love, provided that they may fulfill what they have perversely thought. Whence in this place concerning the obduration of the iniquitous it is subjoined:

CHAPTER LIII.

VERS. 21.---For what concerneth it him concerning his house after him? or if the number of his months be cut off in the midst?

60. The stupendous obduration and blindness of some wicked men, even while they are being struck.--- For we ought not to understand it in such a way that this wicked man, after he has been condemned to eternal punishments, thought not at all of his house, that is, of the kinsfolk whom he left behind, since Truth itself says that the rich man who had been buried in hell, even when placed in punishment, took care for the five brothers whom he had left (Luke 16:28). For every sinner will be prudent in punishment who was foolish in guilt (Dist. 38, c. 10), because there, already constrained by pain, he opens his eyes to reason, which here, given over to pleasure, he closed; and by the torturing punishment it is required that he be wise, who here, blinding himself with pride, was acting foolishly. To whom, however, his wisdom will then be of no profit, because here, where he ought to have worked according to wisdom, he lost the time. For here he desires as the highest good to have offspring of his race, to fill his house with family and wealth, and to live long in this corruption of the flesh. But if perhaps something should come according to his desire, which however he cannot obtain except with offense to the Creator, his mind, perturbed for a little while, thinks that if he does this here, whence he incurs the offense of his Creator, he is struck in his house, in his children, in his life. But being straightway instigated by his pride, he hardens; and whatever stroke he may feel in his house, whatever in his life, he cares not at all, provided that he may fulfill what he has thought; and as long as he lives, he does not cease to perfect his pleasures. For behold, his house is struck for his guilt; but what concerneth it him concerning his house after him? Behold, for the vengeance of his wicked work, that length of life which might have been is shortened; but what concerneth it him, if the number of his days be cut off in the midst? And in this therefore the sinner erects himself against God, where Almighty God breaks his erection; and neither does the inflicted stroke humiliate the mind, which obstinacy hardens in deliberation against the Lord. And it is to be noted how heavy is the guilt of the fault, both to propose to the mind the punishment for the fault, and yet, not even through fear of torment, to incline the neck of the heart under the yoke of the Creator. [Vet. XXIV, Rec. XXXII.] But behold, when we hear these things, a question arises in our heart, why Almighty and merciful God has permitted the reason of the human mind to fall into such great blindness? Lest however anyone should presume to discuss the hidden judgments of God beyond what he ought, it is rightly subjoined:

CHAPTER LIV.

VERS. 22.---Shall any one teach God knowledge, who judgeth the high ones?

61. The hidden judgments of God are not to be searched out too curiously.--- When we are in doubt in those things which are done concerning us, we ought to look at other things which are certain to us, and appease that complaint of thought which had arisen from our uncertainty concerning ourselves. For behold, because scourges recall the elect to life, and scourges do not restrain the reprobate from evil acts, the judgments of Almighty God over us are very hidden, and they are not unjust. But if we stretch the eye of the mind to higher things, in them we behold that we have nothing of which to complain justly concerning ourselves. For Almighty God, discerning the merits of the angels, appointed some to remain in eternal light without a fall, others, having fallen spontaneously from the state of their loftiness, He prostrated in the vengeance of eternal damnation. Therefore He does nothing unjustly with us, Who also judged justly a nature more subtle than ours. Let him say therefore: Shall any one teach God knowledge, who judgeth the high ones? For He who does wonders over us, it is certain beyond doubt that He disposes all things concerning us with knowledge. These things being thus premised, that is subjoined where the human mind is fatigued in inquiry. For it is added:

CHAPTER LV.

VERS. 23-25.---One dieth strong and whole, rich and happy, his bowels are full of fat, and his bones are watered with marrow; but another dieth in bitterness of soul without any riches.

62. The life of the elect and the reprobate is unlike, but the death of the flesh is the same. The joy of the wicked passeth to punishment, the punishment of the innocent to joy.--- Since these things are so, who shall discuss the secrets of Almighty God, why He permits these things to be so? For the life of the elect and the reprobate is indeed unlike, but the corruption of the flesh in death is not unlike. Whence it is subjoined:

VERS. 26.---And yet they shall sleep in the dust together, and worms shall cover them.

What wonder then if they run dissimilarly for a moment in the prosperity or adversity of the present world, who return to the earth similarly through the corruption of the flesh? [Vet. XXV.] That life only, therefore, is to be thought of, in which with the resurrection of the flesh a dissimilar end of retribution is reached. For what health or strength is there to the wicked, what fatness and riches, while the whole is left here with speed, and there retribution is found which can never be left? But as the joy of this wicked man passeth to punishment, so the punishment of the afflicted innocent passeth to joy. Neither riches, therefore, ought to lift up the mind, nor want to perturb it. Whence blessed Job, amidst the losses of things, admits no losses of thoughts to his mind, but to those who despise him in his smiting, he subjoins in refutation, saying:

CHAPTER LVI

[Rec. XXXIII].

VERS. 27, 28.---Surely I know your thoughts, and the unjust sentences against me. For ye say: Where is the house of the prince, and where are the tabernacles of the wicked?

63. Job was unbroken, because though other things were lost he had not lost God.--- For they had believed him wicked whom they saw temporally destroyed, his goods being taken away. But the holy man judges them with as much high consideration as he stood with unbroken rectitude amidst the losses which he had endured. For what had the losses of things without harmed him, who had not lost Him whom he loved within?

Allegorical sense.---64. From abundance pride is born.--- But as to this which is said: Together they shall sleep in the dust, and worms shall cover them, if anyone should perchance wish to take it by allegory, we can briefly explain it, if we repeat concerning this wicked rich man what has already been said. For it is said: His bowels are full of fat. For as fatness is born of abundant food, so from abundance of things is born pride, which fattens the mind of the rich man while the soul of the proud is lifted up. For the pride of the heart is as it were a certain fatness of grossness. Whence because many commit sins from abundance, it is said by the Prophet: Their iniquity hath come forth as from fatness (Ps. 72:7). It follows: And his bones are watered with marrow. The lovers of this world have as it were bones, when they possess the strength of dignities in this world.

But if in outward dignity earthly and domestic riches be wanting, as far as their own judgment goes they have bones indeed, but they have not marrow in the bones. Because, then, this lover of this world is so supported by outward power, as to be fattened also with the inward abundance of an earthly house, it is said: And his bones are watered with marrow. Or surely the bones of this rich man are his depraved and hard customs, but the marrow in the bones are the very desires of living ill, which are not even satisfied by the fulfillment of wickedness. Which marrows water the bones as it were, when depraved desires preserve their perverse customs in the delight of pleasures.

[Vet. XXVI, Rec. XXXIV.] 65. Whence the rich man rejoices vainly, thence the other poor man is afflicted more vainly. The goods which the rich man hath with fear, the poor man desires with anxiety.--- And there are some who have not riches in this world, but desire to have them, they long to be exalted; although in this world they cannot obtain what they desire; and though they be supported by no things or honors, yet through evil desires their conscience adjudges them guilty in the sight of the internal Judge. For such a one is often afflicted for this reason, because he is not able to grow rich and be proud. Of whom it is also added: But another dieth in the bitterness of his soul without any riches. Behold, whence the rich man with a proud heart rejoices vainly, thence another poor man with a proud heart is more vainly afflicted. Well then is subjoined concerning both: And yet they shall sleep in the dust together, and worms shall cover them. For to sleep in the dust is to close the eyes of the mind in earthly desires. Whence to every one sinning and sleeping in his own fault it is said: Arise thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall enlighten thee (Eph. 5:14). But the worms which are born of the flesh cover them both together, because carnal cares oppress the mind either of the rich man or of the proud poor man. For in earthly things the reprobate poor and rich man, although they be not supported by equal prosperity, yet are troubled with equal anxiety, because what that one already has with fear, this one desires with anxiety; and because he is not able to have it, he grieves. Let it be said then: Together they shall sleep in the dust, and worms shall cover them, because although they are not together relieved by temporal things, yet they are together lulled by a torpor of mind in the care of temporal things. And at the same time worms cover them, because carnal thoughts oppress either this one that he may have what he desires, or that one lest he lose what he has.

66. Job was neither elated by things possessed, nor anxious for things lost.--- But blessed Job, who had neither been elated by things possessed, nor sought after those that were lost with anxiety, because he was bitten by no thoughts of outward loss, the worms of the heart had not covered him. And because he had not cast down his mind in earthly care, he by no means slept in the dust.

It follows: Surely I know your thoughts, and the unjust sentences against me. Since it is written: What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him (1 Cor. 2:11)? for what reason is it now said: Surely I know your thoughts. But the spirit of a man is then unknown by another when it is not demonstrated by words or works. For as it is written: By their fruits ye shall know them (Matt. 7:20), by that which is done without, whatever lies hid within is opened. Whence also it is rightly said by Solomon: As in waters the faces of those who look in shine forth, so the hearts of men are manifest to the prudent (Prov. 27:19). Therefore blessed Job, when he said that he knew the thoughts of his friends communing with him, added: And the unjust sentences against me, that he might show by a manifest thing that he had found that which lay hid in them. Whence also he subjoins their very unjust sentences, saying: For ye say: Where is the house of the prince, and where are the tabernacles of the wicked?

[Rec. XXXV.] 67. The false opinion of those who measure faults by scourges.--- All the weak, who desire to flourish in this world, and dread scourges as great evils, measure faults in those whom they behold scourged by the punishment. For those whom they see smitten, they suspect to have displeased God. Whence the friends of blessed Job, whom they saw smitten, believed that he had been wicked, namely, estimating that if he had not been wicked, his tabernacles would remain. But this no one thinks except him who yet labors with the weariness of infirmity, who fixes the step of his thought in the delight of the present world, who knows not how to pass to the eternal country with perfect desires. Whence it is well subjoined:

CHAPTER LVII

VERS. 29, 30.---Ask any of the wayfaring men, and ye shall know that he understandeth these same things. Because the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction, and he is led to the day of fury.

68. Those are to be consulted who think that life is a way for them, not a country.--- For often divine patience tolerates for a long time those whom it already condemns to foreknown punishments, it permits those to flourish whom it yet sees perpetrating worse things. For because He sees to what pit of damnation they are tending, He accounts it as nothing that here the perverse multiply things that must be left behind. But whosoever loves the glory of the present life, accounts it a great happiness to flourish here according to his wish, although he be compelled afterwards to endure eternal punishments. He alone therefore beholds that it is nothing that the wicked flourishes, who has already removed the step of his heart from the love of the present world. Whence rightly, when it was spoken concerning the subsequent damnation of the impious, it is premised: Ask any of the wayfaring men, and ye shall know that he understandeth these same things. For he is called a wayfaring man who attends to this, that the present life is a way to him and not a country, who despises to fix his heart in the love of the passing world, who desires not to remain in things transitory, but to arrive at things eternal. For he who does not desire to be a wayfaring man in this life, by no means despises the prosperous things of this life, and he wonders at those things which he himself desires, when he sees them abound in others. Whence the prophet David, since he had already passed in heart from the love of the present world, describing the glory of the wicked, said: I saw the wicked exalted on high and lifted up like the cedars of Lebanon (Ps. 36:35). But because he did not subject his heart to this world, he justly despised him, saying: I passed by, and lo, he was not (Ibid., 36). The wicked man would indeed have been something in his estimation, if he himself had not at least passed from this world by intention. But he to whom, while not passing, it would have been something great, to his passing mind it appeared how nothing it was, because while eternal retribution is thought of, present glory is known how null it is. Hence Moses, when he sought the glory of heavenly contemplation, said, I will pass and see the vision (Exod. 3:3). For unless he had removed the step of his heart from the love of the world, he could by no means have understood heavenly things.

Hence Jeremiah, requesting the mourning of his heart to be considered, says: O all ye that pass by the way, attend and see, if there be sorrow like unto my sorrow (Lam. 1:12). For those who do not pass through the present life as through a way, but attend to it as a country, know not how to consider the mourning of the heart of the elect. Those therefore the prophet seeks out that they may consider his sorrow, whom it has happened not to have fixed their mind in this world. Hence it is said by Solomon: Open thy mouth for the dumb, and for the causes of all the children that pass by (Prov. 31:8). For they are called dumb who by no means resist by contradicting the words of the preachers. Who also are those that pass by, because they disdain to fix the intention of the mind in the love of the present life. Therefore because the wicked is reserved for the day of destruction, and is led to the day of fury, no one understands this except he who is a wayfaring man, since he who has fixed his heart in present things, perceives not the punishments which follow the wicked. Concerning which it is yet added:

CHAPTER LVIII

[Rec. XXXVI.]

VERS. 31.---Who shall reprove his way before his face? and who shall repay him for the things that he hath done?

69. Christ alone shall subdue Antichrist, who is elated with so many signs, and such a show of holiness.--- Often the wicked man experiences the indignation of his Creator, which he is to suffer eternally, even while placed in this life, while he loses the prosperity which he loves, and finds the adversity which he fears. And although he may be rebuked for his depravities by the tongue of the righteous even in prosperity, yet we know that when his own deeds cast down any perverse person, the rebuke of the righteous gains strength. But for what reason is it now said: Who shall reprove his way before his face? since even if the righteous be silent, this also is known, that the way of the wicked is here as often reproved as his prosperity is troubled by intervening adversity [Vet. XXVIII]. But blessed Job, while he was speaking concerning the body of all the wicked, suddenly turned his words to the head of all the wicked. For he saw that at the end of the world Satan, entering into a man whom Sacred Scripture calls Antichrist, is lifted up with such great elation, rules with such great power, is raised up with such great signs and prodigies in the show of holiness, that his deeds cannot be reproved by man, because he adds even signs of shown holiness to the power of terror; and he says: Who shall reprove his way before his face? Who, that is, should dare to rebuke that man, whose very look he fears to bear? But yet not only Elijah and Enoch, who are brought forward to his reproach, but also all the elect reprove his way, while they despise him, while they resist his malice with the power of the mind. But because they do this from divine grace, and not from their own strength, it is rightly now said: Who shall reprove his way before his face? For who, but God, by whose aid the elect are supported that they may be able to resist? For sometimes in Sacred Scripture when Who is placed interrogatively, the Almighty is designated. Whence it is written: Who shall raise him up (Gen. 49:9)? Concerning which it is said by Paul: Whom God hath raised from the dead (Gal. 1:1). In this then that holy men contradict his iniquity, it is not they themselves who reprove his way, but it is He by whose grace they are strengthened. And because his presence, with which he is to come in man, will be much more atrocious in persecution than now, when he is least perceived, because he is not yet specially carried in that proper vessel of his, it is well said: Before his face. For many now correct the ways of Antichrist by judging them, but they do this as it were in his absence, while they reprove him whom as yet they do not specially behold. But when he shall come in that damned man, whosoever resists his presence reproves his way before his face, whose strength he both beholds and despises. Or surely, to reprove his way is to trouble the prosperity of his course by the intervention of eternal punishment. Because only the Lord is to do this by His own power, concerning whom it is written: Whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming (2 Thess. 2:8), it is rightly said: Who shall reprove his way before his face? Whence also it follows: And who shall repay him for the things that he hath done? Who indeed, but the Lord? Who alone will repay that lost man for what he has done, when by His coming He shall have broken his so strong power with eternal damnation. But this elated prince of the wicked, as long as he is placed in this life, let us hear what he does. It follows:

CHAPTER LIX

[Vet. XXIX, Rec. XXXVII].

VERS. 32.---He shall be brought to the graves, and shall watch in the heap of the dead.

70. Satan watches in the multitude of sinners as in a heap of dead men, and in the graves.--- Because graves cover the dead, what else is designated by graves but the reprobate, in whom souls extinguished from the life of blessedness lie hid as it were in graves? Therefore this wicked man shall be brought to the graves, because he shall be received in the hearts of the wicked, since those alone receive him in whom souls dead to God are found. Concerning whom also it is rightly said by the prophet, while his punishments are being described: Round about him are his graves, all of them slain, and they that fell by the sword (Ezek. 32:22). For those are in hell next to him, in whom the same malignant spirit lies dead. Who fell smitten by the sword of his iniquity. Whence it is written: Who hast delivered David Thy servant from the malignant sword (Ps. 144:10). And it is rightly said: And he shall watch in the heap of the dead, because now in the congregation of sinners he puts forth the snares of his craftiness. For because of the rarity of the good in the world, and the multitude of the wicked, it is rightly named a heap of the dead, that the very multitude of the wicked may be signified. For wide is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat (Matt. 7:13). Therefore for Satan to watch in the heap of the dead is to exercise the crafts of his malice in the hearts of the reprobate. Concerning which it is yet added:

CHAPTER LX

[Rec. XXXVIII].

VERS. 33.---He was sweet to the pebbles of Cocytus.

71. As he is bitter to the elect, so is he sweet to the reprobate by suggesting vices to them.--- In the Greek language Cocytus is called mourning, which mourning, however, is wont to be understood of women or of any weak persons. But the wise men of this world, excluded from the light of truth, have endeavored to hold as it were certain shadows of truth by their inquiry. Whence they thought that the river Cocytus ran among those in hell, designating evidently that those who do works worthy of sorrows, run down into hell to mourning. But let us despise the shadow of carnal wisdom, we who already hold the light of truth, and let us know by the voice of the blessed man that Cocytus is called the mourning of the weak. For it is written: Do manfully, and let your heart be strengthened (Ps. 31:24). For those who refuse to be strengthened in God, tend to mourning through the infirmity of the mind. But we are accustomed to call the little stones of rivers which the flowing water draws along, pebbles. What therefore is designated by the pebbles of Cocytus but the reprobate, who, given up to their pleasures, are as it were always drawn down by the river to the depths? For those who will not stand firmly with fortitude against the pleasures of this world, become pebbles of Cocytus, who by their daily slips tend to mourning, that they may mourn eternally afterwards, who now relax themselves delightfully in their pleasures. And because the ancient enemy, having entered his vessel, that reprobate man, while he bestows gifts on the perverse, while he exalts them in this world with honors, while he shows prodigies to their eyes, unstable minds admire and follow him in his prodigies, it is well said of him: He was sweet to the pebbles of Cocytus. For while the elect despise him, while they contemn him with the heel of the mind, those follow and love him who are drawn as it were by the water of pleasure to perpetual mourning, who through earthly concupiscence, after the manner of a pebble, slide down to the depths by daily slips. For to some he offers the taste of his sweetness through pride, to others through avarice, to others through envy, to others through fallacy, to others through luxury; and into as many kinds of vices as he draws them, he provides as many draughts of his sweetness. For when he persuades anything proud in the mind, what he says becomes sweet, because the perverse man desires to appear set above others. While he endeavors to instill avarice into the mind, what he speaks secretly becomes sweet, because through abundance necessity is avoided. While he suggests anything of envy, what he says becomes sweet, because the perverse mind, when it sees another decay, exults that it by no means appears less than he. When he persuades anything of fallacy, what he suggests becomes sweet, because by that very thing by which he deceives others, he seems prudent to himself. When he speaks luxury to the deceived mind, what he persuades becomes sweet, because he dissolves the mind in pleasure. As many vices, then, as he inserts into the hearts of the carnal, he offers them as many draughts of his sweetness. Which sweetness of his, however, as I said before, none perceive except those who, given up to present pleasures, are drawn to perpetual mourning. Well then is it said: He was sweet to the pebbles of Cocytus, because he is bitter to the elect, and sweet to the reprobate. For those alone he feeds with his delights, whom he impels to groaning by daily slips. It follows:

CHAPTER LXI

[Vet. XXX, Rec. XXXIX].

IBID.---And after him he draweth every man, and before him innumerable.

CHAPTER LXII.

VERS. 54.---How then do you comfort me in vain, since your answer is shown to be contrary to the truth?

73. How hateful a lie is to the saints.---The friends of blessed Job could not comfort him, in that by their speeches they were going against the truth. And when they called him a hypocrite or impious, by the fact that they themselves in lying were committing a fault, they were undoubtedly increasing the punishment of the just man afflicted with wounds. For the minds of the saints, because they love the truth, are tortured even by the fault of another's deceit. For by how much they see the crime of a lie to be grave, by so much they hate it not only in themselves, but also in others.

Book sixteenth.

Having run through with a brief explanation chapters XXII, XXIII and XXIV of the book of Job, the third part closes as far as the middle of verse 20.

501 [Vet. and Rec. I.] Those who fail in their allegation against the words of truth, often repeat even well-known things, lest they should seem to be overcome by keeping silence. Whence Eliphaz, pressed by the discourses of blessed Job, says those things which no one is ignorant of. For he says:

CHAPTER FIRST.

CAP. XXII, VER. 2.---Can a man be compared with God, even when he shall be of perfect knowledge?

1. Our knowledge compared with the divine is ignorance.---For in comparison with God, our knowledge is ignorance. For we are wise by participation in God, not by comparison. What wonder then when that is said as it were by way of doctrine, which could have been known even if it were kept silent? Who still subjoins, as it were in defense, the power of God:

CHAPTER II.

VER. 3.---What does it profit God if thou wert just? or what dost thou confer on Him if thy life were unspotted?

2. God does not need our justice.---For in everything that we do well, we help ourselves, and not God. Whence also it is said by the Psalmist: I have said to the Lord: Thou art my God, for Thou hast no need of my goods (Ps. 16:2). For He is truly Lord to us, because He is indeed God, who does not need the good of the one who serves Him, but confers the goodness which He receives, so that the goodness offered may profit not Himself, but first those who receive it and afterwards those who return it. For although the Lord coming to judgment says: As long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me (Matth. 25:40), He says this with wonderful piety out of compassion for His members. And He Himself helps us by the fact that He is our head, who is helped in His members by our good works. Still Eliphaz adds what no one is ignorant of, saying:

CHAPTER III.

VER. 4.---Will He reprove thee fearing, and will He come with thee into judgment?

3. It is said idly of God what is ignored by no one.---Who, even a foolish person, would feel this, that the Lord reproves us out of fear, and out of dread proposes His judgment against us? But those who do not know how to measure their words, undoubtedly slide down to idle sayings. In which if they do not at all reprove themselves, they immediately leap forward to harmful and contumelious words. Whence Eliphaz, who introduced idle things, immediately broke out into contumelious words, saying:

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 5.---And is it not for thy great malice, and thy infinite iniquities?

4. From idle words one comes to contumelious ones.---Behold, from a sluggish heart he came to idle words, and from idle words through the crime of deceit he flared up into contumelies. For these are the falls of increasing guilt, so that the tongue, when it is not restrained, by no means lies where it has fallen, but always descends to worse things. But those things which are subjoined, because they are very evident according to the history, are not to be expounded according to the letter.

5. But because we have said that the friends of blessed Job hold the representation of heretics (Above, in the preface, and very often elsewhere), and that he himself bears the signification of the holy Church, let us now show in what way the words of Eliphaz agree with the falsehood of heretics. For it follows:

CHAPTER V

[Vet. and Rec. II].

502 For thou hast taken a pledge of thy brethren without cause, and hast stripped the naked of their clothing. Thou hast not given water to the weary, and thou hast withdrawn bread from the hungry. In the strength of thy arm thou didst possess the land, and as the most powerful thou didst obtain it.

TYPICAL SENSE. 6. Heretics lie that their own err and lose the Holy Spirit when they return to the Church.---In sacred Scripture, by the appellation of a pledge (pignus), sometimes the gifts of the Holy Spirit are signified, and sometimes the confession of sin. For the gift of the Holy Spirit is received as a pledge, as it is said by Paul: Who has given us the pledge of the Spirit (2 Cor. 1:22). For we receive a pledge for this purpose, that we may hold certainty concerning the promise which is made to us. The gift therefore of the Holy Spirit is called a pledge, because by this our soul is strengthened for the certainty of interior hope. Again, by the name of a pledge the confession of sin is wont to be understood, as it is written in the Law: When thy brother owes thee anything, and thou shalt have taken a pledge from him, restore the pledge before the setting of the sun (Ex. 22:26). For our brother becomes a debtor to us when any neighbor is shown to have committed some fault against us. For we call sins debts. Whence it is said to the sinning servant: All the debt I forgave thee (Matth. 18:32). And in the Lord's prayer we daily pray: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors (Matth. 6:12). But we receive a pledge from our debtor, when we already hold the confession of his sin from him who is known to have sinned against us, by which we are asked to release the sin which was committed against us. For he who confesses the sin which he committed, and asks for pardon, has already given as it were a pledge for his debt. Which pledge indeed we are commanded to restore before the setting of the sun, because before the sun of justice sets in us through sorrow of heart, we ought to restore to him the confession of pardon from whom we receive the confession of guilt, that he who remembers that he has sinned against us may feel that what he did wrong is soon released by us. Because therefore the holy Church, when she receives any returning from heretics to the truth of the faith, first persuades them that they ought to confess the guilt of their error, it is said as it were under the representation of heretics through Eliphaz: For thou hast taken a pledge of thy brethren without cause. That is, from these who come from us to thee, thou hast uselessly exacted a confession of error. If on the other hand, as we have said before, we understand by a pledge the gifts of the Holy Spirit, heretics say that the holy Church has taken away the pledge of their brethren, because they suspect that those who come to her lose spiritual gifts. Whence also it follows: And thou hast stripped the naked of their clothing.

[Rec. III.] 7. They call the same ones lazy and dull.---Those whom heretics draw by their perverse preachings, they think have the precepts of their doctrine as it were certain garments, and they think them clothed so long as they consider these things which they themselves have preached to be observed by them; from whom when some return to the holy Church, they immediately suspect that they have lost the garments of doctrine. [Vet. III.] But since a naked person cannot be stripped, we must ask: how are they mentioned first as naked, and afterwards as stripped? 503 But it is to be known that everyone who enjoys purity of heart, by that very fact that he has not the covering of double-mindedness, is naked. And there are some among heretics who have indeed purity of heart, but yet receive the perverse dogmas of their doctrine. These indeed are both naked from their own purity, and are as it were clothed from their preaching. And because such as these easily return to the holy Church, for the reason that they do not use the malice of double-mindedness, heretics confess them to be naked, whom they say have been stripped of their garments by her, because they think simple ones to be lazy and dull, whom they consider to have lost their own perverse dogmas.

8. They accuse the Church of ignorance when they speak of unknown things.---It follows: Thou hast not given water to the weary, and thou hast withdrawn bread from the hungry. Heretics, in that they do not hold the solidity of truth, for that reason sometimes study to appear more loquacious, and glory as it were in the knowledge of their doctrine against the faith of Catholics; they seek to draw all whom they behold to themselves by perverse discourses, and from the very thing by which they associate others to themselves for destruction, from thence they think they are acting with some vivacity. For we call those weary who are fatigued under the laborious burden of this world. Whence also the Truth says by Himself: Come to me all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you (Matth. 11:28). Heretics therefore, because they do not cease to preach their own dogmas, mock the holy Church as if for unskillfulness, saying: Thou hast not given water to the weary, and thou hast withdrawn bread from the hungry. For they think that they give water to the weary when they offer their cup of error to some who labor under a terrestrial burden. And they suspect that they have not withdrawn bread from the hungry, because even when questioned about invisible and incomprehensible things, they answer with proud audacity. And then they believe themselves learned above all when they more unhappily presume to speak of unknown things. But the holy Church, while she sees anyone hungry for that which it would not profit him to receive, either modestly suppresses it if they are already known to her, or if they still seem unknown, humbly confesses it, and recalls them to the sense of an ordered humility when she says to them by her preacher: Not to be more wise than it behooves to be wise, but to be wise unto sobriety (Rom. 12:3). And again: Be not high-minded, but fear (Rom. 11:20). And again: Seek not the things that are too high for thee, and search not into things that are above thy strength (Ecclus. 3:22). And again: Thou hast found honey, eat what is sufficient for thee, lest perhaps being filled thou vomit it up (Prov.

25:16). For to find honey is to taste the sweetness of holy understanding. Which is then sufficiently eaten, when our intelligence is held under guidance according to the measure of sense. For he that is filled casts out the honey, who desiring to penetrate more than he captures, loses even that from which he might have been nourished. Because therefore the holy Church forbids weak minds to search into high things, it is said to blessed Job: Thou hast withdrawn bread from the hungry.

[Vet. IV.] 9. They envy her magnitude and universality.---And because heretics also envy her magnitude, in that she holds the peoples universally in the true faith, when they find a time of earthly prosperity, they exceed against her in proud voices, and in reproaching they lay open how much they formerly envied her power in secret. For it follows: In the strength of thy arm thou didst possess the land, and as most powerful thou didst obtain it. As if they should say openly: That in thy preaching thou hast occupied the land universally, was the power of fortitude, not the reason of truth. For because they see Christian princes to hold her preaching, they suspect that this which is believed of her by the peoples, is not the virtue of rectitude, but the cause of secular power. It follows:

CHAPTER VI.

VER. 9.---Thou hast sent widows away empty, and the arms of the fatherless thou hast broken.

10. They detract from her when she benignly receives the masters of error who come to their senses.---The common people who are subject to preaching heretics, conceive the perverse seeds of their errors from carnal understanding, and are associated with them in their own damnation. But when the holy Church receives into herself those very preachers of errors, either overcome by reason, or restrains under the bond of her discipline those hardened in their study of perversity, the destitute heretics, when they see the common people remain among them without preachers, what else do they grieve for from the holy Church but that widows are left empty? And because, the masters of the heretics being withdrawn, they suspect that their disciples are weakened in their own work, they complain as if the arms of the fatherless were broken by the Church. Or certainly because the holy Church, while she receives some coming from heretics, it is evidently clear that she contradicts their former error. For there are some who so study the virginity of the flesh that they condemn marriages; and there are some who so praise abstinence that they detest those who take necessary food. Concerning whom it is said by Paul: Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God has created to be received with thanksgiving by the faithful (1 Tim. 4:3). Because therefore she recalls them from the carnal intention of their superstition, heretics, when they behold these living otherwise than they taught, testify that their arms have been broken by the Church from the operation which they formerly held. Whence also in this time of discipline, if any adversity should happen to her, they suspect that this has happened from a worthy retribution for sins. For it is subjoined:

CHAPTER VII.

VER. 10.---Therefore thou art surrounded with snares, and sudden fear troubles thee.

11. They reproach the one suffering adversities that they are the punishments for crimes.---That sudden fear troubles him who neglects to consider what is imminent from the strictness of the coming Judge. Because therefore heretics believe the faithful people to be oppressed by the guilts of perfidy, they accuse them of being surrounded with snares. And because they think that they do not foresee future things, in their percussion they think this one is troubled by sudden fear. Who still insulting subjoin:

VER. 11.---And thou thoughtest that thou shouldest not see darkness, and that thou shouldest not be oppressed by the violence of overflowing waters.

As if he should say openly: Thou hadst proposed to thyself security of peace in hope, and therefore thou didst rejoice in thy presumption as if in light, nor didst thou ever think thou wouldest be oppressed by tribulations. But behold, while thou art afflicted by supervening evils, the very darknesses of tribulations which oppress thee show whether those things which thou holdest are right. Which tribulations indeed Eliphaz compares to overflowing waters, because while some rush upon others, as if with swelling waters, waves follow waves. It follows:

CHAPTER VIII

[Ancient V].

VERS. 12-14.---Is not God higher than heaven, and elevated above the height of the stars? And thou sayest: How doth God know? and He judgeth as it were through a mist. The clouds are His hiding place, and He considereth not our things, and He walketh about the poles of heaven.

12. An excellent description of the immensity and divine providence. God so attends to all things, that He is present to each.---There are many so dull that they know not how to fear except what they see corporally. Whence it comes that they fear not God, whom they cannot see. But heretics, because they think themselves to be wise, bring forth words of derision against Catholics, and suspect that He is not feared by them, whom they cannot see corporally; so that as it were through a torpor of sense they think their Author, because He is higher than heaven, and elevated above the heights of the stars, cannot see from afar; and because between us and the heavenly seat aerial parts intervene, He judges as if hiding in a cloud through a mist, and intent on higher things, He less weighs the lowest; and while He constrains the poles of heaven by walking around them, He sees not the interior things. But who even foolish would suspect these things of God, who indeed since He is always Omnipotent, so attends to all things, that He is present to each; so is He present to each, that at the same time He is never absent from all? For although He deserts certain sinners, He is nevertheless present to those same ones by judgment, to whom He is seen to be absent by help. For so He surrounds the exterior things, that He fills the interior; so He fills the interior, that He surrounds the exterior; so He rules the highest, that He deserts not the lowest; so He is present to the lowest, that He recedes not from the higher; so He is hidden in His own appearance, that nevertheless He is known in operation; so is He known in His own work, that nevertheless He cannot be comprehended by the estimation of the one knowing; so is He present, that He cannot be seen; so He cannot be seen, that nevertheless His own judgments testify to His presence; so He offers Himself to be understood by us, that nevertheless He clouds for us the very ray of His understanding; and again He so represses us with the mist of ignorance, that nevertheless He flashes into our mind with the rays of His brightness: so that both being uplifted it may see something, and being reverberated it may tremble; and because it cannot see Him as He is, it may in some measure know Him by living. But these things heretics do not think the holy Church knows, because by a foolish judgment they think themselves alone to be wise. From whose type still it is subjoined:

CHAPTER IX.

VERSE 15.---Dost thou desire to keep the path of the ages, which wicked men have trodden?

13. The path of Christ is humility, the pride of the world.---As the path of our Redeemer is humility, so the path of the ages is pride. Wicked men therefore tread the path of the ages, because through the desires of this life they walk in elation. Concerning which wicked men it is still added:

CHAPTER X

[Ancient VI, Rec. IV].

VERSE 16.---Who were taken away before their time, and a flood has overthrown their foundation.

14. The wicked always die before the time they have fixed for themselves, never before that appointed by God. Since the time of life is without doubt fixed for us by the divine prescience, it is much to be asked for what reason it is now said that the wicked are withdrawn from the present world before their own time. For Almighty God, although He frequently changes His sentence, never changes His counsel. At that time therefore each one is withdrawn from this life, in which it is foreknown by divine power before times. But it is to be known that Almighty God, creating and ordering us, according to the merits of each, disposes also the limits, so that either that bad man may live briefly, lest he should harm many who act well; or this good man may subsist longer in this life, that he may exist as an assistant of good work to many; or again the bad may be deferred longer in life that he may increase still depraved works, by whose temptation the purified just may live more truly; or the good may be more quickly withdrawn, lest if he live here long, malice should corrupt his innocence. It is to be known nevertheless that it is the goodness of God to grant to sinners a space of repentance. But because they turn the accepted times not to the fruit of repentance, but to the use of iniquity, they lose what they might have merited from divine mercy. Although Almighty God foreknows that time of each one unto death in which his life is terminated, nor could anyone have died in another time, except that in which he dies. For if fifteen years are mentioned as added to the life of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20, 6), the time indeed of life grew from that limit in which he himself deserved to die. For divine disposition then foreknew his time, in which He afterwards withdrew him from the present life. Since therefore it is so, what is it that is said: Because the wicked were taken away before their time, except that all who love the present life promise to themselves longer spaces of the same life? But when death supervening withdraws them from the present life, it cuts short the spaces of their life, which they had been accustomed to extend longer for themselves as if in thought. Concerning whom it is rightly said: [Rec. V.] And a flood has overthrown their foundation.

15. The foundation of the wicked is in earthly things, of the just in heavenly. For the wicked, while they neglect in heart to pass over to eternal things, and do not behold all present things to be fugitive, fix their mind in the love of the present life, and construct for themselves as it were a foundation of long habitation in it, because they are solidified in earthly things through desire. So Cain is described as having first constructed a city on the earth (Gen. 4), who indeed is clearly shown to be a stranger, because he himself placed a foundation on the earth, who was alien from the solidity of the eternal country. For a stranger from the highest, he placed a foundation in the lowest, who placed the station of his heart in earthly delight. Whence also in his race Enoch, which is interpreted dedication, is first born; but in the progeny of the elect Enoch is recorded to have been the seventh, because indeed the reprobate in this life which is before dedicate themselves by building up themselves, but the elect await the dedication of their building in the end of time, that is in the seventh. For thou mayest see very many to think only temporal things, to seek honors, to gape for things to be ambitiously sought, to require nothing after this life. What therefore do these but dedicate themselves in the first generation? Thou mayest see the elect to seek nothing of present glory, to sustain want willingly, to endure the evils of the world with equanimity, that they may be able to be crowned in the end. To the elect therefore Enoch is born in the seventh generation, because they seek the dedication of their joy in the glory of the extreme retribution. And because by the daily lapse of time the very mortality of the present life runs down, and destroys the dedication of the reprobate by withdrawing the same reprobate, it is rightly said of the wicked: And a flood has overthrown their foundation. That is, the very course of mutability overthrows in them the state of perverted construction. It follows:

CHAPTER XI.

VERSE 17.---Who said to God: Depart from us.

16. Who would doubt that the blessed Job also said these things? But those things which we have explained in his sayings, for the fastidiousness of the reader we avoid to repeat. It follows:

IBID.---And as if the Almighty could do nothing, they esteemed Him.

In these also the word, and not the sense, is changed. For what was said by blessed Job: Who is the Almighty, that we should serve Him (Job 21, 15)? this is said by Eliphaz: And as if the Almighty could do nothing, they esteemed Him. It follows:

CHAPTER XII

[Ancient VII].

VERSE 18.---When He had filled their houses with good things.

17. God also heaps benefits upon the wicked. For what purpose.---The Lord fills the houses of the wicked with good things, because He does not deny His gifts even to the ungrateful, so that either they may blush at the kindness of the Creator, and return to goodness; or, altogether contemning to return, they may be more heavily punished there, whence here also they have returned evils for the more bountiful goods of God, so that more harsh punishments may then punish them, whose malice even gifts did not overcome here. It follows:

IBID.---Whose sentence be far from me.

Sentence is one thing, counsel another.---This also was said by blessed Job. For he says: Whose counsel be far from me (Job 21, 16), although sentence may be understood as one thing, and counsel another. Sentence indeed is in the mouth, counsel in thought. While therefore Eliphaz desired himself to be far from the sentence of the wicked, but blessed Job from the counsel, it is clear indeed that the one desires to be unlike the wicked in words, but the other even in thought. It follows:

[Rec. VI.]

VERSE 19.---The just shall see, and shall rejoice, and the innocent shall laugh them to scorn.

18. The just now waste away because of the sins of the wicked, to rejoice at some time at their destruction.---When the just see the unjust erring here, they cannot rejoice at the error of those perishing. For if they rejoice in errors, they are not just. Again if they rejoice through insult because they are not such as they see others to be, they are altogether proud. Whence also the Pharisee lost justification, because by rejoicing he preferred himself to the merits of the publican, saying: I give thanks to Thee, because I am not as other men, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican (Luke 18, 11). Again if we say that the just can exult with perfect joy over the death of the depraved, what kind of joy is there in this world over the vengeance of those sinning, in which the life of the just is still uncertain? Let us therefore distinguish the times of trembling and of exultation. For the just now see the unjust, and waste away because of their wickedness. And when they see them being struck, they also become suspect of their own life. When therefore shall the just see the destruction of the wicked, and rejoice, except when they shall have cleaved to the strict Judge with perfect security of exultation, when in that extreme examination they shall behold their damnation, and shall not have what they may fear for themselves? Now therefore they behold the reprobate and groan, then they shall behold and laugh them to scorn, because by exulting they shall despise those, whom now they see neither without groaning when they perpetrate iniquities, nor without fear when they die for iniquity. Whence by this which is subjoined, it is shown that it is said concerning their last damnation; for it is immediately subjoined:

CHAPTER XIV

[Rec. VII].

VERSE 20. Is not their pride cut down, and the fire has devoured their remains?

19. The wicked now flourish, but are to be cut down at some time, and punished both in flesh and in soul.---For here the wicked are uplifted, because they are extolled in depraved actions, because they both act perversely, and nevertheless for perverse acts are by no means struck. They sin and flourish; they increase sins and multiply earthly goods. But their pride is then cut down, when they are drawn away either from the present life to destruction, or from the sight of the eternal Judge to the eternal fire of Gehenna. Who although they leave here their dead flesh, they also receive it back in the resurrection, so that they may burn with the flesh in which they sinned. For as their guilt was in the mind and body, so their punishment will be in the soul and flesh alike. Because therefore this will not be free for them from torment, that they leave it dead here, it is rightly said now: The fire has devoured their remains. It follows:

CHAPTER XV

[Ancient VIII].

VERSES 21, 22.---Acquiesce therefore to Him, and have peace, and through these thou shalt have the best fruits. Receive the law from His mouth, and place His words in thy heart.

20. The pride and presumption of heretics.---It is a fault of pride to teach one better, which heretics often commit, who concerning those things which they depravedly feel presume as it were to teach Catholics. For then they think them to acquiesce to God, if it should happen that they consent to their perversities. And to those acquiescing they promise peace, because they already desist from quarreling against those who consent to them. But they promise the best fruits to those consenting to them, because they think those alone to do good works, whom they exult to draw to their own dogmas. To whom also this is consistent, which he adds: Receive the law from His mouth. Because they suspect those things which they themselves feel to proceed from the mouth of God: And place His words in thy heart. As if he should openly assert, saying: Whom until now thou hast held in the mouth, and not in the heart. For because he rejects their perverted dogmas, they accuse him of having the words of God not in sense, but in show. Whence as if under a certain species of sweetness they infuse the poison of pestiferous persuasion, so that they may admonish the Church to place the words of God in its heart. Which if they had ever receded from its heart, it would by no means hear such things from them. It follows:

CHAPTER XVI.

VERSE 23.---If thou shalt return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up, and thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacle.

21. What is returned to God after sins, is cleansed in thought and in work.---Heretics think the faithful people to have departed from God, because they see them resisting their preachings. Whom when they behold afflicted with present evils, they try as it were by admonition to draw to the grace of the Creator, saying: If thou shalt return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up. As if they should openly say: Because by resisting our dogmas thou hast departed from the Lord, therefore thou art destroyed from the building up of righteousness. But we sometimes take the tabernacle for the dwelling place of the body, sometimes indeed for the dwelling place of the heart. For as we inhabit the body by the soul, so we inhabit the mind by thoughts. Iniquity therefore in the tabernacle of the mind, is a perverted intention in the study of thought; but iniquity in the tabernacle of the body is a carnal action through the completion of work. Eliphaz therefore, because he was a friend of the blessed man, feeling certain true things, and nevertheless in those things in which he deviates from rectitude, holding the species of heretics, not knowing that blessed Job was scourged for virtues, believed that he who he saw struck had erred, and promises to him, if he shall have returned to the Almighty, saying: Thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacle, as if he should clearly say: Whoever returns to God after errors, is cleansed in thought and in work alike. It follows:

CHAPTER XVII

[Ancient IX, Rec. VIII].

VERSE 24.---He shall give for earth a flint, and for flint golden torrents.

22. The weak, God healing them, escape strong, and shine before others with doctrine.---What is signified by earth but weakness of action, what by the hardness of flint, but fortitude? what do we take by golden torrents, but the doctrine of inner clarity? But Almighty God gives flint for earth to those converted to Him, because He bestows fortitude of robust work for weak action. He also gives golden torrents for flint, because for robust work He multiplies the doctrine of clear preaching, so that each sinner converted, and from weak being able to exist as strong, may rise up in his fortitude even to bringing forth the words of inner clarity, so that in him both the weakness of action, in which as it were he is dissolved, may be solidified by the fortitude of living well; and again when sense is drawn from life, from that very fortitude golden torrents may flow down, because in the mouth of those living well the clarity of doctrine overflows. It follows:

CHAPTER XVIII.

VERSE 25. And the Almighty shall be against your enemies, and silver shall be heaped up for you.

23. God, having put the enemies to flight, enriches us with the silver of divine eloquence.---What other enemies do we suffer more than the malignant spirits, who besiege us in our thoughts, that they may be able to break into the city of our mind, and hold it captured under the yoke of their dominion? But that by the name of silver sacred eloquence is designated the Psalmist testifies, who says: The words of the Lord are pure words, silver tried by the fire of the earth (Ps. 11:7). And often when we apply ourselves to sacred eloquence, we endure the snares of malignant spirits more grievously, because they sprinkle the dust of earthly thoughts upon our mind, that they may obscure the eyes of our intention from the light of inner vision. Which indeed the Psalmist had endured, when he said: Depart from me, ye malignant, and I will search into the commandments of my God (Ps. 119:115). Plainly, of course, intimating that he could not search into the commandments of God when he was enduring the snares of malignant spirits in his mind. Which we also know to be signified in the work of Isaac under the wickedness of the Allophyli, who filled up with a heap of earth the wells which Isaac had digged (Gen. 26:15). For we indeed dig these wells when we penetrate deep things in the hidden senses of sacred Scripture. Which, however, the Allophyli fill up secretly when, while we are tending toward deep things, the unclean spirits cast earthly thoughts into us, and take away, as it were, the water of divine knowledge that was found. But because no one overcomes these enemies by his own strength, it is said through Eliphaz: And the Almighty shall be against your enemies, and silver shall be heaped up for you. As if it were plainly said: When the Lord by His own strength shall have repelled the malignant spirits from you, the bright talent of divine eloquence increases within. It follows:

CHAPTER XIX

[Ancient X, Rec. IX].

VERSE 26.---Then upon the Almighty you shall abound in delights.

24. Those abound in delights who know how to discern the manifold senses in the sacred Scriptures.---To abound in delights upon the Almighty is to be satiated with the feasts of sacred Scripture in the love of Him. In whose words indeed we find as many delights as we receive diversities of understanding for our progress, so that now history may feed us nakedly, now under the text of the letter a veiled moral allegory may refresh us inly, now contemplation may suspend us toward higher things, already flashing between in the darkness of the present life from the light of eternity. And it should be known that whoever abounds in delights is dissolved in a certain remission of himself, and is relaxed from the study of labor as if from weariness, because indeed when the soul has begun to abound with internal delights, it least of all consents to lie upon earthly works; but captured by the love of the creator, and already free in its captivity, it sighs to contemplate His beauty by failing, and recovers, as it were, by growing weary, because while it is no longer able to carry foul burdens, it hastens by rest to Him whom it loves within. Hence also in the admiration of the bride it is written: Who is this that cometh up from the desert abounding in delights (Cant. 8:5)? Because indeed holy Church, unless she abounded in the delights of the words of God, could not ascend from the desert of the present life to superior things. Therefore she abounds in delights and ascends, because while she is fed by mystical understandings, she is raised up daily to contemplate heavenly things. Hence also the Psalmist says: And night is my illumination in my delights (Ps. 139:11), because while the studious mind is refreshed through mystical understanding, already in it the obscurity of the present life is illuminated by the brightness of the following day, so that even in the darkness of this corruption the force of future light may break into the understanding of it, and fed by the delights of words, it may learn by foretasting what it should hunger for from the food of truth. It follows:

CHAPTER XX.

IBID.---And you shall lift up your face to God.

25. To lift up the face to God is to raise up the heart purified by penance to investigate divine things.---To lift up the face to God is to raise up the heart to investigate sublime things. For as we are known and conspicuous to man through the bodily face, so to God through the inner image. But when we are depressed by the guilt of offense, we fear to lift up the face of our heart to God. For while it is supported by no confidence of good works, the supreme mind trembles to behold, because the conscience itself accuses it.

But when already the guilt is washed away by the lamentations of penance, and thus things perpetrated are bewailed, so that things to be bewailed are by no means perpetrated, a great confidence is born to the mind, and the face of our heart is lifted up to behold the joys of heavenly retribution. But Eliphaz would say these things rightly if he were admonishing a weak man. But when he despises a just man on account of scourges, what else does he do but pour out words of knowledge without knowing? Which sayings indeed, if we lead them to the type of heretics, they themselves promise that we shall lift up our face to God by false promises. As if they should say plainly to the faithful people: As long as you do not follow our preaching, you press down the heart in weak things. But because Eliphaz admonished blessed Job to return to God, from whom indeed that same blessed man never departed, he adds further by promising:

CHAPTER XXI.

VERSE 27.---You shall ask Him, and He shall hear you.

26. They ask God in vain who despise His precepts.---Indeed they ask the Lord, but they by no means deserve to be heard, who despise the precepts of the commanding Lord. Hence it is written: He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, his prayer shall be an abomination (Prov. 28:9). As long, therefore, as Eliphaz believed that blessed Job was not heard, hence indeed he judged that he had erred in his work. Hence also he adds still:

IBID.---And you shall pay your vows.

[Ancient XI.] He who has vowed vows, but is not able to pay them on account of weakness, it is done to him from the punishment of sin so that the ability to do good is taken away from him who is willing. But when in the sight of the inner Judge that guilt which stands in the way is wiped away, it happens immediately that ability follows the vow. It follows:

CHAPTER XXII.

VERSE 28.---You shall decree a thing, and it shall come to you.

27. False judgments of men concerning adversity and prosperity.---This is wont to be the proper judgment of the weak, that they think anyone just in proportion as they see him attain everything he desires. Since, indeed, we know that earthly goods are sometimes taken away from the just, which are given with a large gift to the unjust, because even for despaired-of sick people physicians command whatever they ask for to be given, and to those whom they foresee can be brought back to health they refuse to give the things they desire. But if Eliphaz brought in these sayings concerning spiritual gifts, it should be known that a thing is decreed and comes when the virtue which is desired by longing, by the bounty of God, also prospers in effect. Hence also it is added further:

[Rec. X].

IBID.---And light shall shine in your ways.

28. Wonderful splendor of virtue.---For light to shine in the ways of the just is to sprinkle the signs of their clarity through wonderful works of virtues, so that wherever they go by intention, they may shake off the night of sin from the hearts of the beholders, and pour the light of justice into them by the example of their work. But however great the justice of work may be, it is nothing with the internal Judge if the swelling of the mind elevates it. Hence also it is added:

CHAPTER XXIV.

VERSE 29.---For he who shall have been humbled, shall be in glory; and he who shall have inclined his eyes, he shall be saved.

29. Commendation of humility.---Which sentence indeed does not differ from the mouth of Truth saying: Everyone who exalteth himself shall be humbled, and he who humbleth himself shall be exalted (Luke 14:11). Hence also it is said through Solomon: Before he is crushed, the heart of man is exalted; and before he is glorified, he is humbled (Prov. 18:12). But it is rightly said: He who shall have inclined his eyes, he shall be saved, because, as much as can be perceived through the ministry of the members, the first showing of pride is wont to be in the eyes. For hence it is written: And the eyes of the proud

Thou wilt humble (Ps. 17:28). Hence it is said of that very head of the proud: He beholdeth every high thing (Job 41:25). Hence of that which adhered to him through infidelity it is written: A generation whose eyes are lofty, and its eyelids lifted up on high (Prov. 30:13). Therefore to incline the eyes is to despise no one by looking back, but to estimate oneself less and unequal to all whom one beholds. He therefore shall be saved who inclines his eyes, because he who deserts the false summit of pride, ascends the height of truth. It follows:

CHAPTER XXV.

VERSE 30.---The innocent shall be saved, he shall be saved moreover by the cleanness of his hands.

30. Necessity of preventing grace, which free will ought to accompany and follow.---Which sentence indeed, if it is brought forth concerning the retribution of the heavenly kingdom, is supported by truth, because when it is written of God: Who rendereth to every man according to his works (Rom. 2:6), the justice of the eternal Judge saves him in the final examination whom His piety here delivers from unclean works. But if anyone is believed to be saved here by the cleanness of his hands to this end, that he may become innocent by his own strength, without doubt it is erred, because if heavenly grace does not prevent the guilty one, it will never indeed find an innocent one whom it may remunerate. Hence it is said by the truthful voice of Moses: And no one with Thee is of himself innocent (Ex. 34:7). Heavenly piety, therefore, first does something in us without us, that, our free will also following, it may do with us the good which we already desire, which however, through bestowed grace, it so remunerates in us in the final judgment as if it had proceeded from us alone. [Ancient XII.] For because divine goodness prevents us so that it may make us innocent, Paul says: But by the grace of God I am what I am (1 Cor. 15:10). And because our free will follows that same grace, he adds: And His grace in me was not void, but I labored more abundantly than they all. Who, while he beheld that he was nothing of himself, said: Yet not I. And yet because he found himself to be something with grace, he added: But the grace of God with me. For he would not say with me if he had not subsequent free will with preventing grace. That he might therefore show that he was nothing without grace, he said: Not I. But that he might demonstrate that he had worked with grace through free will, he added: But the grace of God with me. Therefore by the cleanness of his hands the innocent shall be saved, because he who here is prevented by a gift that he may become innocent, when he is led to judgment, is remunerated from merit. All which things Eliphaz, as was said before, although he brought them forth rightly, yet knew not to whom he should bring them forth, because he ought not to have taught a better man, but to have heard him. All which things, however, through a type agree with the promises of heretics, who when they find any faithful people afflicted in the present life, think them struck from the guilt of perfidy, and promise them, if they follow their dogmas, the safety of innocence through the cleanness of good works. But the mind of the faithful despises them so much the more highly, as it does not see them have that innocence which they promise. Hence it is well said through Solomon: In vain is the net spread before the eyes of the winged ones (Prov. 1:17). For the spirits of the good are winged, who while they fly away to higher things through the hope of truth, decline the nets of the deception of wicked men that are placed. It follows:

CHAPTER XXVI

[Rec. XI].

CHAPTER XXIII, VERSES 1, 2.---But Job answering said: Even now my speech is in bitterness, and the hand of my stroke is aggravated above my groaning.

31. Inordinate consolation increases pain.--- According to his custom, blessed Job begins in plainer words, but consumes his sayings with a high prosecution of mystery. Indeed, the pain of the afflicted ought to have been healed by the consolation of friends; but because the consolation broke out into the flatteries of deceit, the pain of the afflicted became horrible. For because Eliphaz did not fear to promise better things to one converted, the wound grew as if from a noxious medicine. Hence it is rightly said: Even now my speech is in bitterness, and the hand of my stroke is aggravated above my groaning, because indeed the intention of inordinate consolation multiplied the percussion which it ought to have diminished. In which words indeed, through a type of holy Church, the pain of the faithful is also expressed, who groan so much the more as they behold the wicked to flatter, who according to the voice of Paul: By sweet words and blessings seduce the hearts of the innocent (Rom. 16:18).

32. [Ancient XIII.] The minds of the faithful know not how to be without bitterness. These words are also rightly referred to considering more subtly the mind of the faithful, who know not how to be without bitterness even if they seem to prosper in this world. When adversity also happens to them, it redoubles the pain which it finds. Hence it is rightly said: Even now my speech is in bitterness, that it may be shown openly that the mind of the elect was not without bitterness even in prosperity. But it is well said: And the hand of my stroke is aggravated above my groaning. For the hand of the stroke is the strength of the percussion. For the elect consider their first percussion, because they are divided from the vision of their Creator, because they by no means enjoy the clarity of inner illumination, but groan as if relegated to a place of blindness in the exile of the present life. Therefore they always have their groaning in this hand of the stroke. But when even adverse things still happen in this life, the hand of their stroke is aggravated even above their groaning. For there was a groaning of the stroke even when the adverse things of the present life were lacking. But the bitterness of the first percussion increases even from the temptation of adversity. He says therefore: And the hand of my stroke is aggravated above my groaning: because adversity in this life did not strike each just man joyful, but multiplied in him the pain of the wound. It happens, however, by the wonderful moderation of Almighty God, that when in this world the mind of the just labors more with adversities, it thirsts more to contemplate the face of its Author. Hence it is aptly added here:

CHAPTER XXVII

[Rec. XII].

VERS. 3.---O that I might know and find him, and come even to his throne!

33. The ardor of the elect desiring to enjoy the sight of God.---Unless each of the elect had known God, he certainly would not love Him. But it is one thing to know by faith, and another by sight; one thing to find by belief, another by contemplation. From which matter it comes to pass that all the elect pant to see also by sight Him whom they have known by faith. Burning with love of Him, they are in a fever, because they already taste the sweetness of His mildness in the very certainty of their faith. Which that man healed of demons in the region of the Gerasenes well designates, who wants to go away with Jesus; but it is said to him by the Master of salvation: Return to thy house, and tell how great things God hath done for thee (Luke 8:39). For a delay is still imposed on the lover, so that from the desire of delayed love the merit of retribution may be increased. Therefore, Almighty God becomes sweet to us in miracles, and yet remains hidden in His loftiness, so that both by showing something of Himself He may kindle us in His love by a hidden inspiration, and yet by hiding the glory of His Majesty He may increase the force of His love through the heat of desire. For unless the holy man sought to see Him in His Majesty, he certainly would not subjoin: And come even to his throne [Ancient XIV]. For what is the throne of God, but those angelic spirits who, by the testimony of Scripture, are called thrones? He, therefore, who wishes to come even to the throne of God, what else does he concupisce than to be present with the angelic spirits, so that he may no longer sustain any failing moments of time, but may rise up to permanent glory in the contemplation of eternity?

34. The elect venerate the hidden judgments of God.---Which words, however, also suit the just placed in this life. For when they behold anything to be done against their vow and desire, they recur to the hidden judgments of God, so that they may see in them that that is not inordinately disposed within which seems to run inordinately without. For when they contemplate with the eyes of faith the Creator of all presiding over the angelic spirits, they come indeed to His throne. And because they consider that He who wonderfully rules the angels does not dispose men unjustly, they surely find the causal reasons how just they are, while those very causes may seem unjust from without; and while they do this humbly, they often reprehend themselves in their own will, they sometimes judge their own vows in themselves, while they think those things which the Creator disposes to be better. Hence it is well still added:

CHAPTER XXVIII

[Rec. XIII].

VERS. 4.---I would order my cause before him, and fill my mouth with arguments.

35. From the consideration of the hidden judgments of God the elect are kindled to repentance.---To order a cause before God is, within the secret of the mind, through the contemplation of faith, to open the eyes of our consideration to the tremendous examination of His Majesty, to attend to what a sinful man deserves, and to consider how terrible the Judge, now hidden and silent, will appear afterwards. From which matter it comes to pass that the soul is recalled more subtly to the knowledge of itself, and the more it sees its hidden Judge to be terrible, the more fearfully it is straitened concerning its own acts. It trembles anxiously, it pursues its faults with lamentations, by repenting it reproaches what it remembers itself to have been. Hence now also after it has been said: I would order my cause before him, it is rightly subjoined: And fill my mouth with arguments. For he who orders his cause for himself in the sight of God, fills his mouth with arguments, because while he contemplates the subtle examination of the tremendous Judge against himself, he pursues himself with the invective of bitter repentance. But often while we neglect to weigh our faults, we are ignorant what reproach of them may follow in judgment; but when we pursue them by repenting, we find what the Judge may be able to say to us concerning them in His examination. Hence it is still aptly subjoined:

CAPUT XXIX.

VERS. 5.---That I might know the words which he would answer me, and understand what he would say unto me.

36. The elect, while they fear the hidden judgments of God, escape them.---For then we bewail our faults when we have begun to weigh them. But then we weigh more subtly, when we bewail more solicitously, and from the lamentations there is born more fully in our heart what the divine strictness threatens to sinners, what those reproaches of the reprobate will be, what terror, what implacable aversion of the Majesty. For the Lord, angry with the reprobate, will say so great things then, as great as He shall have permitted them to suffer from equity. Which words of that animadversion the just indeed, while they now solicitously fear, escape. But who may prevail to be found just in that examination, if God should discuss the life of men according to the Majesty of His strength? Aptly therefore it is subjoined:

CHAPTER XXX

[Vet. XV, Rec. XIV].

VERS. 6.---I would not that he contend with me with much strength, nor overwhelm me with the weight of his greatness.

37. Dreading the strength of God, they desire infirmity in the assumed humanity.---For the mind of even any just man, if it is strictly judged by Almighty God, is overwhelmed by the weight of His greatness. In which words indeed this also is to be understood, that the holy man, while he avoids the strength of God, what else does he desire than His infirmity? And it is written: The weakness of God is stronger than men (1 Cor. 1:25). Whence also he immediately adds:

VERS. 7.---Let him propose equity against me, and my judgment shall come to victory.

For who else but the Mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus (1 Tim. 2:5), is designated by the name of equity? of whom it is written: Who was made wisdom unto us from God, and justice (1 Cor. 1:30). Which justice indeed while it comes into this world against the ways of sinners, we overcome the ancient enemy, by whom we were held captives. Let him say therefore: I would not that he contend with me with much strength, nor overwhelm me with the weight of his greatness; let him propose equity against me, and my judgment shall come to victory. That is, let Him send His incarnate Son to reprove my ways, and then through the judgment of my absolution I, a victor, shall exclude the waylaying adversary. For if in the strength of His divinity the only-begotten Son of God should so remain invisible that He should take nothing of our infirmity, when could weak man have been able to find access of grace to Him? For the considered weight of His greatness would rather oppress than help. But He appeared strong above all things, weak among all things, so that while He suited us from the assumed infirmity, He might raise us to His permanent strength. For in its loftiness His divinity could not have been apprehended by us as little ones, but He prostrated Himself to men through His humanity, and we ascended as if upon one lying down; He arose, and we were lifted up. Whence this also is soon added, by which the invisible and incomprehensible divinity is demonstrated. For there follows:

CHAPTER XXXI

[Rec. XV].

VERS. 8, 9.---If I go to the East, he appeareth not; if to the West, I shall not understand him; if to the left, what shall I do? I shall not apprehend him; if I turn myself to the right, I shall not see him.

38. God is invisible and incomprehensible, to be sought not in a part but everywhere.---For the Creator of all is not in a part, because He is everywhere. And then He is found the less, when He who is whole everywhere is sought in a part. For the uncircumscribed spirit has all things within himself, which yet he both surrounds by filling, and fills by surrounding, and transcends by sustaining, and sustains by transcending. But it is well that after it was said: If I go to the East, he appeareth not; if to the West, I shall not understand him; if to the left, what shall I do? I shall not apprehend him; if I turn myself to the right, I shall not see him; he immediately added: But he knoweth my way. As if he should say openly: I am not able to see Him seeing me, and I cannot behold Him who beholds me subtly; that he may show indeed that He is so much the more cautiously to be dreaded, as He is not visible. For He who so looks at us, that He cannot be looked at by us, is so much the more to be feared, as, seeing all things, He is least seen. For when we believe anyone to lie in wait for us in ambush against us, we fear him the more for this, that we see him least. And when we by no means detect his ambushes where they are, we even fear them there where they are not. But our Creator, who is whole everywhere, and, discerning all things, is not discerned, is so much the more to be feared, as, remaining invisible, it is unknown when and what He may decree concerning our acts. Which words, however, can be understood also otherwise. For we go to the East, when we lift up the mind in consideration of His Majesty. But He appeareth not, because such as He is in His nature He prevaileth not to be seen by mortal thought. If to the West, I shall not understand him [Ancient XVI]. We go to the West when we bring back to ourselves the eye of the heart raised up in God, but reverberated by that very immensity of light, and having become weary we learn that that which we were seeking is far above us, and considering our mortality, we find ourselves to be yet unworthy who may be able to see the Immortal. If to the left, what I shall do I shall not apprehend him. To go to the left is to consent to the delights of sins. And indeed it is certain that he is not able to apprehend God who yet lies on the left in the delight of sin. If I turn myself to the right, I shall not see him. Into the right doubtlessly he is turned who is lifted up by virtues. But he is not able to see God who rejoices with private gladness concerning good acts, because in him the tumor of elation presses the eye of the heart. Whence it is well said elsewhere: Turn not aside to the right, or to the left (Deut. 17:11). In all which the soul for the most part discusses itself, yet it prevaileth not to apprehend itself fully. Hence it is aptly subjoined here:

CAPUT XXXII.

VERS. 10.---But he knoweth my way.

39. God explores the ways of the just and proves them.---As if he should say plainly: I both discuss myself strictly, and I cannot know myself perfectly; and yet He whom I prevail not to see, subtly sees all things which I do. There follows:

And he will prove me as gold which passeth through the fire.

Gold in the furnace profits to the clarity of its nature, while it loses dross. As gold therefore which passes through the fire the souls of the just are proved, to whom by the burning of tribulation both vices are withdrawn and merits are increased. Nor was it of elation that the holy man compared himself placed in tribulation to gold, because he who was called just by the voice of God before the scourges, was not for that reason permitted to be tempted that vices might be purged in him, but that merits might increase, but gold is purged by fire. He esteemed therefore less of himself than he was, while, delivered to tribulation, he believed himself to be purged, who had not anything in him to be purged.

40. The just, however humble, are not ignorant of their good works.---But it is to be known that although the mind of the just feels humble things of itself, yet they behold those things which they do how right they are, but they do not presume concerning their rectitude: Whence it is still subjoined: My foot has followed his footsteps: his way I have kept, and have not declined from it. From the commandments of his lips I have not departed, and in my bosom I have hidden the words of his mouth. But in all these let us see whether he thinks himself to be anything. There follows: For he is alone [Rec. XVI]. By which sentence subjoined he shows that in so many good things which he had done he believed himself to be nothing. But repeating these same words above, let us touch upon them as we are able.

CAPUT XXXIII.

VERS. 11.---My foot has followed his footsteps.

41. The long-suffering and piety of God are to be imitated by us. Examples of Christ to be followed.---For as if some steps of God are His operations which we behold, by which every good and evil man is ruled, by which the just and unjust are disposed in their orders, by which both every subject is daily led to better things, and the adverse one falling to worse things is tolerated. Concerning which steps indeed the Prophet said: Thy steps have been seen, O God (Psal. 67:25). We therefore, when we behold the virtue of His long-suffering and piety, and beholding we contend to imitate, what else do we do than follow the tracks of His steps, because we imitate certain extremes of His operation. For Truth admonished to imitate these footsteps of His Father, when He said: Pray for them that persecute and slander you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven, who maketh his sun to rise upon the evil and the good (Matth. 5:44, 45; Luke 6:28). [Ancient XVII.] Blessed Job, however, who with certain faith had already said: I know that my Redeemer liveth, and in the last day I am to rise from the earth (Job 19:25), can so intend in the future operation of wisdom to be incarnate, just as we see the already past works of the same wisdom through faith, that the Mediator of God and men was benign to bestow, humble to sustain, patient to provide an example. Whose life indeed while blessed Job, filled with the heavenly spirit, beheld with solicitous intention, foreseeing the future humility of that mildness, he recurs as if to an example proposed to himself, so that whatever he should do in this life, he might bind to the tracks of that imitation, so far as he who was not able to see the sublime things of His hidden disposition, beholding as if on the earth, might hold the tracks for His imitation. Concerning which His tracks it is said through Peter: Christ suffered for us, leaving you an example, that ye should follow his steps (1 Pet. 2:21). Concerning which it is still subjoined:

CAPUT XXXIV.

IBID.---His way I have kept, and have not declined from it.

42. The solicitude of the just is to observe the ways of truth.---He keeps and does not decline, who works this where he intends. For to keep by intention, is not to decline by operation. For this is the solicitude of the just, that they daily examine their acts according to the ways of truth, and, proposing those things to themselves as a rule, they decline not from the path of their rectitude. For they daily contend to go above themselves, and as they are advanced into the summit of virtues, they judge by cautious reprehension whatever remains of them from themselves below themselves, and they hasten to draw themselves whole to that point where they find themselves to have partially arrived. There follows:

CAPUT XXXV.

VERS. 12.---From the commandments of his lips I have not departed.

43. To search the will of God in the Scriptures, another solicitude of the just.---Just as well-obeying servants are always intent upon the faces of their masters, so that they may quickly hear those things which they shall have commanded and contend to fulfill them, so the minds of the just through their intention assist the Almighty Lord, and in His Scripture they behold as if His mouth, so that because God speaks through it everything that He wills, they may not differ from His will so far as they acknowledge that same will of His in His eloquence. Whence it comes to pass that His words do not pass superfluously through their ears, but they fix these in their hearts. Hence it is subjoined here:

CAPUT XXXVI

IBID.---And in my bosom I have hidden the words of his mouth.

44. To hide the words of God in the bosom, another solicitude of the just.---For in the bosom of the heart we hide the words of His mouth, as far as we hear His commandments not transitorily, but to be fulfilled in work. Hence it is that it is written of the Virgin Mother herself: But Mary kept all these words, conferring them in her heart (Luke 2:19). Which words indeed, even when they go forth to operation, lie hidden, concealed in the bosom of the heart, if the mind of the worker is not lifted up within by that which is done without. For when the conceived word is led to work, if human praise is sought through this, the word of God is doubtlessly not hidden in the bosom of the mind. But I would wish to know, blessed man, why you examine yourself with such great intention, why you bind yourself with such great solicitude? There follows:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

[Old XVIII].

VERSE 13.---For He is alone, and no one can turn away His thought.

45. God alone is He, in comparison of whose essence our being is not being.---Are there not angels and men, heaven and earth, air and seas, all winged things, quadrupeds, and creeping things? And certainly it is written: He created all things that they might be (Gen. 2:3, seq.). When therefore there are so many things in the nature of things, why is it now said by the voice of the blessed man: For He is alone? But it is one thing to be, another thing to be principally; one thing to be changeably, and another thing to be unchangeably. For all these things are, but principally they are not, because they do not at all subsist in themselves, and unless they be held by the hand of the Governor, they can by no means be. For all things subsist in Him; by whom they were created, nor do those things which live give life to themselves, nor are those things which are moved and do not live led to motion by their own nods, but He moves all things, who vivifies some, and others indeed not vivified He keeps, wonderfully ordering them into an extreme essence. For all things were made out of nothing, and their essence would tend again to nothing, unless the Author of all held it back with the hand of governance. Therefore all things which have been created are neither able to subsist by themselves, nor to be moved; but they subsist so far as they have received that they ought to be; they are moved so far as they are disposed by an occult instinct. For behold, a sinner is to be scourged concerning human things: the earth dries up in his labors, the sea is shaken in his shipwrecks, the air is inflamed in his sweats, the heaven grows dark against him with inundations, men are incensed in his oppressions, and the angelic powers are moved in his adversity. Do these things, which we have called inanimate or living, move by their own instincts and not rather by divine impulses? Whatever it is therefore that rages outwardly, by this He is to be intuited, who disposes this inwardly. In every cause therefore He alone is to be intuited, who principally is. Who also says to Moses: I am who I am. Thus shalt thou say to the children of Israel: He who is, hath sent me to you (Exod. 3:14). When therefore we are scourged by those things which we see, we ought solicitously to fear Him, whom we do not see. Let the holy man therefore despise whatever terrifies outwardly, whatever by its own essence, unless it were ruled, would tend to nothing, and let him intuit with the eye of the mind, all things being suppressed, the One in comparison of whose essence our being is not being, and let him say: For He is alone.

46. God unchangeable in nature and will.---Of whose unchangeability it is aptly added immediately: And no one can turn away His thought. For as He is unchangeable in nature, so is He unchangeable in will. For no one turns away His thought, because no one is able to resist His occult judgments. For even if there were some who seemed to have turned away His thought by their prayers, His internal thought was such, that they were able to turn away His sentence by praying, and received from Him what they should do with Him. Let him say therefore: And no one can turn away His thought, because judgments once fixed can by no means be changed. Whence it is written: He hath set a decree, and it shall not pass (Ps. 148:6); and again: Heaven and earth shall pass, but my words shall not pass (Mark 13:31); and again: For my thoughts are not as your thoughts, nor my ways as your ways (Is. 55:8). When therefore the sentence seems to be changed outwardly, the internal counsel is not changed, because whatever is done changeably without, is unchangeably constituted within concerning each thing. There follows:

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

[Old XIX, Correct XVIII].

IBID.---And whatsoever His soul has willed, that He has done.

47. Those things which seem to be done against His will do not resist God.---Since God is exterior to all bodies, interior to all minds, that very power of His, by which He penetrates all things, and disposes all things, is called His soul. To whose will indeed even those things do not resist, which seem to be done against His will, because for this He sometimes permits even that to be done which He does not command, so that by this that which He orders may be more certainly fulfilled. For the perverse will is of the apostate angel, but nevertheless it is wonderfully ordered by God, so that his snares also serve for the utility of the good, whom they purge while they tempt. Thus therefore His soul has done whatsoever it willed, so that from that also He fulfills His will, whence it seemed His will was resisted. Let the just man therefore be terrified, and considering the weight of so great majesty, let him find himself to be weak.

48. But among these words I wish to inquire, and say: O blessed Job, placed among so many scourges, why do you still dread adverse things? already you are surrounded by tribulations, already you are straightened by innumerable afflictions. An evil ought to be feared which has not yet been received; you, placed in such great grief, what do you fear? But behold, the just man, satisfying our inquiries, adds:

CHAPTER XXXIX.

VERSE 14.---When He shall have fulfilled His will in me, and many other like things are present to Him.

49. From those things which we suffer, we learn to fear those which we have not yet suffered.---As if he should say plainly: I already weigh what I suffer, but I still dread what I am able to suffer. For He fulfills His will in me, because He afflicts me with many percussions. But many like things are present to Him, because if He thinks to strike, He still finds where the wound may increase. From this therefore it is to be weighed how fearful he was before the scourge, who even being struck still fears lest he be struck. For considering an incomprehensible power to be in Him both of might and of examination, the just man would not be secure even concerning the scourge. Whence still fearing he adds:

CHAPTER XL.

VERSE 15.---And therefore I am troubled at His face, and considering Him, I am solicitous with fear.

50. While the wicked show security before them, the just always fear.---He is rightly troubled at the face of the Lord, who sets the terror of His majesty before the eyes of his heart, and is shaken by the dread of His rectitude, while he perceives that he is not fit for rendering accounts, if he be strictly judged. But it is rightly said: And considering Him, I am solicitous with fear, because when anyone least considers the power of divine animadversion, he least fears it; and he is so much more as it were secure in this life, as he is alien from the consideration of internal strictness. For the just men always return to the secret chamber of the heart, they intuit the power of occult strictness, they assist at the judgment of the internal majesty, so that they may sometime be more secure, by how much here, as long as they lived, they would not be secure. For the minds of the wicked, when they refuse to consider what they may fear, sometime arrive rejoicing at that which they by no means escape by fearing. But behold, we know of blessed Job that he was devoted to frequent sacrifices to God, that he was expended in hospitalities, in the needs of the poor, that he was humble even to those subject to him, that he was benign to those opposing him, and yet he received so many scourges nor did he already stand secure among the scourges, but he still feared, still considering the power of divine strictness he trembles. What therefore do we miserable ones, what do we sinners say, if he so fears, who so acted? But whether he has the weight of so great fear from himself, he makes known. There follows:

CHAPTER XLI

[Old XX].

VERSE 16. God has softened my heart, and the Almighty has troubled me.

51. This fear is a gift of God.---The heart of the just is said to be softened by a divine gift, because it is penetrated by the fear of heavenly judgment. For that is soft which can be penetrated, hard that which cannot be penetrated. Whence it is said by Solomon: Blessed is the man who is always fearful, but he who is of a hard mind shall fall into evil (Prov. 28:14). Therefore he attributes the power of his dread not to himself, but to the Author, who says: God has softened my heart, and the Almighty has troubled me. For the hearts of the good are not secure, but troubled, because while they consider the weight of the future examination, they do not desire to have rest here, they trouble their own security by the consideration of internal strictness. Who nevertheless among those very punishments of fear often recall the mind to gifts, and so that they may refresh themselves with consolation, among that which they fear they bring back the eye to the gifts which they have received, so that hope may lift up him whom fear presses down. Whence also there follows:

CHAPTER XLII

[Correct XIX].

VERSE 17.---For I have not perished on account of imminent darkness, nor has a mist covered my face.

52. Scourges of the just either purge past evils committed, or avoid future ones.---For he, placed in the scourge, perishes from the health of the body on account of imminent darkness, who is therefore struck for things past, so that he may be hidden from future punishments. For the scourges of the good either purge vices committed, or avoid future ones which could have been committed. But blessed Job, because placed in the scourge, he was neither purged from preceding sins, nor covered from imminent ones, but only his virtue was increased in the scourge, says with confidence: For I have not perished on account of imminent darkness, nor has a mist covered my face. For since he always looked upon the weight of divine dread, the mist of sin did not cover the face of his heart. And he whom no punishments followed, did not lose the health of the body on account of imminent darkness.

53. No one is immune from depraved thoughts.---And it is to be noted that he, announcing former things, by no means says: It has not touched my face; but: A mist has not covered. For often even the hearts of the just are polluted by thoughts arising, they touch them with delights of earthly things, but while they are more quickly driven away by the hand of holy discretion, it is speedily brought about that the mist does not cover the face of the heart, which already touched it from unlawful delight. For often in the very sacrifice of prayer importunate thoughts intrude themselves, which are able to snatch away or to defile that which we weeping sacrifice in ourselves to God. Whence Abraham, when he offered a sacrifice at the setting of the sun, bore with birds pressing upon him, which he zealously drove away, lest they should snatch away the offered sacrifice (Gen. 15:11). So we, when we offer a burnt offering to God on the altar of the heart, let us guard it from unclean birds, lest malignant spirits and perverse thoughts snatch away what our mind hopes usefully to offer to the Lord. There follows:

CHAPTER XLIII

[Old and Correct XX].

CHAPTER 24, VERSE 1.---Times are not hidden from the Almighty; but they who know Him, are ignorant of His days.

54. The days of God are His eternity. God is what He has.---What are the days of God, unless His eternity itself be called so? which is sometimes expressed by the pronunciation of one day, as it is written: Better is one day in Thy courts above thousands (Ps. 83:11). But sometimes indeed for its length it is signified by the appellation of many days, of which it is written: Thy years are for generation and generation (Ps. 101:25). We therefore are rolled within times, by this that we are a creature. But God who is the creator of all comprehends our times by His eternity. He says therefore: Times are not hidden from the Almighty; but they who know Him, are ignorant of His days. Because He indeed sees our things comprehensibly, but we are by no means able to comprehend those things which are His. But since the nature of God is simple, it is much to be wondered at, why he says: They who know Him, are ignorant of His days. For neither is He one thing, and His days another. For God is this which He has. For He has eternity, but He is eternity itself. He has light, but He Himself is His own light. He has brightness, but He is His own brightness. There is not therefore in Him one thing to be, and another thing to have. What is it therefore to say: They who know Him, are ignorant of His days, unless because even they who know Him still are ignorant? For even they who already hold Him by faith, still are ignorant by sight. And since He is eternity to Himself, whom we truly believe, yet in what manner His eternity itself is we are ignorant. For in this which we hear concerning the power of the divine nature, we are sometimes accustomed to think those things which we know by experience. For everything which begins and ends, is concluded by a beginning and an end. Which if it is deferred by some little delay that it may be finished, it is called long; in which length indeed when anyone brings back the eyes of the mind behind by memory, he tends before by expectation, he dilates it in the mind as if by a space of time. And when he hears of the eternity of God, to his mind intending after a human manner he proposes long spaces of life, in which he may always measure both what has gone away behind, which may be retained in memory, and what remains before, which may be expected by intention.

55. In eternity nothing is past or future.---But as often as we think in that eternity, we have not yet known eternity. For there is that which is neither begun by a beginning, nor terminated by an end, where neither that which shall come is expected, nor that which ought to be remembered runs through, but it is one thing which is always to be. Which although we and the angels begin to see to be with a beginning, yet we see this to be without a beginning, where it is so always to be without end, that the mind never tends itself to following things, as if those things which were were multiplied and became long. For although it has been said by the spirit of prophecy: Lord, who reignest forever, and for the world, and still (Perhaps Exod. 15:18, where it is read: The Lord shall reign forever and beyond), after the manner of sacred eloquence, the spirit has spoken to men in a human way, so that it should say "still" there, where expectation was not present. For eternity does not have "still", which has "always to be", in which no part of its length passes away, so that another part may succeed, but to be is all at once, so that nothing may seem to be wanting which it does not discern; in which the mind sees everything that is both not to be slow, and to be long. But we speaking these things concerning the days of eternity, endeavor more to see something than we see. Let it be said therefore rightly: But they who know Him, are ignorant of His days, because although we already know God by faith, yet in what manner His eternity is, without past before the worlds, without future after the worlds, without long delay, without perpetual expectation, we do not see. Blessed Job therefore holding the type of Holy Church, because he moderates himself under the great bridle of knowledge, lest he should savor more than it behooves to savor, and testifying that the days of God cannot be comprehended, soon brings back the respect of the mind to the pride of heretics, who desire to savor high things, and boast that they perfectly know what they cannot in any way take. For there follows:

CHAPTER XLIV

[Correct XXI].

VERSE 2.---Others have removed the landmarks, they have snatched away the flocks, and fed them.

56. Heretics remove the landmarks established by the fathers.---Whom does he designate by the name of others unless heretics, who exist as strangers from the bosom of Holy Church? For they remove the landmarks, because by prevaricating they transcend the constitutions of the fathers. Concerning which constitutions indeed it is written: Do not transgress the ancient landmarks, which thy fathers have set (Prov. 22:28). Who snatch away the flocks and feed them, because they draw all the unskilful to themselves by perverse persuasions, and nourish them with pestiferous doctrines for their destruction. For that unskilful peoples are designated by the name of flocks, the words of the Bridegroom testify, who addresses his Bride, saying: If thou know not thyself, O thou fairest among women, go forth, and go after the footsteps of the flocks (Cant. 1:7), that is, unless thou knowest thy honor, in which thou wert created after the likeness of God, by living well, go forth from the sight of my contemplation, and imitate the life of unskilful peoples. There follows:

CHAPTER XLV.

VERSE 3.---They have driven away the ass of the fatherless, and taken away the ox of the widow for a pledge.

57. The elect are the fatherless.---Whom do we take for the fatherless in this place, unless the elect of God, placed in tenderness of mind, who are nourished by the great grace of faith, and do not yet see the face of their Father now dead for them? And there are many in the Church who behold certain ones desiring heavenly things, and holding all earthly things in contempt; and although they themselves labor in the toils of this world, yet they bring the aid of this life to those whom they behold panting for heavenly things, from the things which they possess in this world. And although they themselves are unable to do spiritual things, yet they willingly minister subsidies to those tending to the highest things. For the ass is accustomed to bear the burdens of men. As it were therefore a certain ass of the elect is he, who, serving earthly acts, carries away burdens for the uses of men. And often when heretics turn away any such one from the bosom of Holy Church, they as it were drive away the ass of the fatherless, because when they draw him over to their own perfidy, they repel him from the ministry of the good. The Church is a widow.---But what widow ought to be understood unless Holy Church, who in the meantime is deprived of the vision of her slain Husband? But the ox of this widow is every preacher. And it often happens that heretics draw over by their perverse dogmas even those who seemed to be preachers.

They therefore take away the ox of the widow, when they take away even a preacher from Holy Church. Where it is rightly added: For a pledge. For when a pledge is taken, one thing indeed is that which is held, but yet still another thing is sought. And for the most part heretics for this reason endeavor to take away those who preach, so that they may also draw their followers. The ox of the widow therefore is taken for a pledge, when he himself who preached is snatched away for this reason, that others may follow. From whose ruin it is for the most part brought about that these also go out from the bosom of Holy Church, who in it seemed to be mild and humble, endowed with good morals. Whence also it is added:

CHAPTER XLVI.

VERSE 4.---They have subverted the way of the poor, and oppressed together the meek of the earth.

59. By the name of the poor the humble are to be understood.---For by the name of poverty humility is often accustomed to be designated. And sometimes those who seem meek and humble, if they know not how to preserve discretion, fall by the examples of others. But there are some heretics who flee from being mixed with the peoples, but seek a retreat of more secret life; who for the most part infect those whom they find so much the more with the pest of their persuasion, as they seem more reverend as if from the merits of life. Concerning whom it is added:

CHAPTER XLVII

VERSE 5.---Others as wild asses in the desert go forth to their work.

60. Heretics are like wild asses. They perform not God's work, but their own.---For the wild ass (onager) is a wild ass. And rightly in this place are heretics compared to wild asses, because, being given up to their own pleasures, they are strangers to the bonds of faith and reason. Hence it is written: A wild ass accustomed to the wilderness, in the desire of her soul, drew in the wind of her love (Jerem. 2:24). For the wild ass is accustomed to the wilderness, because while he does not cultivate the soil of his heart with the virtue of discipline, he dwells where there is no fruit. Because in the desire of his soul he draws in the wind of his love, because those things which he conceives in his mind from the desire of knowledge have power to puff up, not to edify. Against whom it is said: Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth (1 Cor. 8:1). Hence here also it is fitly added: They go forth to their work. For they perform not God's work, but their own, while they follow not right dogmas, but their own desires. For it is written: He that walketh in a perfect way, he served me (Psalm 101:6). He therefore who walketh not in a perfect way, serveth himself rather than the Lord. It follows:

CHAPTER XLVIII

IBID.---Rising early to the prey, they prepare bread for their children.

61. Heretics are watchful for the prey.---They are watchful for the prey, who always endeavor to snatch the words of the just to their own sense, that by these they may prepare the bread of error for their perverse children. Of which bread indeed it is said in Solomon by the words of the woman who bears the type of heretical depravity: Stolen waters are sweeter, and hidden bread is more pleasant (Prov. 9:17). It follows:

CHAPTER XLIX

VERSE 6.---They reap a field not their own, and they gather the vintage of his vineyard whom they have oppressed by force.
